With an international reputation to uphold, it is vital that the BBC is bound by the highest standards of quality, impartiality and integrity. Does not the Secretary of State agree that the fine judgments that the BBC makes daily must be in the interests of the public, not Ministers and the Government? That is why the BBC needs a proper independent regulator. Why is it that Ofcom has the ability properly to regulate every other broadcaster in the UK, but not the BBC?

> "I fully support the recent proposals that there should be a single regulatory body for all terrestrial television."

Those are not my words, but those of Michael Grade, the chairman of the governors of the BBC, when he was chief executive of Channel 4.

Is the BBC Trust proposed by the Secretary of State anything more than the BBC governors in another building—just as cosy, but twice the rent? If the BBC is to meet its public service broadcasting obligations, is it not essential that the British public have confidence in its independence and integrity? The Prime Minister may think that it is appropriate for him to act as judge and jury, but surely we cannot accept a model that fails to separate governance and regulation. Must not we have a system in place whereby those regulating the content, impartiality and standards of the BBC see themselves as representing the licence fee payer, not the Secretary of State?

The BBC is a unique organisation in a unique position. Because of that, we must ensure that that position is not abused to the detriment of other broadcasters or the viewing and listening public. Is it not unacceptable for a publicly funded BBC to be allowed to outspend and outgun its competitors, prevent innovation and stifle competition?

How can we be confident that the advisory role for Ofcom, as envisaged in the White Paper, will have the power to clip the wings of Auntie when she spies a lucrative potential market? Why can Ofcom do no more than send an advisory report to the BBC? That is not a criticism of Ofcom, just bewilderment at the way in which the Secretary of State is tying its hands. As long as the BBC has the ability to ignore Ofcom, as it does under the right hon. Lady's plans, it will continue unchecked and unrestrained. Will the right hon. Lady tell us whether Ofcom will be allowed to investigate the BBC's activities retrospectively? I doubt that. I suspect that Ofcom will not be a watchdog, but more the proverbial toothless tiger, and that we will be left with a typical new Labour initiative—a competition champion with only advisory powers.

Does the Secretary of State appreciate our concerns about her White Paper's suggestion that the BBC should be under a charter obligation to promote Britain abroad and to sustain citizenship and civil society? The Chancellor is already talking about his desire to see a flagpole in every garden. Is not there a danger that that will soon be followed by a Union jack flying from every TV aerial in the land? Jesting apart, does not such a move—at least in the hands of the Government, who are not known for their respect for independent institutions—represent an insidious threat to the BBC's impartiality? Surely the Secretary of State can see the dangers.

We are considering an unprecedented increase in funding for the BBC—from just under £3 billion a year to well over £4 billion in 2013. Why does the settlement require such an increase? Why are we faced with a bill for the BBC that is higher than the gross domestic product of Mongolia? Is it because of the grasping hand of the Chancellor? Are not the Government using charter renewal as a Trojan horse to pay for digital switchover? When there is a smell of easy money, the Chancellor is never far away, looking for ways of paying for policies that he cannot afford. Is it not the case that he is hellbent on trousering between £2 billion and £5 billion from flogging off the analogue spectrum? The licence fee payer will pay for that, but will not get anything back for the investment. Like the worst dinner date, the Chancellor is never around when the bill arrives.

We know that the Chancellor has form—he made £27 billion from the sell-off of the 3G network, and he is looking to repeat the exercise. Surely his ingenuity does not stop there. An example of the stealthiest of stealth taxes, he hopes that, by using the word "spectrum", the unsuspecting public will not realise that he has just imposed the first new Labour TV tax.

[Mr. Hugo Swire]

Like the computer salesman who bamboozles the customer with jargon, the Chancellor hopes that we will simply not notice another £300 million going from our pockets into his. Does not the Secretary of State accept that a licence fee that exceeds £180 will hit hardest the poorest in Britain—those on low and fixed incomes? Does not she agree that there is a danger that public confidence in the BBC, as a national institution, will be undermined by a licence fee that is set beyond many people's ability to pay, simply to feed the Chancellor's tax-and-spend habit?

We had high hopes of the White Paper because we had high hopes of the BBC. However, the document is a missed opportunity to introduce regulation to guarantee impartiality and independence. It is a missed opportunity to harness the potential of the digital age, to provide a level playing field for the commercial sector, to reinforce public confidence in the BBC and to give the BBC licence fee payers value for money.

Tessa Jowell: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, that was high on rhetoric and low on substance. He will be considerably reassured when, in a calmer frame of mind, he reads the substance of the White Paper.

Let me begin with the differences between us, which have led to the Government pursuing their approach to the future shape of the BBC. As I said in my opening remarks, the BBC Trust is a unique organisation and a unique solution, which recognises the BBC's unique nature. The BBC is an organisation like no other in this country. Our intention is that it should be more accountable than ever to the people who pay for it—the licence fee payers.

There has been a time-honoured consensus in this country about the importance of universal free-to-view broadcasting. That principle safeguards the interests of the most vulnerable and those who, at a time of rapid change, are at risk of being left behind. I remind the hon. Gentleman that, as part of mitigating the risk, the Government introduced free television licences for those over 75. We will ensure that targeted help, which is necessary as a consequence of digital switchover, protects the interests of the vulnerable and the very elderly.

I shall deal with some of the hon. Gentleman's specific points, particularly on the changes that have taken place since the Green Paper was published some months ago, which are reflected in today's White Paper. Several important parliamentary reports have appeared in the interim, including the report of the Select Committee, which is chaired by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), and the report of the House of Lords Select Committee. It was right to give due consideration to both those reports in developing the White Paper policy. It is in the light of the concerns raised, particularly by the House of Lords Select Committee, on the structure of the trust, that we have sought to strengthen its role in relation to broader competition issues, the development of ex ante codes, the role of the National Audit Office in working with the trust to ensure value for money for the licence fee payer, and the role of Ofcom in conducting and developing market impact assessments. All of that will ensure that choice for the consumer—the licence fee payer—is not diminished as a consequence of the BBC's intended place in the broadcasting marketplace. If the hon. Gentleman considers those matters in a rather more serious and rational way and sets aside his rather overblown rhetoric, he will understand that that solution is right for the BBC and wanted by the people of this country.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that there have been numerous complaints from news providers, software publishers, online services, record companies and mobile phone operators about the impact of the BBC's ambitions in that respect. While the BBC is clearly right to make available its programmes in whatever format the consumer chooses, does the Secretary of State accept that its intervention could risk having the same kind of impact as that of an elephant jumping into a swimming pool? Will she therefore consider making Ofcom's role more than simply an advisory one? Will she also ensure that the final decision about launching new services does not rest with the BBC alone, even in the guise of the new BBC Trust rather than that of the old BBC governors?

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman has raised two important considerations. If the broadcasting market is to continue to flourish, it is crucial that the potential competitive impact of the BBC is understood and subject to scrutiny. That is why the market impact assessment will be conducted under the joint surveillance of the trust and Ofcom, and why the trust will have a duty to consider the wider interests of licence fee payers.

The hon. Gentleman raised a second important issue, which is now being considered by Ofcom, about the ownership of broadcast rights to material delivered through new media. He will be aware that Ofcom will shortly reach its conclusion on that consultation, and we should obviously await that. Those are two examples of the competitive challenges facing the BBC and any other media organisation of scale in this country. It is important that the BBC should be a source for growth in innovation, not a constraint on innovation. The structure of the trust will ensure that that happens, as will the role of Ofcom, which will publish in a transparent manner all the conclusions on market impact assessments. Ultimately, the BBC Trust will be accountable to the licence fee payers for its judgments.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): While many of us have great confidence in Michael Grade as chairman of the BBC and Mark Thompson as director-general, does my right hon. Friend agree that the quality and integrity of BBC governance must not depend on the quality of individuals at any given time and that the test of the new governance structure that she proposes is that never again will it be possible for a huge and culpable blunder by broadcasters to be condoned and support for it railroaded through the board of governors, as occurred in the David Kelly affair? Everybody agreed after that affair that, if there was one flaw in the BBC, it was the structure of governance. Can my right hon. Friend give me the assurance for which I ask?

Tessa Jowell: I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend for his distinguished chairmanship of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, which has undertaken many inquiries into the BBC and whose recommendations we have taken very seriously indeed. Yes, I can give him the assurance about the importance of a structural separation of the role of the BBC Trust and that of the BBC executive. It is important that the organisation is structurally robust, and, as he suggests, not simply built around personalities. These are structures designed to run the BBC for a decade to come.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): The test of the White Paper must be whether it guarantees a strong, independent and securely funded BBC equipped to meet the challenges of the digital age, strengthened in its independence from the Government and set to remain the envy of the world.

Unlike the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire), I think there is much in the White Paper to applaud: a clear statement of purposes to the BBC, emphasising quality, not ratings; increased opportunities for independent production; greater scrutiny of BBC finances under the NAO; continuation of the licence fee; and a charter lasting 10 years, ensuring long-term planning. That said, there are concerns on regulation, Government demands on the BBC and public service broadcasting in general.

On regulation, does the Secretary of State accept that while the proposed BBC Trust is an improvement on the BBC governors, it is still not a totally independent regulator? It will have, as we see in the White Paper, strategic oversight of major BBC decisions, and the White Paper even describes it as the sovereign body within the BBC, so it is still part of the BBC. Does she agree that that will be especially problematic when deciding whether the BBC is allowed to develop an existing service or introduce a new one?

The new proposals are certainly tougher than the current ones, and Ofcom's role—it is hardly a toothless tiger, I have to say—in assessing market impact is welcome, but will not the BBC still be its own judge and jury? Will the Secretary of State at least accept the need for a clear process of appeal to a truly independent authority? Better still, will she agree that a new single independent regulator for all public service broadcasters is the best option of all?

On demands made on the BBC, is there not a danger that the BBC will be buried under innumerable Government targets? Is not the Secretary of State slightly embarrassed by the fact that the last charter and agreement had 43 clauses between them, whereas the new charter and agreement have 175—a fourfold increase?

Given those demands, will the Secretary of State rule out a smash-and-grab raid on the licence fee payers to fund them? For example, does she agree that targeted assistance to help disadvantaged households in the switch to digital should be paid from general taxation, not the licence fee? Does she agree that the regeneration benefits, not the programme quality improvement benefits, of the move to Manchester should be paid for by Manchester authorities, not TV viewers nationwide? I agree with the hon. Gentleman on one thing at least. If the Chancellor does introduce spectrum charging, will the Secretary of State rule out the possibility that the BBC will have to pay for it out of the licence fee?

Will the Secretary of State re-examine the question of who pays the licence fee, and review the policy of concessions for vulnerable groups? Is it not bizarre that while hotels need only one licence for the first 15 rooms, there are no concessions for women's refuges?

I hope the Secretary of State agrees that competition is good for the BBC. Will she make a firm commitment to preserving the plurality of public service broadcasting by, for example, protecting the future of Channel 4?

Notwithstanding those concerns, there is much to be welcomed in the White Paper. For 80 years, the BBC has been the cornerstone of public service broadcasting in this country. Although they are not perfect, the proposals in the White Paper should ensure that as we enter the digital era the BBC will continue to play an important role in all our lives.

Tessa Jowell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generosity.

During the development of the White Paper, the central debate was about the nature of regulation of the BBC. As the hon. Gentleman will know, at least four options have been widely canvassed and widely debated. As I have made clear, Labour Members believe that the BBC Trust is equipped with the necessary powers to be close enough to the BBC to know what is going on, but strong and independent enough to make tough decisions that are in the interests of the licence fee payer. It has a duty and an accountability to the licence fee payer, and as it develops and matures it will be its responsibility to determine the way in which mechanisms for accountability are defined.

The hon. Gentleman and I disagree on switchover and switchover costs. He will see from the regulatory impact assessment that the additional costs that are likely to fall on the BBC are the switchover costs. Throughout the next charter period, the National Audit Office will oversee the self-help programme when the level of the licence fee is eventually determined. I think that that is an important statement of accountability.

The hon. Gentleman and I differ on how the switchover costs should be funded. The principles relating to spectrum charging were agreed in the Communications Act 2003, as the first chapter in this episode of digital switchover. The costs of switchover are broadcasting costs, and historically broadcasting costs that have matched periods of rapid change have always been borne by the BBC. We believe that that should continue.

The hon. Gentleman raised an important point about concessions. Again, I am happy to consider representations on ways in which the existing list of concessions might be altered or amended, although ultimately someone will have to pay for the cost of those concessions. I shall, however, be happy to ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments receive a response as part of the debate on the charter.

[Tessa Jowell]

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman welcomes so much of the White Paper. The differences between us are clear, but Labour Members believe that the proposals on which we differ are in the interests of the continuation of universal free-to-view broadcasting and the licence fee payer.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Many Members are hoping to catch my eye. Accordingly, I make a plea for brief questions and answers.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware that some of us who have been ardent defenders of the public sector in all its forms have supported the BBC for many years, and have heard many statements like the one that she has delivered today? It is all about jam tomorrow: things are going to be different. Does she agree that the BBC has wasted wonderful opportunities in the past 10 to 15 years? With the advent of all these television stations, it could have been a giant in the field. Sadly, that has not happened. I hope that when the move to Manchester takes place, some changes will be made and that we do not have a repeat of what we have had recently: groups of people from the Murdoch empire running the BBC and its political programmes and following a Daily Mail agenda. One of them has had more transplants than Michael Jackson. I hope that some changes will be made and that the BBC will be more representative of the whole of the political spectrum, and not just the Tories.

Tessa Jowell: Public support for the BBC is not reflected in "jam tomorrow"; it is reflected in the polling and consultation that we have conducted over two years. My hon. Friend makes an important point about, first, value for money and maintaining the confidence of the licence fee payer and, secondly, the importance of accuracy and impartiality in BBC news and current affairs broadcasting. That will be a charter responsibility and I know it is a responsibility that the BBC takes extremely seriously. If at any time any Member of Parliament feels that those principles have been breached, the complaints procedure is available to him or her.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): How independent will the trust be from the BBC? Does she agree that it is always better to have an independent body investigating an executive?

Tessa Jowell: The trust will be structurally separate from the executive and, as I have said on a number of occasions, will have a different accountability to the licence fee payer. There will be oversight and scrutiny of the way in which it discharges its competition functions by Ofcom, and value for money scrutiny will be provided through the joint studies that the trust will conduct with the National Audit Office. The House can have confidence in the independence of the trust, but it is a new body with a reputation that has to be earned and that will make or break the likelihood of its long-term continuation.

Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on ensuring that the BBC maintains its uniqueness. In order to help it reach the 25 per cent. minimum of external production, may I suggest that she contact the BBC and say that we should have a parliamentary version of "The Office"? Would she support me in saying that there could be nobody better to write the script, and even play the main part, than the shadow Secretary of State, based on his performance this afternoon?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend and pay tribute to him for his work on the Select Committee. He is a little harsh on the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire).

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): The fourth of the six new purposes mentions reflecting the identity of the nations and regions of the United Kingdom. How will that be done? For example, how will BBC Northern Ireland be represented on the trust and the executive board? What assurance can she give that the two bodies will not increase, rather than decrease, the bureaucracy that many believe exists within the BBC?

Tessa Jowell: A governor will have responsibility for Northern Ireland, and value for money will be a discipline that will apply throughout everything the BBC does.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the support in the north-west region for the BBC's proposals to move a significant amount of its production to Manchester, which will enhance the creative economy of the region and constituencies such as my own. Is my right hon. Friend confident that the move will go ahead?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. This proposal has widespread support in the House and I urge Members with a constituency or regional interest to make their views well known to the BBC. The impact of such an approach on the economy of the north-west and Greater Manchester is well demonstrated, and there are many reasons why the BBC should rise to the challenge of spreading venture capital for creativity way beyond the M25.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What extra funding will be given to the BBC in the regions, and does the Secretary of State agree that the BBC in the regions does an excellent job? I am thinking of news-gathering organisations such as BBC Midlands Today and—last, but not least—BBC Radio Shropshire.

Tessa Jowell: I am sure that I can commend all the BBC regional television stations and the excellence of BBC Radio Shropshire.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the White Paper and her comments today should give BBC viewers and listeners no reason to fear for the BBC's future? In fact, what has been mapped out suggests a strengthening of the BBC's uniqueness and its role not just in the United Kingdom, but across the world. However, they should be afraid—very afraid—of the comments that we heard today from the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire).

Tessa Jowell: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend says.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Secretary of State referred to a targeted assistance programme for the poorest people, in order to offset the cost of digital switchover. Does she believe that that is a welfare cost that should be picked up by central Government, or a broadcasting cost that should be picked up by the licence fee payer?

Tessa Jowell: The Government's view is that it is a broadcasting cost, so it should be met by the licence fee.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I should first declare an interest, having worked for the BBC. As an independent producer, I both benefited from BBC commissions and suffered because of the way in which they were managed. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on a far-reaching and important statement, but I should be grateful for her reassurance that the new commissioning system will not damage the BBC's ability to retain a significant production base. That base has always been the key training house for the British television industry; indeed, it has been responsible for much that is excellent in that industry. I am particularly concerned about analytical current affairs, which there is a dire need for, as the recent Power report showed.

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point, and I hope that I can reassure him that an enormous amount of consideration has been given to the structure of the joint commissioning proposal, precisely because we recognise the importance of the BBC's retaining sufficient scale in-house.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Will the Secretary of State understand the bemusement that will be felt in Scotland at this promotion of British citizenship through the re-branding of the BBC as the British bulldog corporation? In the meantime, we will lose our national voice by losing our governor. The 6 o'clock and 10 o'clock news service is increasingly irrelevant and unnecessary in Scotland. Instead of waving flags, can the BBC not accept the new constitutional reality of the UK and set its agenda accordingly?

Tessa Jowell: I hope that I can reassure the hon. Gentleman by pointing out that the specific purpose is to reflect the diversity of the UK's nations and regions. He will no doubt read with interest in the White Paper the references to Gaelic broadcasting.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): Most Members will support a well-funded, high-quality and strong BBC. As the Secretary of State knows, broadcasting today, particularly television, is vastly different from 10 years ago, and in 10 years' time it will be vastly different again. Does she therefore accept that there is a duty to ensure not only a strong BBC, but strong competitors? Will she say a bit more about how her Department plans to create an environment in which, as new technologies unfold and choice increases, we have not only the high-quality public service broadcasting from the BBC that we all want to see, but strong competitors that can produce and launch initiatives and provide similarly high-quality broadcasting? Overall, it is the viewer and listener who would be the winner through taking such an approach.

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend is right. The licence fee payers—the people of this country—are best served by having a wide choice in broadcasting. A unique challenge for broadcasting in this country is balancing the interests and scale of the BBC—which is, in any theoretical formulation, an intervention in the market, but which is there by virtue of long-established national consensus—with the importance of promoting innovation and diversity, as well as inward investment from other countries, subject to our regulatory system. The White Paper achieves that balance and rigour, maintaining choice in broadcasting for licence fee payers.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): The Secretary of State said that the White Paper is rich in substance, but is not the truth that it is lightweight and vapid in its reforms? Even the concept of the trust is limited. The White Paper says that the BBC Trust will not be a trust in the legal sense and its members will not be trustees of any property. Who are the trustees of the BBC's property, intellectual and physical, if not the trust?

Tessa Jowell: My answers are no and no to the hon. Gentleman's first two points. The trust will not be a legal entity in the fiduciary sense. It will hold the responsibilities of accountability, regulation and governance of the BBC on behalf of the licence fee payer. The hon. Gentleman is arguing about a fine legal point, but licence fee payers, with whom we have had extensive discussions on the issue, understand precisely what the trust is intended to achieve and support it by a majority for that reason.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the logic of the move to Manchester—I note her welcome for that—is not regeneration, as the Liberal Democrats seem to think, but about unlocking the creativity of the whole nation and ensuring that we build up the clusters and cultures that can deliver the television of the future? In that context, can she make it clear to those in the BBC who are resistant to the move that they cannot use it as a bargaining chip in licence fee negotiations, because the logic of the move has to be determined entirely by what is good for the viewing public?

Tessa Jowell: I am sure that those with sense in the BBC will listen to my hon. Friend and take seriously what he says. The creative gain will be enormous and the gain for the BBC in establishing a broader identity will be enormous. The potential for collaboration with other broadcasters will also be enormous. All of that provides a compelling case in support of the proposal. It will ultimately be a decision for the BBC, which will have to produce the business case and the arguments, but my hon. Friend should be in no doubt about the strength of the support for the proposal on this side of the House.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): The Secretary of State knows that for years the Public Accounts Committee has been campaigning for the present voluntary arrangements with the National Audit Office, which we have had for the past year or two. It is true that the White Paper will strengthen the arrangements somewhat, and I thank her for that. However, does she realise that we will still be missing the holy grail of external audit, whereby the external auditor has the untrammelled right to investigate a public sector body, which cannot veto that investigation? Under the White Paper, the interim arrangements will continue. The Public Accounts Committee met the National Audit Office last night and we decided to continue campaigning. Will the Secretary of State keep an open mind on this, because the spending of £3 billion of public money should be accountable to this House, the national Parliament?

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman is well aware of the arguments that have been resisted by this Government and the BBC. Like him, I welcome the settlement that the White Paper provides and I welcome the fact that the NAO will be invited to exercise scrutiny over the self-help and efficiency savings over the next period of the licence fee. I simply reiterate the point that the BBC is a unique organisation. The arrangements are unique and it is the responsibility of all those within the BBC to make them work in the public interest.

Point of Order

5.15 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will be aware that Mr. Speaker has frequently deprecated the provision of statements and other information to members of the press ahead of their provision to Members of Parliament. Are you therefore willing to draw to his attention my concern about the statement that we have just heard? Although the Secretary of State was especially generous in her interpretation of the ministerial code in making the statement available to me and to the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) in advance of her making it to the House, you might be surprised to learn that members of the press received it one and a quarter hours before we did.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I understand that that might be the usual practice, with the proviso that the press should observe certain procedures, such as an embargo. I have noted what the hon. Gentleman says and I hope that those procedures have been observed in the present case.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Even if there was an embargo, the press at least had the opportunity to look at the statement, whereas we had no opportunity even to see it until the Secretary of State sat down. It seems to me that that is disrespectful to Parliament, and the practice should be deprecated and cease.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have noted what the hon. Gentleman says, but I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Licensing of Child Location Services

5.16 pm

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a licensing regime for the sale or promotion of any service providing data on the location of children where these data have been derived from any mobile telephone network, satellite system or other electronic or communications medium.

Only weeks ago, I knew nothing about electronic location services, but now I seem to hear about them everywhere I go and I am becoming paranoid about whether I am being tracked. I just saw an item on CNN about CeBIT, the world's largest annual high-tech trade fair, which opened in Hanover last week and at which more than 6,000 companies are showing off their latest wares for the IT and communications market. There was an item about the sector of the fair devoted to devices for tracking individuals—location services. One exhibitor said that he was amazed that more parents had not yet invested in his child location product—"Just pop it in your kid's backpack and get peace of mind." But what if it is someone else who pops that tracker into your kid's backpack—someone else who wants to trace your child? The exhibitor said nothing about how he checks whether he has sold his product to a parent or to a paedophile.

That illustrates my main point: in the right hands, location data—knowing where someone is—can be valuable and reassuring, but in the wrong hands such data are extremely dangerous. My Bill will set up a licensing and regulatory regime to make sure that those services are in the right hands and that those who are being tracked know about it.

I also have a broader point: for the first time in our history, we have it within our power—every one of us, not just James Bond types or the police—to track another person 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. The mass consumer market is about to be flooded—is being flooded—with cheap, easy-to-use tracking devices; some are even being given away free. In addition to special tracking devices, there are services to track people through their mobile phones. Since the children's charities internet adviser told me of the new industry, I have learned of three journalists who in recent weeks have used such services to track people without their knowledge. The supposed safeguards to stop that happening did not work; they can be evaded all too easily. It is hard to believe but it is true: Members could all easily be being tracked now.

Urgent debate is needed and controls must be established, not least because it is in the name of child protection that the new surveillance technologies are starting to reach the mass consumer market. Let us take the Teddyfone as an example. Launched last November, it is not hard to guess what the device looks like: its fetching blue and white livery will instantly appeal to the hungry eyes of at least the younger end of the 4 to 10-year-old market in which the company says it is interested. It will easily fit into tiny hands, pockets or backpacks. A Teddyfone does what any phone will do—it lets someone talk to the person who has it—but just sending a text message automatically and silently converts it into a listening device. As Teddyfone told a colleague of mine, if the child knew that someone was listening, it would defeat the point. The Teddyfone also provides information about the physical whereabouts of the person carrying the phone.

All mobiles are now potential tracking devices. When any mobile phone is switched on, it is transmitting and receiving signals from individual, geographically specific radio cells on the owner's mobile phone network. The network knows where someone is, possibly to a matter of metres. If the phone has been turned off, has run out of power or is out of range of the network, the network knows where it was at that last connected moment.

The emergency services have always been able to access that information, if necessary. However, the UK's mobile phone networks have now put that location information on sale to the public and, so far, about 30 companies, of which Teddyfone is one, are packaging and selling it. Some are doing so as part of so-called child safety products. In the case of Teddyfone, parents do not have to go to the trouble of speaking to their child; they just go to a website to see where he or she is, or ask for a map showing that information to be sent to their mobile phone.

There are lots of other examples. The i-Kids phone even lets parents listen to their child's conversation, which is not a very good recipe for relationships with their teenager or for harmonious family life. That phone runs on satellite-based technology: the global positioning system. It is great to have satellite navigation in one's car to find a route, or so that one can be found by the emergency services in the event of an accident, but it is dangerous if, say, a violent man were to post a device to his estranged partner in a refuge with an anonymous post office box number in order to track her down, and that is very easy to do.

Getting back to child protection, in theory the child must consent to his phone being tracked in the first place, but is there not something a bit odd about the idea of a four year-old, part of Teddyfone's target market, being able to give and maintain consent? An oppressive parent could insist on the child giving consent, or a devious paedophile skilled at grooming could easily find a way around the necessity, for example, by registering the second phone to himself before handing it to the child or hiding it in his backpack. To extend that to adults, The Guardian journalist Ben Goldacre showed recently that someone needs possession of another person's mobile phone for only a couple of minutes to appear to give the consent required under mobile phone companies' current procedures. The person he was tracking never got any of the warning messages that were meant to have been sent to her. Even more scarily, a hacker's website has recently published information telling how to spoof consent without even having to have temporary possession of the target's phone; all that is needed is the number. If someone has a person's number, he can track them. It is not a problem. I know where the website is, but I am not going to tell Members. It is possible to track people just through their phone numbers.

[Judy Mallaber]

There are other devices. Pupillo can listen and can watch as well, even in the dark. It was brought out recently and sees in the dark for anyone who has the number to dial. It may be ideal for a baby monitor, but what else will it be used for? That is a serious question.

There are meant to be controls over location services. The Home Office, the police and children's charities negotiated with the UK's six largest networks and agreed a voluntary code of practice governing the deployment of child location services and location services generally. The code is meant to cover the identity of the person doing the tracking, his relationship with the person being tracked, getting consent and giving warnings, but in practice, as journalists have found, the voluntary code can only too easily be evaded—if it is applied in the first place or if people knew that it is meant to be applied. Furthermore, it does not apply to new tracking devices using the GPS system or new technologies that bypass mobile phone networks. They are being sold without any code of practice governing their deployment. That needs to be checked and followed up.

Appeals to the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry to get involved have so far drawn a blank. In one case, the DTI gave financial assistance to a company that was developing a child tracking product. When asked whether it had considered possible criminal or other misuses of such technology, the DTI answered that such questions were not part of its business. Indeed, it gave the firm in question a prize for innovation. When DTI officials were asked whether they should have consulted child protection specialists, they said, "No."

I hesitate before calling for yet another national debate, but someone somewhere needs to take responsibility for the situation before it gets out of hand. The DTI and the Home Office have done excellent work on other child protection and technology issues; now they need to tackle the problem I have set out. The internet was kicking around for 20 years or more without anyone taking much notice—it was just the plaything of a few boffins—but once it started to penetrate the mass market, we realised that it raised many social and political issues. It is a great force for good, but it also allows trade in child pornography, the movement of criminal funds and other dangers.

Let us talk now about the implications of this latest surveillance technology for family life, children's safety and society as a whole. A child location service can give parents peace of mind, but what peace of mind will they have if such services remain unregulated and open to any stranger to misuse? That stranger may be one of those people who are so clever at grooming a child.

The issue is not just about child protection. We are sleep-walking into a world where jealous partners or obsessed stalkers could spy on us simply by obtaining our phone number. We must act now before that new surveillance industry gets out of hand. We must establish controls and a licensing regime fast.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Judy Mallaber, Kali Mountford, Annette Brooke, Margaret Moran, Derek Wyatt, Mrs. Betty Williams, Paddy Tipping, Dr. Howard Stoate, Mr. Ian Taylor, Siobhain McDonagh, Roger Berry and Mary Creagh.

Licensing of Child Location Services

Judy Mallaber accordingly presented a Bill to establish a licensing regime for the sale or promotion of any service providing data on the location of children where these data have been derived from any mobile telephone network, satellite system or other electronic or communications medium: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 144].

Animal Welfare Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

5.27 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I beg to move,

That the Order of 10th January 2006 (Animal Welfare Bill (Programme)) be varied as follows:

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table.

3. The proceedings shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the times specified in the second column of the Table.

TABLE

| Proceedings | Time for conclusion of proceedings |
|---|---|
| New Clause relating to the docking of dogs' tails. | Two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order. |
| Remaining proceedings on consideration. | Five hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order. |

4. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion six hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.

The change in the programme motion is intended to ensure that there is a clear opportunity to discuss all aspects of the Bill, which is particularly important when there is a need to debate fully a controversial issue. We will have free votes, which have been facilitated by Government amendments, as well as a wide range of other proposed amendments. We should remember that the Bill has already been well debated at eight Committee sittings and during pre-legislative scrutiny.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Animal Welfare Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 8

DOCKING OF DOGS' TAILS

'(1) A person commits an offence if—

(a) he removes the whole or any part of a dog's tail, otherwise than for the purpose of its medical treatment;

(b) he causes the whole or any part of a dog's tail to be removed by another person, otherwise than for the purpose of its medical treatment.

(2) A person commits an offence if—

(a) he is responsible for a dog,

(b) another person removes the whole or any part of the dog's tail, otherwise than for the purpose of its medical treatment, and

(c) he permitted that to happen or failed to take such steps (whether by way of supervising the other person or otherwise) as were reasonable in all the circumstances to prevent that happening.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply if the dog is a certified working dog that is not more than 5 days old.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3), a dog is a certified working dog if a veterinary surgeon has certified that the dog is likely to be used for work in connection with—

(a) law enforcement,

(b) activities of Her Majesty's armed forces,

(c) emergency rescue,

(d) lawful pest control, or

(e) the lawful shooting of animals.

(5) It is a defence for a person accused of an offence under subsection (1) or (2) to show that he reasonably believed that the dog was one in relation to which subsection (3) applies.

(6) A person commits an offence if—

(a) he owns a subsection (3) dog, and

(b) fails to take reasonable steps to secure that, before the dog is 3 months old, it is identified as a subsection (3) dog in accordance with regulations made under this section.

(7) A person commits an offence if—

(a) he shows a dog at an event to which members of the public are admitted on payment of a fee,

(b) the dog's tail has been wholly or partly removed (in England and Wales or elsewhere), and

(c) removal took place on or after the commencement day.

(8) Where a dog is shown only for the purpose of demonstrating its working ability, subsection (7) does not apply if the dog is a subsection (3) dog.

(9) It is a defence for a person accused of an offence under subsection (7) to show that he reasonably believed—

(a) that the event was not one to which members of the public were admitted on payment of an entrance fee,

(b) that the removal took place before the commencement day, or

(c) that the dog was one in relation to which subsection (8) applies.

(10) A person commits an offence if he knowingly gives false information to a veterinary surgeon in connection with the giving of a certificate for the purposes of this section.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

(11) The appropriate authority may by regulations—

(a) make provision about the giving by veterinary surgeons of certificates for the purposes of this section;

(b) make provision about the identification of dogs as subsection (3) dogs;

(c) make provision about the functions of inspectors in relation to certificates for the purposes of this section and the identification of dogs as subsection (3) dogs.

(12) Power to make regulations under subsection (11) includes power to make incidental, supplementary, consequential provision or transitional provision or savings.

(13) Before making regulations under subsection (11), the appropriate national authority shall consult such persons appearing to the authority to represent any interests concerned as the authority considers appropriate.

(14) In this section—

"commencement day" means the day on which this section comes into force;

"subsection (3) dog" means a dog whose tail has, on or after the commencement day, been wholly or partly removed without contravening subsection (1), because of the application of subsection (3).'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.28 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (a), in line 13, leave out subsections (3) to (6).

Amendment (b), in line 36, leave out subsection (8).

Amendment (d), in line 41, at end insert ', or'.

Amendment (c), in line 42, leave out from 'day' to end of line 43.

Amendment (e), in line 44, leave out subsections (10) to (13).

Amendment (f), in line 63, leave out from beginning to end of line 66.

Amendment No. 4, in page 3, line 21, clause 5, after 'apply', insert—

'(a) to the docking of the tail of a working gundog; or

(b) '.

Government amendment No. 38

Amendment No. 5, in page 3, line 25, at end insert—

'(6) In subsection (4), "docking of the tail of a dog" means the deliberate removal of any part of a tail of a dog if the removal is carried out—

(a) by a veterinary surgeon; and

(b) on a dog which is less than 10 days old.'.

Government amendments Nos. 39 to 60.

Mr. Bradshaw: The purpose of the first part of our deliberations this afternoon is to facilitate a debate and then, if the House desires, votes on the docking of dogs' tails. When we published the Bill, the Government said that we would not seek to be a persuader on such a contentious issue, where views on both sides are strongly held and the evidence disputed. We said that we would listen to Members' views.

In Committee, the majority of Members who spoke advocated a total ban on the docking of dogs' tails. Some Members said that they would prefer an exemption for working dogs and no Member who spoke supported the status quo of allowing cosmetic docking. However, all members of the Committee, whatever their views, said that they felt that the issue should be opened up more widely to all Members. That is what we are doing now.

We are offering the House three options—first, a ban on tail docking, but with an exemption for working dogs; secondly, a ban with no exemption for working dogs; and thirdly, the status quo, which allows cosmetic docking. Of course, it will remain possible under all those options for a vet to dock a dog's tail if that is necessary for medical reasons—for example, because the tail is damaged or has become diseased.

Members who wish to support option one—a ban, with an exemption for working dogs—should vote for new clause 8, which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and against amendments (a) to (f), which stand in my name. Members who want a total ban should vote for the new clause and those amendments. Members who wish to retain the status quo should vote against the new clause.

I wish to make it clear that I support an exemption for working dogs. I appreciate that that puts me in the somewhat unusual position of not voting for my own amendments. Amendments (a) to (f), which stand in my name, are intended to facilitate the deliberations of the House.

I do not intend to repeat the long arguments that were aired in Committee, so that as many Members as possible can contribute to the debate. No doubt, Members will have been lobbied both for and against a working dogs exemption. However, to help the debate, I wish to say something about how the new clause banning docking, with a working dogs exemption, would work.

One of the main concerns expressed in Committee by those hon. Members whose minds were not already made up was that any exemption for working dogs should be workable and enforceable. The Government agreed, and we have endeavoured to achieve that in the new clause. Under the new clause, only a vet could preventively dock a dog's tail provided that, first, the dog is no more than five days old, and secondly, the vet has been shown specific evidence that the dog is likely to be used for work in connection with law enforcement, the armed forces, emergency rescue, pest control or the lawful shooting of animals.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am sorry to interrupt so early in my hon. Friend's explanation. However, the law is very clear that tail docking should be carried out only by a qualified veterinary surgeon, but the number of surgeons willing to do that operation and the number of dogs whose tails are docked do not correspond. Quite simply, the law is not being enforced at the moment. That is the problem. Why is the law more likely to be enforced if we agree to the exemption compared with current practice, where the law is an ass?

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall come to some of the extra safeguards that we have put into the new clause in a minute, but there would be a fairly significant reduction in the overall number of dogs that could be docked legally, to about 20 per cent. of the current number. That is our estimate of the number of dogs docked currently that then go on to be worked.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, of course. I am about to explain some of the safeguards in a little more detail, but I am happy to take another intervention.

Richard Ottaway: New clause 8, on my reading of it, relates to dogs. What is the position for other animals—cats and, particularly, sheep, most of which are already docked?

Mr. Bradshaw: That is all in the Bill. There is a general prohibition on mutilation, with exemptions that will be set out in regulations. Those exemptions will not change the status quo—for example, for animals whose tails are legally docked currently—because the Government's original intention was to deal with the issue by regulation. However, feelings were so strong among hon. Members on both sides of the argument on Second Reading and in Committee that it was thought more appropriate for the issue to be settled once and for all in the Bill, rather than leaving it for future Governments to settle by regulation, which would not allow the same parliamentary scrutiny and debate.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): For the benefit of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members, will the Minister confirm that if new clause 8 and the relevant amendment are both rejected, there will not be a change to the Bill, and he will undertake to introduce a total exemption for tail docking of dogs in the regulatory process?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes.

The vet would issue the owner with a certificate showing that the dog had been docked legitimately and detailing the evidence that they had seen. The puppy must be microchipped before it is three months old and the microchip number added to the certificate. The effectiveness of the new clause hangs on the definition of a dog that is "likely" to work. The Government have sought to define that tightly, but we also propose to introduce a delegated power to allow the appropriate national authority to tighten it further as necessary. I will explain to the House how we would use the power initially if the new clause is passed unamended. Through regulations, we would prescribe a template certificate that a vet must use for each dog that they dock and which would record the details of the vet, the owner, the date of docking and the microchip number. The vet and the owner would sign it—the owner to confirm that they had not provided false information. Providing false information would be an offence carrying a penalty of up to 51 weeks in prison, or a level 4 fine—currently £2,500—or both. The regulations would specify, too, the evidence that the vet must be shown before they could certify that a dog was likely to work. For law enforcers, for example, that could be a police identification badge and evidence from the head of a police force's breeding programme that the dog was intended to be worked.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): One could drive a coach and horses through the regulations on law enforcement by taking a four-year-old dog to the vet and saying, "I'm going to use this dog to protect my scrapyard. Keeping trespassers out is law enforcement, so can you dock its tail?" Because proposed subsection (4) of the new clause does not say that the dog must be used predominantly as a guard dog, after the scrapyard owner has used the dog for two days he can sell it to a man in a pub as a docked dog and escape scot-free.

Mr. Bradshaw: There would not be any circumstances under which a four-year-old could have its tail docked. [Interruption.] Perhaps my hon. Friend meant four days.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I am glad that the Minister has abandoned his self-denying ordinance, because I did not have the privilege of serving on the Committee and thus did not hear his mellifluous tones, but I am more than happy to do so this afternoon. Great man though he is, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) has an insatiably suspicious disposition, and I am not sure that his suspicion is justified. Will the Minister clarify the regulation-making process? Why cannot we see—or perhaps we can—draft regulations before the final passage of the Bill, as that always makes me much more sanguine than knowing that they will be published at a later, unspecified date?

Mr. Bradshaw: I do not rule that out, because the Bill still has to proceed to another place. If it will reassure the hon. Gentleman, I am certainly prepared to consider that suggestion with officials to see if we can do so when the Bill returns to the House. Briefly, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), I accept that there are Members on both sides of the House who will not vote for the exemption because they do not think that it is drawn tightly enough or is enforceable. I take a different view and I urge them to listen patiently to the extra safeguards that we have included. If that does not change their minds, the way in which they cast their vote is their prerogative—we are offering a free vote, as is every party in the House.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): Would I be prosecuted if I went to a rescue centre and bought a dog with a docked tail that was born after the commencement of the measure?

Mr. Bradshaw: Not,if the tail had been docked legally. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman would not be responsible, as the offence was committed by the person who docked the tail illegally, or perhaps by the vet who allowed it to be done illegally.

[Mr. Bradshaw]

As I was saying, the vet would issue the owner with a certificate showing that the dog had been docked legitimately and detailing the evidence that the vet had seen. The pup must be microchipped before it is three months old and the microchip number added to the certificate. The new clause includes provisions to drive down the demand for cosmetically docked dogs, which is extremely important for Members who are considering voting for the exemption, but would like more reassurance that it will bite—excuse the pun. Experience from Sweden and Germany—countries with a complete ban and an exemption for working dogs, respectively—suggests that not restricting the showing of docked dogs results in continuing demand for them and incentives to find ways around a ban, including importing. Therefore, the Government propose restricting the showing of legally docked dogs to demonstrations of their working ability. That is not because of any distaste for showing, but to support the aim that only dogs intended for working are docked. That would ensure that the number of dogs docked would be kept to a minimum.

Amendments (a) to (f), tabled in my name, would remove the exemption from working dogs currently set out in the new clause. The amendments also remove the exemption that allows certified docked dogs to be shown to demonstrate their working ability. Under the amendments, no dog docked after the provision is enacted could be shown.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): My question relates to the Minister's earlier point. I believe that in many cases people cannot decide for some time—certainly not by the five-day stage—whether a dog is suitable as a working dog, so is the intention to give people latitude to have several puppies to choose from for their working purpose, or would the exemption be narrow and possibly lead to problems?

Mr. Bradshaw: In the end, we will have to leave it to the courts to decide whether the intention at the time was for the dogs to be worked. The right hon. Gentleman is right—it is not always possible to know for certain at the time of the docking that the dog will definitely be worked, even though the likelihood exists and can be certified by a vet who sees the dam. That is why some of my hon. Friends and some Opposition Members are concerned about an exemption. Nobody has proposed a tighter exemption because it is difficult to devise one. We have done our best to do so in order to facilitate a free vote.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I support the Government's new clause, but does the Minister accept the view that I take—that a blanket ban on docking is bad for animal welfare because some working dogs will necessarily suffer if they are not docked, yet are used in perfectly legal activities in the countryside? Would he, like me, counsel those who want a blanket ban to recognise that that will have the opposite effect in some cases, by increasing animal suffering rather than reducing it, as the Minister is attempting to do in a reasonable way in new clause 8?

Mr. Bradshaw: That was the point. The reason I am supporting the exemption is that I partly agree with the hon. Gentleman.

If the House chooses not to vote for the new clause, that will leave it open, as I reaffirmed to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) a moment ago, to the Government to make regulations exempting tail-docking from the general ban on mutilations prescribed in clause 5. The Government would subsequently be able to alter the law without recourse to primary legislation. Despite the strength of feeling on all sides, the House may still detect some virtue in this flexibility.

Amendments Nos. 4 and 5 tabled by the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) would introduce an exemption for working dogs from the ban on mutilations. However, there are problems with the drafting. Amendment No. 5 seeks to define a term that does not appear in amendment No. 4. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's new clause is a more appropriate way to achieve a ban on docking, with a working dog exemption. I hope that on this basis he will not press his amendments.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I may be wrong, but I think that I heard my hon. Friend say that there was an exemption for working dogs in Sweden. My understanding is that that is not the case. Does he intend to name the breeds to which the exemptions will apply?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I will not name the breeds now. That will be subject to regulation, but the breeds will be named. That will be part of the template document for the vet, and they would be tightly drawn. My hon. Friend misheard what I said about Germany and Sweden. Sweden has a total ban. Germany has a ban with an exemption for working dogs, but in both countries Governments and animal welfare organisations argue that the much more important aspect is the ban on showing. That is what we are including in the exemption. The ban on showing acts as the biggest disincentive to illegal docking or the import of docked breeds.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Before the Minister moves on from specific breeds, will he confirm that it is possible for cross breeds to make excellent working dogs?

5.45 pm

Mr. Bradshaw: I will give hon. Members a further insight into the breeds that we would consider if the new clause were passed without amendment. The exemption for working dogs would include spaniels, hunt point retrieve breeds, working terriers and crosses involving one or more of those types.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend clarify the evidence on which he has formulated the proposed exemption? What is the potential damage to working dogs if docking is forbidden? [Interruption.]

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment says from a sedentary position that the matter is disputed. He takes a different view from me, and I suspect that we will be in different Lobbies later this evening. Not only the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, but the police have produced evidence on that point in the past few days. The police have provided compelling evidence on the number of dogs that they use in important security operations that have had to have their tails docked later in life because of injuries that they have sustained in the course of their work.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The Minister has made my point for me. Working dogs are used for far more than shooting, and there are police, rescue and customs dogs. The police are the only body that has provided any real evidence, and they have come out very strongly in favour of an exemption for their working dogs.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend may have received a letter from Assistant Chief Constable Peter Vaughan, who is the Association of Chief Police Officers working dogs representative. Peter Vaughan has worked in the field for many years, and he has appealed to the House to support new clause 8, because it is common for working dogs to sustain serious injuries that require surgery if their tails are not docked.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con) rose—

Mr. Bradshaw: I give way to the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone).

Mr. Hollobone: Has the Minister considered the case of the old English sheepdog, which used to be a working dog? Many old English sheepdog owners prefer to dock their dogs for reasons of hygiene. Has he dismissed heavy-coated breeds, which are at risk of perennial fouling and which will be caught by the new legislation?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes. The new clause does not include such breeds. The best answer to that problem is to clean the dog.

Mr. Love: I thank my hon. Friend for eventually giving way. I am a complete novice in this matter and want to focus on certification, about which the veterinary profession has some concerns. Will he detail how we can be certain that dogs as young as four or five days will be working dogs?

Mr. Bradshaw: As I have said, there is no such thing as absolute certainty, which is why I am sure that some hon. Members will not be satisfied even by the tightly drawn exemption that we have devised. Given the extra safeguards that we have introduced—the provisions on showing are unprecedented in animal welfare legislation—we will achieve a lot more than countries such as Sweden, which has a total ban.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): Does the Minister recognise the difference between carefully formulated scientific evidence and the experience of police officers, which is valid but anecdotal? Will he explain why he thinks that the veterinary associations that support a ban on docking working dogs take a different view from the police? Does he believe that it is right, at least in the first instance, to trust the view of medical and scientific experts, rather than the anecdotal experience of people who currently work with working dogs?

Mr. Bradshaw: It has long been the view of the majority of the council of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons to oppose all tail docking, but, at the same time, there have been vets who have been prepared to carry it out. It is important that hon. Members listen to the views of people from all organisations—be they vets, police or people who have intimate working knowledge of dogs—and make up their own minds. I am not trying to persuade the hon. Gentleman of my view; I am simply trying to give him and other hon. Members options so that they can reach a view and express it in the way that they vote this evening.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): I was interested in what my hon. Friend said about the police. I understand that the police have something like 2,000 or 2,500 working dogs. Will he tell the House what percentage of those working dogs sustained an injury so severe that it necessitated amputation of their tail?

Mr. Bradshaw: It may help if I quote from the letter dated 9 March that I received from Assistant Chief Constable Peter Vaughan, who said:

> "Twenty working dogs have had to have their tails docked as a result of injury in the last two years."

He goes on to say:

> "Experience over many years of working with police dogs has shown us that certain dog types, performing certain roles; usually a search function where dogs are often required to work in difficult terrain and confined spaces are susceptible to causing injury to their tails. Any docking of new puppies is restricted to such dog types and conducted in order to minimise the risk of such injury, which can be particularly distressing and require a protracted period of recuperation."

I cannot do any more than quote from a third party.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If we are talking about scientific evidence, surely the Minister should tell the House what proportion of working dogs, or indeed police dogs, that represented. The control would be the proportion of tail docking that took place in the non-working dog population, among breeds that tend to have their tails docked, although that has been shaped by fashion. Tail docking used to be a tax avoidance device. In the 18th century, it was introduced to avoid the tax that had been imposed on certain types of working dog.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend will have to forgive me, but I do not know what proportion of working dogs Assistant Chief Constable Vaughan is talking about. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend was in the Chamber a little earlier when I gave the overall figures, but I repeat that, even with the exemption, at least 80 per cent. of current dockings would be illegal. The cosmetic dockings that I think most hon. Members want to consign to the history books would not happen.

Mr. Paice: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: I will give way a final time, because this is turning into a debate.

Mr. Paice: Forgive me, but I think that this is a debate. However, I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. Will he confirm my impression from the figures in the letter from the police that it would be a mistake to compare the 20 working police dogs that have had to have therapeutic docking in the past two years with the total number of 2,500? The vast majority of the 2,500 working police dogs will not be of a type that works in confined spaces. They will be Alsatians and Labradors that are used for other purposes. A much smaller proportion—spaniels, predominantly—would be used in those circumstances and so might be at risk. It is not a direct comparison to talk about 20 out of 2,500.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point. I hope that he will forgive me—I was not trying to say that we are not having a debate. There have been a series of interventions. There are hon. Members who have come here to make a considered contribution and I want to allow them time to do that.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: This really is the final time that I will give way and then I will conclude.

Mr. McGovern: I understand that a ban already exists in Scotland. If the same does not apply in England, it will lead to tail-docking tourism, whereby Scottish people bring their dogs down to Carlisle, get their tails docked and then go back up to Scotland with them. Is that a scenario that the Minister has considered?

Mr. Bradshaw: The Scots have not yet legislated on the matter, but, in theory, my hon. Friend is right and that would be one of the consequences of the devolution that I imagine he and the rest of us supported.

In conclusion, the House has three options. Those who favour the status quo and the flexibility afforded by the delegated power in clause 5 should oppose the Second Reading of the new clause. Those who want a ban on cosmetic docking, but with an exemption for working dogs, should vote for the new clause tabled in the name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. If the new clause is given a Second Reading by the House, those who wish to go further and ban all tail docking should vote for the amendments that stand in my name. However, those who are persuaded by the arguments in favour of a working dog exemption should vote against those amendments.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): First, let me welcome the attack of common sense that the Government seem to have had since the Bill was in Committee. Perhaps it was a rush of blood to the Minister's head that caused him to abandon the status quo, for which he had the blessing of the Secretary of State, take the temperature of the Committee and conclude that a total ban on docking was needed. I welcome the change that has happened since.

We all agree that what is needed is a cool head and a measured approach. At all stages, we must bear in mind that any sort of docking is illegal unless it is carried out by a qualified vet. The next step is to decide whether the procedure is necessary and whether it hurts. The evidence is overabundant, because everyone has an opinion. I am sure that it probably can hurt, but usually does not and that it is sometimes necessary, but it is not a feature that I personally find attractive in a dog. I am left to make a decision based on the overwhelming area of agreement, which is that the vet who performs the operation must do it properly and legally. If that is the case, I can see no reason why people who are so committed to animal welfare that they take six years to qualify, and end up with enormous student debts, should not be more than able to decide whether they feel comfortable with the operation, and why that should not be enough. That is satisfactory. There is no need for a ban.

Mr. Drew: That is the crux of the problem. Tail docking is not taught in veterinary schools any more, and the vast majority of vets do not want to do it. Those who do it are an ageing part of the profession. Surely it is almost inevitable that tail docking will die out. It is just that the law will follow that. Is that not a problem?

Bill Wiggin: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing that that is the nub of the problem. If he is right and tail docking dies out—personally, as I said earlier, I do not favour the look of a docked tail—that is how I would prefer things to proceed. Docking would die out because people did not want to do it, rather than because we legislated for that in the Bill.

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Is it not the case that a great many veterinary surgeons today specialise purely in companion animals and small animal care, and that there are fewer vets who serve rural areas, including farm practices, and cover the sort of working dogs that we are talking about? That is why the views of the professional bodies are not necessarily representative of the minority who are specialists in rural areas.

Bill Wiggin: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, and is absolutely right. We should not make decisions based on the number of vets available to carry out the procedure. People who own dogs have to deal with the issue for themselves. I do not like bans and I do not think that there is a need for a ban. Bans are bad for everybody. They lead to illegal activity, and when all is said and done, my suspicion is that people who prefer docked breeds will selectively breed bob-tailed dogs, which will make the enforcement of the law on tail docking extremely difficult.

I have seen the campaigns showing dead puppies, and I think that they are revolting. One says:

"Robbed of their tails. Robbed of their lives."

That campaigning is unhelpful. It is based on illegal docking, which will remain illegal whatever we choose to do today, and on spin rather than fact. It does not do the issue any favours.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): My hon. Friend is speaking with a great deal of knowledge and a lot of experience, and most eloquently. I share his view about the photographs. Most of them were of illegal tail dockings, yet they purported to show what was happening across the board legitimately and normally. Many people would have presumed that those dockings had been carried out by vets.

Bill Wiggin: I urge my hon. Friend not to be too modest with his praise for me; I am most grateful for it. What he says is right—and I have had some fairly unpleasant criticism from the Council of Docked Breeds, which actually agrees with me on this matter. The subject is emotive, and we should allow dog owners to make up their minds themselves.

6 pm

There is a temptation to vote in favour of new clause 8 because it contains an exemption for working dogs. The exemption is prudent and sensible, but I will be forced to vote against the measure because I prefer the status quo. I have changed my position slightly since the Committee stage. I have been persuaded by the volume of bureaucracy, paperwork and certificates—and sheer difficulty—that the measure would introduce.

Owners should decide which dogs need to be docked. There is a compelling argument for pre-prophylactic docking based on evidence that damage will be done later in life. The comments of the security services are also most helpful. As the Minister said, show standards are the area on which progress could be made. For example, a non-docked dog should be at no disadvantage compared with a docked dog unless the tail has a fault. There is an incentive for show dogs to be docked if there is a fault with the tail, so the anti-docking campaign should focus its attention on that.

There will be an entirely free vote on both sides of the House. Paragraph 15 of the Bill's regulatory impact assessment, which was signed by the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), states that the Government's preference is "that there should continue to be freedom of choice."

Reluctantly, I will not support new clause 8, on the basis that I do not like banning things, paperwork or bureaucracy. I do not like cosmetic docking either, but we should make the matter a free choice for all dog owners, rather than using the Bill to determine what should happen.

Shona McIsaac: I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate. I will focus on the reasons why I believe that the only workable and practical way forward is to have a complete prohibition on tail docking with no exemptions for so-called working dogs.

As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said earlier, it is important to understand the history of tail docking and the reason why it became a common practice for certain breeds in this country. He rightly said that a tax was levied on the owners of working dogs. Farmers, drovers and other owners of working dogs began to dock, or shorten, their dogs' tails so that they could avoid the tax. The tax was repealed in 1796, but people who were worried that it might be reintroduced continued the practice of tail docking. Prior to the tax, working dogs were not docked. The practice dated only from when the tax was brought in.

It is important to appreciate what tail docking actually is. The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons describes the practice as a mutilation, and defines a mutilation as

"all procedures carried out with or without instruments which involve interference with sensitive tissues or the bone structures of an animal and are carried out for non-therapeutic reasons."

It is right and appropriate to describe docking as a mutilation.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con) rose—

Angela Browning rose—

Shona McIsaac: I am happy to take interventions, but I would appreciate it if I could make a wee bit of progress first.

The process of docking involves cutting through—often by tying—bones, cartilage, muscle and nerves. It is done without anaesthetic on puppies under a week old and no analgesic relief is given after the procedure has been carried out. There is no justification for allowing the practice to continue.

People who support the exemptions for working dogs argue that because puppies are neonatal they do not feel any pain, but that is completely untrue. Scientific evidence demonstrates that the nervous system of neonatal puppies allows them to experience pain; they just experience it slightly more slowly than adult dogs. It would not be appropriate for hon. Members to argue that puppies do not feel pain, because they certainly do.

Angela Browning: I have been persuaded by the Minister on new clause 8. When considering the surgical procedure for tail docking, has the hon. Lady thought about other procedures in which the veterinary profession is involved? For example, I was present with a vet while a horse was being castrated and the procedure was pretty barbaric. Is she suggesting that there should be no more castration of stallions?

Shona McIsaac: I must admit that when I was preparing the notes for my speech, my mind had not actually wandered on to the subject of the castration of horses. The Bill allows such practices to continue. The practice would not be regarded as a mutilation under the veterinary profession's definition, even though the hon. Lady regards it as quite barbaric.

Lembit Öpik: I was going to make a rather similar point to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning). The vets' definition of mutilation that the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) cited mentioned an attack on sensitive tissues for non-therapeutic purposes. Neutering a dog would fulfil the definition because that is obviously done for non-therapeutic purposes. If she is using the definition as a justification for opposing tail docking, she must, logically speaking, either support an outright ban on the neutering of dogs, or explain why she has different definitions for the two mutilations.

Shona McIsaac: The definition of a mutilation is not mine. I cited it because it is the veterinary profession's description of the practice of tail docking. As I said earlier, neutering is not covered by the Bill, as we determined in Committee, so the procedure may continue after the Bill has been passed.

[Shona McIsaac]

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): I share the distaste for docking and regard it as a mutilation. I had intended to vote for a complete ban until I had an encounter in the Chamber a few hours ago with a docked springer spaniel. When I commented to the dog handler that docking might not be permitted in the future, the handler told me that that beautiful dog had had a full tail, but the tail had had to be docked because while doing its work looking after us in the Chamber, it had undergone serious injury from knocking its tail against the edges of the wooden seats and the Table. Can my hon. Friend convince me that that is only an isolated case? Given the safeguards that the Government intend to put in place, I am inclined to vote for new clause 8, but I put on record the fact that I want to see what the regulations are, so if the matter comes back to the House, I might well change my mind again.

Shona McIsaac: As I continue with my arguments, I hope that my hon. Friend will find that there are compelling reasons why we should vote for a full ban. I will come on to the point about injuries later, so I hope that she will stay in the Chamber to listen to that part of my speech.

Richard Ottaway: The hon. Lady may not have had horse castration in mind when she came to the Chamber, but has she considered the parallels with human circumcision, which, as she will know, is discretionary? Has she considered the fact that if she is successful, animals will have more protection against mutilation than humans?

Shona McIsaac: I did think about the issue of circumcision, because I received what I can only describe as racist and abusive letters from people who wrote to me about my stance on tail docking, having assumed on the basis of my surname that I was Jewish. The hon. Gentleman cannot draw that analogy, because the Bill excludes humans. An amendment that the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) tabled in Committee would have included humans, as well as all crustaceans.

Bill Wiggin: I was just sitting here quietly minding my own business—but the hon. Lady's point about crustaceans and cephalopods is valid. If she thinks that pain is the key to her decision, those creatures should be covered by the Bill.

Shona McIsaac: I did have sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman said about cephalopods, but I thought that including them in the Bill would be going too far. However, I do not want to go too far down that road, as we are talking about tail docking.

We have heard about the position of the Association of Chief Police Officers. I want to put on the record the names of the organisations that are supporting a total ban on tail docking. First, we have the Anti-Docking Alliance; it might be said that one would expect that of it Then we have the Blue Cross, the British Small Animal Veterinary Association, the British Veterinary Association, the Dogs Trust, the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals, the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, the RSPCA, Vets Against Docking, and Wood Green animal shelters. That is a substantial list of people who have to care for animals, and about the welfare of animals, and feel that the time has come to end docking dogs' tails just in case of injury.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it seems a little strange to use the ACPO evidence, or so-called evidence, to support the amendment, given that the police could dock their dogs at the moment but are not doing so?

Shona McIsaac: Yes. The ACPO material is anecdotal—it is not based on scientific fact and has not been peer reviewed. In fact, most people who want exemptions admit that the supporting evidence is anecdotal.

I want to explain why new clause 8 will not work in practice. The exemption is for working dogs. Before Members vote, they should ask themselves this question: as tail docking is carried out on a neonatal puppy under a week old, how can one tell whether it will be suitable for training as a working dog? I would argue that one cannot tell with any certainty whether any dog will become a working dog. If one has a litter of eight springer spaniels, it is likely that the majority will not be working dogs but kept as pets.

Mr. Bellingham: I should declare an interest. My family have kept springer and cocker spaniels over the years, some of which have had puppies. If one is selling a puppy for quite a lot of money, it will be bought at the higher rate only by someone who is going to use it as a working dog. If one breeds a dog to a very high standard, there is probably a 95 per cent. chance that the entire litter will go into a working role.

6.15 pm

Shona McIsaac: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment, but I still do not believe that it answers the question of how one can tell with certainty whether any puppy will be suitable for training as a working dog.

Sweden has a ban on tail docking that it has not reversed since it was introduced. In fact, no country that has introduced such a ban has reversed it having monitored the effects. It has been argued that a study in Sweden demonstrated that injuries went up as a result, but that was not a scientific study. Again, it was anecdotal—and it was a survey by a breeders' group that wanted the ban reversed. The scientific evidence shows that there are injuries to the tails of working dogs, but after any prohibition on tail docking the level of injuries experienced reaches that experienced in the dog population in general. Among any group of dogs, the probability of a non-working dog injuring its tail is similar to that of an undocked working dog doing so. Some Members are shaking their heads; clearly, they do not understand probability.

My main worry about the exemption provision is that it asks vets to certify that a dog is likely to be a working dog. As I said, it is not possible to tell. I, and other members of the Standing Committee, received a letter from the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, the governing body of the veterinary profession, citing the three options mentioned by my hon. Friend the Minister:

"the status quo . . . a ban on docking but with an exemption for certain working dogs; and an outright prohibition on docking otherwise than for the purpose of medical treatment."

It says that it

"recommends the third option: a ban on the docking of dogs' tails except when the operation is carried out for therapeutic purposes."

It goes on to say:

"We have particular concern with subsection (4) of the new clause. This provides for a veterinary surgeon to certify that a puppy is likely to be used as a working dog. In the College's view it would not be appropriate for a veterinary surgeon to offer such an opinion. Veterinary surgeons are trained to diagnose and treat animals, and their expertise does not extend to assessing the intentions of the current or a future owner of a newborn puppy. It is in any case not possible at that stage to judge whether a particular puppy in a litter will prove suitable for training as a working dog."

That is the stated position of the veterinary profession in this country, and it renders the new clause unworkable. If we claim that the veterinary profession must certify, but it says that it is inappropriate for it to do that, that is a serious problem.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): The hon. Lady is worried about tail docking not having any purpose because it falls within the remit of normal injuries. Has she considered dew claws, which are often a problem on working dogs and are sometimes removed for cosmetic reasons?

Shona McIsaac: Yes, but the debate is about tail docking. The hon. Lady did not serve on the Committee, and those who did realise that I have a propensity to talk at length on such subjects—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Members agree with that. I am therefore trying to restrict myself to tail docking, much as I would like to discuss dew claws, too. I shall refrain, despite the hon. Lady's intervention.

Mr. Martlew: Our objection to the new clause is that it will be abused. No dog nowadays should have its tail docked, because since 1993 it has been illegal for anyone but a vet to do that, and the veterinary associations have been against it. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the discussions on the Hunting Act 2004. My good and hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) and I stood shoulder to shoulder on that but we probably provided too many exemptions, and people have abused the Act. Time and again, police forces tell us that they cannot police it. What chance do we have of policing the Under-Secretary's amendments?

Shona McIsaac: I agree. The exemptions would create a massive loophole, which the unscrupulous will abuse. The pain and suffering that the Bill is intended to prevent will thus be perpetuated. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said earlier that the number of tail dockings carried out in this country could not physically be done by the number of vets who are willing to undertake them. It is being done illegally, and that is a serious problem, which the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons has identified. Given the nature of some of the people with whom we are dealing, they will exploit any loophole and thus perpetuate pain and suffering.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend cited the letter from the president of the RCVS, so it is only fair to say that my officials have worked closely with RCVS officials in drawing up the exemption and the regulation that would implement it. They accept that the way in which we are constructing the regulation would remove the problem that my hon. Friend envisages, because a vet would simply have to certify that the relevant paperwork was present and the type of dog was within the law.

Shona McIsaac: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention but I do not know when he last discussed the matter with the RCVS. It has changed its view, and that is important. Recently—only days ago—its council took a vote to change its position to support an end to prophylactic docking and to say that it was time for a total ban. I received the letter that I read out only a couple of days ago. The position has changed, and I fear that my hon. Friend may be referring to the royal college's position before it changed its policy.

My next point relates to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) about illegality. Vets are not taught how to dock in college nowadays. The Vets Against Docking website reveals that the vast majority of vets refuse to do it and are against docking dogs' tails. The exemptions therefore cause a serious problem and place the veterinary profession in a difficult position.

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend has been generous in giving way, but I am sure that she is conscious that many other hon. Members want to contribute to the debate. Will she confirm that the RCVS will tell its members that they should do whatever the law states? They may have professional views, but they must follow the law as defined by Parliament.

Shona McIsaac: Of course the royal college will follow the law, but it has pointed out to me and other Members of Parliament that it has serious anxieties about the law as it stands. When the law was changed in 1993, vets believed that it would end cosmetic docking. It is exceptional for the royal college, which took a step back from the issue for many years and left the choice up to individual vets, to change its position and state that it is time to end prophylactic docking and that it does not believe that it is appropriate for the profession to certify which dog will become a working dog. It has also stated that one cannot tell whether a puppy will become a working dog.

Mr. Bellingham: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Shona McIsaac: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. I know that other hon. Members want to speak—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I could have made a much shorter speech, but I wanted to be generous and give way. I shall not do so again, so that I can conclude my speech and let others take part in the debate.

[Shona McIsaac]

Abuse is currently happening. Puppies die and are injured through illegal docking. I therefore believe that a complete ban is the only way to clamp down on illegal docking. The exemptions will create loopholes, which will be exploited and perpetuate the pain and suffering that the Bill is meant to prevent.

I spoke to the RSPCA—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Some Opposition Members groan when I mention the RSPCA. If they tempt me, I could mention many other organisations. However, last year the RSPCA received 205 complaints about docking involving 835 dogs. This is a serious concern, and the Bill is meant to be about the protection of all animals. Unless someone can stand up today and explain how they can tell with absolute certainty whether a two-day-old puppy is going to become a working dog, there can be no excuse for carrying out this mutilation "just in case". The profession is against it, as are the majority of animal welfare organisations, and I urge all hon. Members to support the option for a total ban. We must not leave loopholes that can be exploited.

6.30 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I thank the Minister for the manner in which he has handled this controversial matter, both by enabling a decision to be taken on the Floor of the House—as is right—and through his novel exercise in democracy in Committee when he cajoled from each member of it their view on the matter. On that occasion, not one Member wanted to maintain the status quo of allowing cosmetic docking to continue. The hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) has now apparently decided that he does want it to continue, so I imagine that we will have a vote on that later. I confirm that the Liberal Democrats will have a free vote on this issue; I think that all three parties are in that position.

There needs to be a good reason to mutilate an animal. My hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) spoke earlier about the neutering of animals, but neutering is carried out for a purpose, and that purpose is not achieved unless that procedure is carried out. That is not necessarily the case with tail docking, because there is doubt as to whether it is necessary. We need to concentrate on that key point.

To be fair to the Minister and his colleagues, the new clause has been drafted quite tightly—that was his stated objective in Committee—and the number of loopholes has been reduced. The idea that it was possible to identify breeds that would never work has been dealt with, as has the idea that breeds could be docked allegedly for one purpose but then shown. The issue remains as to whether an assurance might be given that a dog would be used as a working dog when there was no intention to do so. Notwithstanding the purity of a vet's intentions in those circumstances, they might later be held to have been complicit in a dishonest act because they had given information that turned out to be inaccurate.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): What would be the motivation for someone who breeds dogs to dock their tails deliberately if there was no intention to use them as working dogs, given that it would then be illegal to use them as show dogs?

Norman Baker: I agree that there would be less motivation. If they were working dogs under the provisions of new clause 8, there would be no problem. If, however, the intention was to show them, there would be no point in docking their tails. Some people might have domestic reasons for wanting to dock their dog's tail; they might wish to have such a dog in their house. There are circumstances in which it would be to someone's advantage to mislead a vet in that way, although I accept that they would be fewer and more constrained than they are at present.

The issues are whether the mutilation of a dog at birth is justified, and, whether or not it is justified, whether the dog suffers as a consequence of the procedure. It is now for others to make their case, as I have had the opportunity to do so at some length in Committee. I would simply say that a dog is born with a tail, so presumably that tail has a purpose. If it did not, it would have been eliminated through genetic manipulation over many generations. Tails assist balance and agility, and they are used to communicate with other dogs. It is questionable, to say the least, whether it is advantageous to dogs to have them removed.

As to whether puppies feel pain, to be fair, the science is not clear on that; there is no clear evidence in that regard as to the consequences of the mutilation. The RCVS has stated:

"Tail docking in dogs is an unacceptable procedure when carried out for non-therapeutic reasons".

That is the firm view of the experts. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), I place more emphasis on what they say than I do on the anecdotal evidence of the police or of others who use dogs in their working capacity.

What are the downsides if tail docking is not performed on working dogs? It is up to those who advocate the mutilation of an animal to make the case that that mutilation is justified. It is not for those of us who believe that mutilation is wrong to make our case. An animal is born as it is born: a dog is born with a tail. Those who wish to remove their tails must justify that decision. I have not heard any such justification so far in the debate—to be fair to the Minister, he tried to be relatively neutral in his introduction—so I shall wait to hear from other hon. Members the justification that such actions are absolutely necessary.

I am happy to accept that some breeds are prone to tail damage if they work in thick cover or confined spaces. I am also happy to accept that, in some circumstances, tail damage in later life can lead to a dog suffering more severe pain, and that a general anaesthetic would be necessary to remove the tail at that time. One could also argue that working dogs were more susceptible to such injury than pet dogs. However, the scale of the incidence of such injury has not been teased out, even by those in favour of tail docking. The 20 examples given by the chief constable mentioned earlier is not a huge number. In any case, a tail—or part of a tail; let us not forget that option—can be amputated under general anaesthetic later in a dog's life if necessary.

Dr. Evan Harris: As my hon. Friend is standing down from his Front-Bench position, may I take this opportunity to pay tribute to his work on animal welfare? I am pleased to be able to agree with him on this issue; I do not agree with him on everything. The key point is that the onus must be placed on those who wish tail docking to continue to demonstrate their case. The safest option, given the scientific doubt that exists, is to introduce a ban and see whether there is an increase in the number of reports of tail damage in working dogs as a result. We could then review the position in five years' time. However, the default position should be to go along with the experts' opinion, to avoid taking a disproportionate approach to the issue.

Norman Baker: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In fact, he has stolen my conclusion from me. It is for those who wish to mutilate dogs to prove their case. I do not believe that the case is proven, or that mutilation is necessary, and I shall therefore vote in support of the new clause and of the amendment to it that has been sensibly tabled by the Under-Secretary.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am grateful to be able to speak in this debate and to be able to support my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary in his rather uncomfortable position of voting against his own amendments. Like him, I want a ban on cosmetic docking, but with an exemption for working dogs. There are many different, deeply held views in the Chamber on this matter.

I am relatively new to this issue, and I come to it with no preconceptions. I became involved in it when I was a member of the Select Committee that looked at the draft Animal Welfare Bill. I also had the opportunity to take part in the debate as a member of the Standing Committee. The report produced by the Select Committee was a good one; it was unanimous, and among its findings was the recommendation that

"tail docking in dogs should be banned for cosmetic reasons."

It also commented that allowing an exemption for working dogs was difficult in view of the practicalities involved, but concluded that the best way forward was to introduce an exemption, provided that the procedure was carried out by a vet. The vet should take the necessary steps to establish that the dog was to be a working dog, and should maintain records and microchip the dog with details of who had done the docking. The vet should also give the owner a certificate showing why the dog had been docked. I think those are good recommendations from the Select Committee; I have not changed my view on them at all.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): On that point, has my hon. Friend seen the letter from the RCVS? On whether a puppy is likely to be used as a working dog, it says:

"In the College's view it would not be appropriate for a veterinary surgeon to offer such an opinion. Veterinary surgeons are trained to diagnose and treat disease . . . and their expertise does not extend to assessing the intentions of the current or a future owner . . . . It is . . . not possible . . . to judge whether a particular puppy in a litter will prove suitable for training".

Paddy Tipping: Of course I have seen the RCVS letter and I have had discussions with the RCVS. I want to make the point—my hon. Friend was not in the Chamber—that the vets who work for the RCVS will do whatever Parliament decides. It is up to Parliament to decide on this issue, not the vets. Vets have a long training, and if that is too difficult an issue to discuss with an owner in relation to their intention—that is all vets are being asked to do and to certify best intent—I think vets are putting themselves down fairly badly.

I support the Select Committee report and I am delighted by the new clause, which takes all the points that the Select Committee has asked for and puts them down in detail. My hon. Friend the Minister has made the point that the strong aspect of the new clause is the unique proposal that will stop the showing of dogs that have been docked. That will stop the impetus towards docking dogs for cosmetic reasons.

The new clause has been carefully crafted, and I support it. It will do the things that I want to be done. I accept that this is a difficult area, but the Government and the parliamentary draftsmen have used their best endeavours—the new clause is perfectly clear. What is not clear is the scientific basis. Everyone who has spoken in the Chamber has acknowledged that. The only people to produce any reliable statistics are the police, and they have been accused of being anecdotal.

It is interesting to note that the police, Customs and search and rescue organisations, as well as those connected with shooting, all agree that there is a case for an exemption for working dogs. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) rightly said that this Chamber is searched each day by dogs that have been docked. It is important to see what evidence the police can produce. The Metropolitan police dog training school says very clearly that 10 dogs have had full amputations as a result of accidents at work.

Mr. Borrow: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a difference between tail docking and full tail amputation, and that those dogs that have their tails docked as puppies retain most of their tail? The advantage they get from having a tail in terms of wagging and balance is also largely retained. Those dogs that injure themselves and have the whole tail docked lose the whole of that advantage and are in a much worse position.

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), who is a good friend of mine and normally has similar views to mine, dismissed the notion of amputation by saying that only 20 dogs are involved, but it is important to those 20 dogs, as it is for working dogs. The Bill is about animal welfare. I want animal welfare for all animals. I want dogs that go out and work to be protected. That is what the new clause will do.

I want protection for working dogs and I want to listen to the voice of the rural community on this issue. I have met many dog owners who go out shooting whose dogs have been docked. Again, I have listened to the anecdotal evidence. I want to hear and respond to the voice of the organisations involved—the police, the rescue services and the shooting sector.

[Paddy Tipping]

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the new clause and I hope very much that Parliament will reflect on it and vote for it tonight.

6.45 pm

Mr. Atkinson: I will be brief—I know that many other hon. Members want to take part in this short debate—and I start by drawing the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests, which is relevant to the debate.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) made an extremely good case for the exemption for gun dogs. I think he is playing it wise in deciding how to vote on this. Sadly, I cannot agree with him, as I shall oppose the new clause and the Minister's amendments, which he does not agree with, because I believe that we should retain the status quo.

My particular reason for thinking that way is that I dislike bans. Parliament is increasingly getting into the habit of telling people what to do and not allowing individuals to make up their own mind on important issues. We did that with the Hunting Bill quite recently, and just the other day Parliament was telling pub owners, club owners and restaurateurs whether they would be allowed to have smokers or non-smokers in their establishments.

Today, we are once again producing a ban. In relation to anything to do with animals, reason often seems to flee the Chamber. I wonder what some of the people from history who sat on these Benches and debated matters of huge importance would think about the House spending two hours talking about whether a third of a puppy's tail should be removed. Perhaps this shows that ours is becoming a very nannyish state.

Norman Baker: I hope that history will look on us and see that we have shown some interest in animals, which is a good thing for the House to do. I put it to the hon. Gentleman that it is perfectly proper, as he says, to consider bans a last resort, which is a view I share, but must he not balance the right of individuals to do what they wish with the consequence for the animals? If he believes that the consequence for the animals is harmless, fair enough, but he must weigh those two together.

Mr. Atkinson: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's point is that the evidence is not conclusive on either side, which is why we should leave this to individuals. It is also why I believe that the hunting ban is wrong. People should make their own mind up on these issues.

Another reason for my voting against is that we are in danger of producing bad legislation. Goodness knows, the Hunting Bill was a bad enough muddle; this Bill will be a muddle even if it contains an exemption for gun dogs. I asked the Minister early in his speech what would happen if I acquired a dog with a docked tail, born after the legislation had come into force, and I could not produce any microchip evidence or a certificate from the vet. I could just say, "Well, guv, an Irishman sold it to me at a fair." It might be a stray or I might have got it from a man in a pub.

As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, it is easy for people to dock their own dogs. It is estimated that there are 1 million docked dogs in this country and very few vets that do it. Even today, there must be quite a number of illegally docked dogs. It will be easy to get round the legislation.

Dr. Palmer: I admire the hon. Gentleman's consistency on the matter, but does he not agree, whichever side of the hunting debate we were on, that there is a lot of unhappiness about the grey areas and the attempts to get round that legislation? We should be deciding: are we to allow docking or not? The attempts at a fudge somewhere in between are unhelpful.

Mr. Atkinson: The point I am getting at is that it becomes difficult to legislate precisely for all those issues. This one will be the same. I have explained to the House a simple get-out clause for someone who has a dog that has been illegally docked, and they are entitled to have it.

Let me make it clear that I am not an advocate of cosmetic docking— I have no particular liking for it—but the campaign should be directed once again at the breed societies and the show organisers, because if they take a stance against docking it will quickly die out without the requirement for an Act of Parliament.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): My hon. Friend has hit on a point there. I have changed my mind, having listened to the debate. I was going to support the new clause, but I am now minded not to, because a better approach would be to allow the status quo but introduce a measure focusing on showing dogs. That would drive down the demand for cosmetic docking. It would be much more effective and would avoid some problems with exemptions—for example, those raised by the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer).

Mr. Atkinson: I agree with my hon. Friend. I do not think that legislation is needed, but I believe that show organisers and breed societies should think about the practice of tail docking, knowing how unpopular it is with many people.

David Taylor: Could not breeding societies be encouraged to breed dogs with the aim of producing shorter tails? There is a good deal of evidence that that is possible, and it would deal with some of the problems in the medium term.

Mr. Atkinson: I am no expert on the breeding of dogs, but if that is possible, it would certainly present a solution.

Members have asked how it can be established whether a dog will become a working dog. The answer is that that cannot be established, but many people own working breeds such as spaniels which, even if they are not used for shooting or similar pursuits, may nevertheless injure their tails. Even if it is kept purely as a pet, a spaniel with a full tail is in danger of rushing into undergrowth and damaging its tail. It is illogical to suggest that one spaniel should have its tail docked because at some stage it may be used in field sports and another should not because it is simply a pet. The same applies to terriers, which may not be working dogs but may choose to run off and go down rabbit holes. It is when a terrier with a curly tail tries to back its way out of a rabbit hole that an injury may occur. The dog will often become stuck. The only way in which to get a terrier out of a hole may be to pull its tail—not its legs, which will break. That is one reason why terriers' tails are traditionally shortened.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): The House has discussed various types of working dog today, including hounds used in hunting. The most prolific working dog is undoubtedly the border collie used by shepherds. Can the hon. Gentleman explain why those two breeds do not have their tails docked?

Hon. Members: They do not go down holes.

Mr. Atkinson: As my hon. Friends are saying, border collies do not tend to go down holes, and foxhounds are not in the habit of going into thick cover. That is what spaniels and terriers do.

We are in danger of producing another complicated piece of animal legislation which will be difficult to enforce, will be widely abused, and will bring the House into disrepute.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Atkinson: I am about to end my speech, but I will give way.

Mr. Soames: One of the depressing aspects of legislation of this kind is the House's inability to listen to the views of people outside who really know what they are talking about. Is that not a compelling reason to oppose the new clause, especially in the context of terriers?

Mr. Atkinson: I entirely agree. It is dangerous to be blinkered when faced with these issues, but when it comes to animals some Members are utterly blinkered. They see no reason and no scope for a compromise. As I have said, that leads to bad legislation—and ultimately, if the law is treated as an ass, the House will be brought into disrepute.

Mr. Martyn Jones: Originally, I was open-minded. I generally support shooting and field sports. Three or four weeks ago, when I first looked at the proposals, I thought that I would vote for the exemption for working dogs. However, I have the honour of being a member of the council of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons as a Privy Council appointee. I hasten to add that I am a lay member.

I am vice-chairman of the college's external affairs committee. When, about three weeks ago, the Bill came before the committee, all the vets opposed tail docking. That influenced my thinking. The vets were minded to put their views to the next meeting of the full council on 2 March, less than two weeks ago. I encouraged them to do so, because I felt that, as the ruling body of veterinary surgeons, the college should have a view on tail docking but that the matter should be put to the full council. It did, and as the chairman was absent I put to the council—without leading its members in any way—that the House would need guidance from a body such as the college. I was amazed when not one vet spoke in favour of tail docking. They all opposed it, and produced cogent reasons for their opposition. That persuaded me to vote for a full ban, which I shall do tonight.

Day in, day out, those vets on the council see dogs whose tails have been docked, and they know that they have not done the docking. Any exemption, whatever the wording in which it is couched, will muddy the legal waters and cause problems. The council's decision is now the policy of the college: its policy is not to allow tail docking. Unless we support it by voting for a ban, it will not be able to implement that policy.

I think that the Association of Chief Police Officers was misled. I think that it believes therapeutic docking following tail damage will be stopped. If that is not the case, why have not all its dogs' tails been docked? That would be legal.

Shona McIsaac: Is my hon. Friend aware that most of the dogs used by the police are gifted to them? Their tails may have been docked at an earlier stage.

Mr. Jones: That is a point, but the fact remains that most of the dogs' tails have not been docked to avoid damage. By definition, the police are using dogs whose tails have not been docked. Occasionally some are damaged, but that happens to all dogs with tails. Vets treat them as damaged dogs, and continue to practise therapeutic docking. What they do not want to practise is prophylactic docking on the off chance that a dog might be working.

Mr. Paice: Given my own view, I am rather sorry that the hon. Gentleman has reached this conclusion. He asked why the police did not automatically dock dogs' tails if they are in favour of that. There are two answers. First, the vast majority of police dogs do not engage in activity that makes damage likely. Secondly, a letter from Assistant Chief Constable Vaughan to DEFRA points out that nothing can be done about mature dogs that have been given to the police, and also states:

> "Experience over many years of working with police dogs has shown us that certain dog types, performing certain roles, usually a search function ... in difficult terrain and confined spaces are susceptible to causing injury in their tails. Any docking of new puppies is restricted to such dog types".

Does that not clarify the position?

Mr. Jones: Not at all. I still cannot see the logic. That is the opinion of a particular police officer who has seen tail damage. I think he believes that the Bill will not allow therapeutic docking. Why else would he reach such a conclusion?

Mr. Bradshaw: I have engaged in two lengthy conversations with Assistant Chief Constable Vaughan. He is under no illusion that the new clause would ban therapeutic docking; he is talking about prophylactic docking. [Interruption.]

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) asks from a sedentary position why they do not use less vulnerable breeds. Why is this seen as evidence in favour of the exemption when, at the moment, those breeds are not used, for the very reasonable reason that it is not allowed or that those concerned get them too late to be docked? It is simply not an argument for the exemption that they are not using the exemption now.

Mr. Martlew: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is unlikely that the police would dock a five-day-old puppy that they were going to take later? The dogs would never be docked because they would later be doing police work.

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and makes the point perfectly that that is not an argument in favour of the exemption.

I accept the evidence of the vets; they work with animals every day, see dogs with docked tails and have great suspicion about where those dogs have been docked and by whom. The only way in which this abuse will be stopped is if we have a total ban on docking, which I urge the House to support.

7 pm

Mr. Bellingham: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) and it is sad that we are not on the same side tonight. We have often debated countryside, shooting and rural issues and we have been on the same side. It is a great pity that we will not be tonight.

I have an interest to declare. I have owned dogs all my life. Since I was about 10, my family has had springers and cockers, and we have bred those dogs. It has always been accepted as a matter of fact that the working springers and cockers would have docked tails, for very good reasons. The dogs will go into thick undergrowth; they are natural hunters. I have seen docked springers and cockers coming out of thick undergrowth with blood and cuts on what is left of their tails. Those injuries heal quickly, but I have often wondered how much worse the injuries would have been if the dogs had not been docked at birth. I have always taken a great interest in this subject.

I also own a slightly old labrador called Tiffany. When she was younger, she was an active dog and had a habit of being in a good mood most of the time. She wagged her tail against different objects, such as doors and chairs. Her tail was in such a bad state that we nearly had to have it removed, or therapeutically docked. I am talking about a labrador with a tough tail; one can immediately see the difference between that and a spaniel's tail.

The difference was brought home to me when I thought about the dogs that are used by our security forces and by the police and which operate in confined spaces. If one comes in early to this place, one can see the dogs that work in this Chamber, the police sniffer dogs. They are in an extremely good mood and go careering round the Chamber, in a controlled fashion, in and out of tight spaces. If they had long tails, they would be banging them against every object in sight.

Dr. Palmer: The hon. Gentleman and I share the pleasure of having a labrador. Would it not be logical to say that we should cut off the tails of all dogs, including labradors? Indeed, I notice that the hon. Gentleman, like me, uses his arm a good deal when he speaks. Should we not cut off his arm in case he injures it?

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman slightly devalues his argument with his rather flippant remark. My point is that a labrador has a different tail from that of springers, cockers and some of the sheepdog breeds.

I was interested to hear what the hon. Member for Clwyd, South had to say about vets. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. Gentleman, who commands a great deal of respect in this House and is a Privy Council nominee to the council of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons. In my constituency, the vets are divided on the issue. If one goes to a rural veterinary practice, one finds that vets are almost unanimously in favour of the status quo and of tail docking per se. In urban areas such as Norwich and King's Lynn, there are veterinary practices dominated by vets who are used to looking after smaller animals. They are not used to the countryside and have not spoken to the people there, who would be involved in countryside pursuits or farming. Those vets are mainly in favour of an outright ban.

One has to look carefully at the conclusion reached by vets and ask whether the decision is the result of the domination of that council by predominantly urban vets. Has the voice of the countryside been heard? I put that point to the hon. Gentleman, who is very wise on these matters.

Mr. Jones: I was trying to work out the numbers while the hon. Gentleman was speaking, but at least four members of the council are rural vets and all were in favour of a ban. There may be anecdotal evidence, and I am sure some vets are in favour of docking, but 91 per cent. of vets are against it; that figure must include quite a lot of rural vets.

Mr. Bellingham: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman has said, which carries some weight, although I have discovered that my rural vets are in favour of the status quo.

Much misinformation has been put out by the Anti-Docking Alliance, the League against Cruel Sports and the RSPCA. I intervened on the excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin), who went into this matter in great detail, and asked him about the e-mailed photographs that we have all received, some of which were quite disgraceful. They showed docked dogs with tails lying on the ground and older dogs that had been docked by amateurs. All those dockings would have been completely against the law. One must keep stressing the point that it has been illegal for the past 15 years or so for individual dog owners to dock a dog. It has to be done by a vet.

The issue of pain was discussed at some length. The hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) made a long speech and, to be fair, took a lot of interventions. I do not know whether she has seen a puppy being docked.

Shona McIsaac indicated assent.

Mr. Bellingham: She has. I have seen puppies being docked by vets and I do not feel that there is any lasting pain. [Interruption.] One cannot be sure of that, but the puppies in question immediately went back in with the litter, showing no sign of distress whatever. These were puppies with their eyes shut. That procedure cannot be compared with the pain suffered as a result of therapeutic docking that might have to take place at a later stage. There is no comparison whatever.

Shona McIsaac: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that scientific evidence demonstrates that the neonatal puppy experiences the sensations of pain and, possibly, because of the nature of the neurological pathways, does so more intensely? People argue that because the puppies do not react, there is no pain, but there is very little a two-day old puppy can do apart from squeal. The puppies that I have seen docked certainly squealed when their tails were amputated. No one in this place, I hope, would argue that a neonatal puppy could have a paw or an ear cut off and not experience pain.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention. I am not going to pursue this issue in detail, but the point is that I have seen puppies having their tails docked and although they may well suffer some temporary pain, they get over it very quickly indeed, settle back into the litter and show no signs of ongoing distress. They are not put off their food and they soon develop as normal, healthy dogs.

I am in favour of the status quo. On entering into this debate, I probably erred toward voting for a partial ban and voting against cosmetic docking, but I have been impressed by the arguments of my hon. Friends the Members for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper). It is already illegal for individual dog owners to dock their dogs. Dogs have to be docked by vets, so what we should have is proper enforcement of existing law. If the law was properly enforced, if—as my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham pointed out sensibly and with such imagination—pressure was put on the showing community to veer from cosmetic docking, and if the word went through the entire breeding community that kennel clubs and the various breeders do not approve of it, we would see a big reduction in cosmetic docking. I am also impressed by the arguments concerning bureaucracy, freedom of choice and the complications to which an outright ban would lead, which is why I am in favour of maintaining the status quo.

I am sorry that the Minister has been put in this position. He gave various commitments to organisations such as the Countryside Alliance and the British Association for Shooting and Conservation. He spoke to them at length and told them that he would do all that he possibly could to ensure an exemption for working dogs. I am very sad that he has been unable to deliver on that.

Mr. Bradshaw: I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the House that I have never given any assurances on anything to the Countryside Alliance.

Mr. Bellingham: That is very interesting, because according to an article in The Times in 2004, the Minister had assured countryside rural sports organisations that there would be an exemption for working dogs. Whether such discussion included the Countryside Alliance, I do not know, but it certainly included a number of other organisations very close to it. It is a pity that the Minister, having said that he was standing up for the countryside and for freedom of choice in the countryside, has been unable to deliver.

Mr. Borrow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bellingham: I am going to sit down in a moment. This is yet another example of this Government saying one thing to the countryside and doing something completely different. That is why I am minded to support the status quo.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): As a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, I want to thank the Minister for the way in which he conducted our debates, for taking the Committee's temperature and for allowing us a free vote.

I want to begin by taking issue with what the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) said about past debates on animal welfare in this House. The first animal welfare Bill was debated and passed in 1911, and it is the sign of a civilised society when it debates, without mawkish sentimentality, the welfare of animals, whether they are pets or working animals. It is right that Members in all parts of the House find this issue important.

I will be supporting the Minister's amendments—even though he is unable to do so—mainly because of lobbying in my constituency. Stephen Smith, a local vet, wrote to me saying that tail docking

> "is a procedure I have never elected to perform, on welfare grounds . . . it is not in the animal's best interests . . . puppies feel pain during the process of docking . . . the use of the tail to communicate is essential to a dog's well being . . . There is no scientific evidence to show that undocked working dogs damage their tails any more than undocked non-working dogs . . . If exemptions are introduced into the law there will always be an opportunity for exploitation of a loophole and inevitably the law will fail to protect the animals that it is intended to protect."

Those are overwhelming reasons why we should vote for a total ban, with no exemptions.

Vets throughout the country are making the same arguments as Stephen, saying that docking is not in the dog's interest. That has put some doubt in my mind about the crucial test—whether tail docking is a good thing. Surely it cannot be, given that the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, the British Veterinary Association and the British Small Animal Veterinary Association have all long believed the practice to be unethical. As a result, it is no longer taught to veterinary students as part of their studies.

7.15 pm

The docking of animals' tails is not wrong if there is a scientific case for doing so; indeed, there is a strong case for the prophylactic docking of some animals. The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—I am afraid that some Members seem to have little respect for the RSPCA, but I have a great deal of respect for it—is not asking for a ban on the docking of lambs or piglets, subject, of course, to specific restrictions on the manner in which it is carried out. The National Farmers Union emphasises:

[Anne Snelgrove]

"What may be appropriate provision for companion animals is not necessarily appropriate for animals kept for commercial purposes as in farming."

No one would suggest that farmed animals should not be protected by docking. Reference was made earlier to a sheepdog soiling itself, and it was argued that it would be better for such animals to have their tails docked at birth. Members should be aware that according to the RSPCA, proper and careful grooming of dogs is a far better approach than cutting off the tail to avoid the area underneath becoming soiled with faecal matter. In some cases, hygiene problems are increased by docking, as the procedure can damage the anal muscles. Therefore, we cannot extrapolate from one species to another, and the evidence is that what is appropriate for livestock is not right for dogs.

In considering whether to dock the tail of a puppy or to leave it, the moral dilemma will always be weighing the potential pain from possible tail damage against the definite pain from what may turn out to be an unnecessary preventive measure. There is evidence of pain, but no evidence of benefit. I advanced this argument on Second Reading and in Committee, where I was pleased to table the amendment prohibiting docking, and I want to address it again. The House of Commons Library provided a journal article on the available research and, according to that, all the evidence reviewed thus far is consistent with the claim that docking causes acute pain to dogs. No evidence could be found to support the claim that new-born pups do not experience any pain at the time of docking. On the question of benefit, the article concludes:

"The absence of appropriate studies in this area represents a significant difficulty for those who support tail docking, even in those breeds that may be expected to sustain tail damage."

Dr. Palmer: I was unable to read the full Committee proceedings, but am I right in believing that a substantial majority of Committee members favoured a total ban?

Anne Snelgrove: That is entirely correct. Those who reached a decision one way or another—that did not include the Conservatives—indicated that they supported a total ban, which is why we are debating this issue today and having a free vote on it.

An unscientific study by a Swedish German pointer breed society in 1989—my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) mentioned it earlier—showed that of the 191 dogs studied, amputations had to be conducted on only seven. Therefore, 97 per cent. of those dogs did not need to be docked. In the light of robust evidence from Denmark and Norway, even if the pro-dockers are right and there is a 20 per cent. increase in tail injuries following a docking ban, which is doubtful, tail injuries would rise from under 0.037 per cent. to 0.044 per cent., leaving some 99 per cent. of dogs with healthy, uninjured tails.

Mr. Russell Brown: A local vet in my constituency produced two letters, one dated 1991 and the other 1997, from the Swedish Boxer club, suggesting that for that breed injuries had increased from 10 per cent. to 15 per cent., but the information is scant because it does not give the actual number of dogs involved. Does my hon. Friend have any more up-to-date information?

Anne Snelgrove: I have indications from vets in my constituency that the number of injuries to dogs whose tails were not docked following a ban would not exceed the number of injuries in dogs that are not docked at present. The number of injuries would remain almost the same and we would not see any huge increase. One in six dogs—1 million—is docked. We do not have 1 million working dogs. Only a third are even working breeds. Thirty thousand dogs are docked a year, if the average dog lives for 10 years. [Interruption.] Docking is a very popular practice and we need to be realistic and accept that there would be abuses—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. May I remind the House that we must not have casual conversations while the hon. Lady is addressing the House?

Anne Snelgrove: We are told that an exemption would mean that a vet would have to certify that the dog is likely to be a working dog, but the word "likely" is not a very high barrier to overcome. We already know that even a dog likely to be a working dog is unlikely to injure its tail.

We are told that the exemption would also lead to a ban on showing dogs with docked tails, but as I have said, 1 million dogs are currently docked and not all of them are show dogs. People are docking dogs for cosmetic reasons, but not always to put them in a show.

As a House we welcome the Animal Welfare Bill and the story of the improvements in animal welfare in this country. We have moved a long way away from cruelty. Cruelty has been excused by tradition, for cosmetic or entertainment reasons, or on the basis of anecdotal evidence. However, we have moved towards the treatment of animals based on the best scientific evidence and the highest standards possible. I doubt that allowing docking to continue would be in any way beneficial, and without full confidence in that, I have to vote for a complete ban.

Mr. Harper: I had planned to vote for new clause 8, but having listened to the debate and to the Minister's promises of what he will do if clause 5 remains in the Bill, I shall vote against the new clause. I am not entirely comfortable with the definitions in the Bill of working dogs.

For welfare reasons, we have to consider the likelihood of a dog having more damage to its tail in later life than it would if it were docked. That likelihood has to vary with the nature of the breed involved. That is why I am not comfortable with considering only what the dog may do for a living. We also need to consider what dogs that are not working dogs do in rural areas. If certain breeds of dog have a particular propensity to suffer damage to their tails, it does not matter whether they are working dogs or companion dogs. Dogs taken for walks in rural areas, such as the Forest of Dean, are likely to engage in the same activities—going down holes, for example—as working dogs. That would not be covered by an exemption for working dogs.

A better approach would be to keep clause 5 in the Bill and have the Minister bring forward regulations to exempt tail docking. At the same time, we could consider how to drive down the demand for cosmetic docking by adopting the sensible provisions in new clause 8 about the showing of animals.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Has my hon. Friend had a satisfactory assurance from the Minister in that regard?

Mr. Harper: The Minister gave clear assurances to my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). If the Minister has anything further to add to that, I am happy to give way to him.

Mr. Bradshaw: I point out to the hon. Gentleman and others who have suggested that a possible solution may be to ban the showing of dogs with docked tails without banning the docking of tails, that that would be extremely difficult to achieve. Can he imagine the Kennel Club acceding to a situation in which docking was not banned, but showing docked dogs was banned? It simply would not work.

Mr. Harper: I still think that exploring that route would be beneficial, instead of having a ban.

When we were listening to the lengthy contribution from the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), she referred on several occasions to the scientific evidence. It appeared that her definition of scientific evidence was the opinions that she agreed with, and anything else was purely anecdotal. One of the difficulties with the issue, which I have considered because of the interest expressed by my constituents, is that there is no clear evidence either way. It is certainly true, as the hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) said, that many vets have opinions about the issue, but there is a lack of clear scientific evidence. There is anecdotal evidence from those who use working dogs and from what has happened in countries such as Sweden, which have a complete ban. That evidence appears to show that damage to dogs' tails has increased, and that has to be taken into consideration.

This is a complex issue and the scientific arguments are not clear. It would be much more sensible to stick with clause 5 and consider ways to drive down demand for cosmetic docking, instead of adopting new clause 8.

Mr. Drew: In the short time I have left, I shall try to be consistent. My hon. Friend the Minister has changed his position at least twice and the Opposition spokesperson has also changed position tonight. Thank goodness for the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Bradshaw: I have not changed my position once on this issue.

Mr. Drew: At least the Liberal Democrats have been consistent, although the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) has unfortunately got the chop.

It is nonsense to pretend that we will go backwards if we retain the status quo, which has failed to deliver an end to the cosmetic docking of tails. The majority of vets want to see the end of the practice, but we have ended up with a lot of illegal tail docking—

It being two hours after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 476, Noes 63.

Division No. 187] [7.27 pm

AYES

| | |
|---|---|
| Abbott, Ms Diane | Cable, Dr. Vincent |
| Afriyie, Adam | Cairns, David |
| Ainger, Nick | Campbell, Mr. Gregory |
| Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob | Campbell, rh Sir Menzies |
| Ainsworth, Mr. Peter | Campbell, Mr. Ronnie |
| Alexander, Danny | Carmichael, Mr. Alistair |
| Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas | Caton, Mr. Martin |
| Allen, Mr. Graham | Cawsey, Mr. Ian |
| Amess, Mr. David | Challen, Colin |
| Ancram, rh Mr. Michael | Chapman, Ben |
| Anderson, Mr. David | Chaytor, Mr. David |
| Anderson, Janet | Clapham, Mr. Michael |
| Armstrong, rh Hilary | Clappison, Mr. James |
| Atkins, Charlotte | Clark, Ms Katy |
| Austin, Mr. Ian | Clark, Paul |
| Bailey, Mr. Adrian | Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth |
| Baird, Vera | Clegg, Mr. Nick |
| Baker, Norman | Clelland, Mr. David |
| Baldry, Tony | Clwyd, rh Ann |
| Balls, Ed | Coaker, Mr. Vernon |
| Banks, Gordon | Coffey, Ann |
| Barker, Gregory | Cohen, Harry |
| Barlow, Ms Celia | Connarty, Michael |
| Barrett, John | Conway, Derek |
| Bayley, Hugh | Cook, Frank |
| Beckett, rh Margaret | Cooper, Rosie |
| Begg, Miss Anne | Cooper, Yvette |
| Beith, rh Mr. Alan | Corbyn, Jeremy |
| Benn, rh Hilary | Cousins, Jim |
| Benton, Mr. Joe | Crabb, Mr. Stephen |
| Bercow, John | Crausby, Mr. David |
| Berry, Roger | Creagh, Mary |
| Betts, Mr. Clive | Cruddas, Jon |
| Binley, Mr. Brian | Cryer, Mrs. Ann |
| Blackman, Liz | Cummings, John |
| Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta | Cunningham, Mr. Jim |
| Blears, rh Hazel | Cunningham, Tony |
| Blizzard, Mr. Bob | Curry, rh Mr. David |
| Blunkett, rh Mr. David | Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire |
| Borrow, Mr. David S. | Darling, rh Mr. Alistair |
| Boswell, Mr. Tim | Davey, Mr. Edward |
| Bottomley, Peter | David, Mr. Wayne |
| Bradshaw, Mr. Ben | Davidson, Mr. Ian |
| Brady, Mr. Graham | Davies, Philip |
| Brazier, Mr. Julian | Davies, Mr. Quentin |
| Breed, Mr. Colin | Dean, Mrs. Janet |
| Brokenshire, James | Denham, rh Mr. John |
| Brooke, Annette | Devine, Mr. Jim |
| Brown, Lyn | Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit |
| Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas | Dismore, Mr. Andrew |
| Brown, Mr. Russell | Dobbin, Jim |
| Browne, rh Mr. Des | Dobson, rh Frank |
| Browning, Angela | Dodds, Mr. Nigel |
| Bruce, Malcolm | Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M. |
| Bryant, Chris | Donohoe, Mr. Brian H. |
| Buck, Ms Karen | Doran, Mr. Frank |
| Burden, Richard | Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen |
| Burgon, Colin | Dorries, Mrs. Nadine |
| Burnham, Andy | Dowd, Jim |
| Burstow, Mr. Paul | Drew, Mr. David |
| Burt, Lorely | Duddridge, James |
| Butterfill, Sir John | Dunwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth |
| Byers, rh Mr. Stephen | Eagle, Angela |
| Byrne, Mr. Liam | Efford, Clive |

Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farrelly, Paul
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Field, Mr. Mark
Fisher, Mark
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Mr. Don
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Francois, Mr. Mark
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Gove, Michael
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Healey, John
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hendry, Charles
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hermon, Lady
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hoey, Kate
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Glenda
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Knight, Jim
Kramer, Susan
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lammy, Mr. David
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Leech, Mr. John
Lepper, David
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Lidington, Mr. David
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
Luff, Peter
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Malleber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Osborne, Sandra
Ottaway, Richard
Owen, Albert
Paice, Mr. James
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Price, Adam
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Pritchard, Mark
Prosser, Gwyn
Pugh, Dr. John
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Randall, Mr. John
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Rosindell, Andrew
Rowen, Paul
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Bob
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Salter, Martin
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Scott, Mr. Lee
Seabeck, Alison
Selous, Andrew
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simmonds, Mark
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Alan
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, rh Jacqui
Smith, John
Smith, Sir Robert
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Stanley, rh Sir John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stringer, Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tami, Mark
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David

Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thornberry, Emily
Thurso, John
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Usher, Kitty
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Vaz, Keith
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watkinson, Angela
Watts, Mr. Dave
Webb, Steve
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wills, Mr. Michael
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Jeremy
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Alan Campbell and Kevin Brennan

NOES

Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Burt, Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clark, Greg
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Harper, Mr. Mark
Hayes, Mr. John
Herbert, Nick
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kennedy, rh Jane
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Laws, Mr. David
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Maclean, rh David
Mactaggart, Fiona
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Mercer, Patrick
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Wilshire, Mr. David
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Robert Goodwill and Mr. James Gray

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause, (a), in line 13, leave out subsections (3) to (6).—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 267, Noes 278.

Division No. 188] [7.45 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Amess, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Austin, Mr. Ian
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Baker, Norman
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barrett, John
Bayley, Hugh
Begg, Miss Anne
Benn, rh Hilary
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brooke, Annette
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Cairns, David
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Davey, Mr. Edward
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angel
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Farrelly, Paul
Featherstone, Lynne
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr. Evan
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Holmes, Paul
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Howarth, David
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hughes, Simon
Hunter, Mark
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Jackson, Glenda
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Kramer, Susan
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Leech, Mr. John
Lepper, David
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew

MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Rennie, Willie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Rosindell, Andrew
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Bob
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Scott, Mr. Lee
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Teather, Sarah
Thornberry, Emily
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Vaz, Keith
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Waltho, Lynda
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watts, Mr. Dave
Webb, Steve
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Alan Campbell and Kevin Brennan

NOES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Ancram, rh Mr. Michael
Anderson, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Beckett, rh Margaret
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berryon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blears, rh Hazel
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burnham, Andy
Burt, Alistair
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Clelland, Mr. David
Coffey, Ann
Conway, Derek
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Crausby, Mr. David
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Tony
Curry, rh Mr. David
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Durkwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Field, Mr. Mark
Fisher, Mark
Flello, Mr. Robert
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goodman, Helen
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Gove, Michael
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Grogan, Mr. John
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Healey, John
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hermon, Lady
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hoey, Kate
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Huhne, Chris
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jack, rh Mr. Michael
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Lynne
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kennedy, rh Jane
Key, Robert
Kidney, Mr. David
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Knight, Jim
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lambeter, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Lewin, rh Mr. Oliver
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Lucas, Ian
Luff, Peter
Maclean, rh David

Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Mann, John
Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McKenna, Rosemary
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Mole, Chris
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Owen, Albert
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pearson, Ian
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Purnell, James
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Reid, rh John
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rowen, Paul
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Salter, Martin
Sestack, Alison
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Simmonds, Mark
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Thurso, John
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Usher, Kitty
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Walley, Joan
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Robert Goodwill and Mr. James Gray

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause added to the Bill.

New Clause 9

Improvement Notices

'(1) If an inspector is of the opinion that a person is failing to comply with section 8(1), he may serve on the person a notice which—

(a) states that he is of that opinion,

(b) specifies the respects in which he considers the person is failing to comply with that provision,

(c) specifies the steps he considers need to be taken in order to comply with the provision,

(d) specifies a period for the taking of those steps, and

(e) explains the effect of subsections (2) and (3).

(2) Where a notice under subsection (1) ("an improvement notice") is served, no proceedings for an offence under section 8(1) may be instituted before the end of the period specified for the purposes of subsection (1)(d) ("the compliance period") in respect of—

(a) the non-compliance which gave rise to the notice, or

(b) any continuation of that non-compliance.

(3) If the steps specified in an improvement notice are taken at any time before the end of the compliance period, no proceedings for an offence under section 8(1) may be instituted in respect of—

(a) the non-compliance which gave rise to the notice, or

(b) any continuation of that non-compliance prior to the taking of the steps specified in the notice.

(4) An inspector may extend, or further extend, the compliance period specified in an improvement notice.'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Bradshaw: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (a) to new clause 9, in line 2, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.

New clause 3—Improvement notices—

'(1) Where an inspector considers that animals are being kept in a way which is likely to cause unnecessary pain, suffering or injury he may serve a notice on the person appearing to be in charge of the animals requiring that person, within the period stated in that notice, to take action that the inspector considers to be reasonably necessary.

(2) An inspector serving a notice under subsection (1) shall give his reasons for requiring that action to be taken.

(3) It is an offence to fail to comply with an improvement notice.'.

New clause 4—Appeals against improvement notices—

'(1) Any person who is aggrieved by an improvement notice served under section [Improvement notices] may appeal to a magistrates' court.

(2) The procedure on an appeal to a magistrates' court under subsection (1) shall be by way of complaint, and the Magistrates' Court Act 1980 shall apply to the proceedings.

(3) The period within which an appeal shall be brought shall be two weeks, or the period specified in the improvement notice, whichever ends the earlier.

(4) A court may suspend an improvement notice pending an appeal.'.

New clause 5—Powers of a court on appeal—

'On an appeal made under section [Appeals against improvement notices] against an improvement notice served under section [Improvement notices], the Court may either cancel or affirm the notice, and, if it affirms it, may do so either in its original form or with such modifications as the court may in the circumstance think fit.'.

Mr. Bradshaw: This amendment to the Bill reflects—
[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We now have to get on with the next new clause. Will Members who are leaving do so quietly and, if possible, not all together, so that we can get on with the business of the House?

Mr. Bradshaw: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This amendment to the Bill reflects my agreement in Committee to consider further a new clause proposed by the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). His proposition was that those accused of an offence should be told in a statutory improvement notice how they were breaking the law and what they needed to do to avoid being taken to court. I have taken that on board and that is what the new clause achieves.

Unlike the hon. Gentleman, however, we have not sought to replicate the approach taken in existing farm animal legislation, which makes it an offence not to comply with an improvement notice, but since the passage of the Human Rights Act 1998 may require an appeal process—a point that he acknowledges with his new clause 4. However, we believe that appeals are impractical because the period of an improvement notice is frequently short—for example, 24 hours—when dealing with the provision of water and feed. Appeals are also resource-intensive, as prosecutors may have to go to magistrates once for the appeal hearing and again for the prosecution, and the appeal process is easily abused by those who deliberately want to be obstructive and frustrate the inspectors.

Under new clause 9, we propose instead that someone who complies with an improvement notice will not be prosecuted. That is more straightforward, does not raise questions about appeals and is a clear incentive to someone to comply. Only inspectors, as defined in clause 46, will be able to issue those notices. I do not consider it appropriate that those who are not publicly accountable should be able to issue notices with formal legal authority.

8 pm

We do not agree with the Gentleman that an inspector should be obliged to issue a notice, although I note that he has proposed amendment (a) to new clause 9, which would do just that, but new clauses 3, 4, and 5, which he also tabled, would not do so. Compulsory notices would enable the serial offender to comply with each notice and then repeat the offence, safe in the knowledge that the worst that an inspector could do was issue another notice. In such circumstances, as in particularly serious cases that involve borderline cruelty, the inspector must be able to proceed directly to prosecution if he or she thinks that that is the best course, particularly if a disqualification order would be appropriate. In most cases, we would expect inspectors to issue a notice, but they should have the discretion to proceed directly to prosecution where that is warranted, particularly when private prosecutors are free to do so.

Finally, new clause 9 relates only to alleged offences under clause 8—the welfare offence—but new clause 3 would also include the power to issue notices for alleged cruelty violations under clause 4. I am sure that most hon. Members would agree that for most offences where actual cruelty has occurred, inspectors ought to proceed straight to prosecution, rather than issuing notices. On that basis, I commend new clause 9 and urge the hon. Gentleman not to press amendment (a) or new clauses 3, 4 or 5 to a vote.

Bill Wiggin: I have fought for the inclusion of the improvement notice in the Bill, and I am pleased that the Government have wrestled with the very difficult task of proposing such an amendment. New clause 9 will serve as a statutory provision that represents an intermediate step before prosecution and will operate as an independent measure that will help to improve animal welfare standards.

The principle of issuing warnings—or, in footballing terms, yellow cards—with a statutory requirement before pursuing prosecutions will not only save time and money, but help to focus resources elsewhere, on the most serious cruelty crimes. However, although I can see that the Minister's officials have done a good job in drafting the new clause, I am disappointed that it does not include a mandatory mechanism to ensure that suspected offenders are issued with an improvement notice before any prosecution can commence, and I have tabled a "one-word" amendment accordingly.

The offences under clause 8, for which the improvement notice will apply, relate to the raft of codes of practice that the Minister plans to introduce under clause 12. Given that many owners may not have read a copy of the draft cat code and may not have read it carefully enough to know whether their cat happens to be too fat or too slim or is receiving sufficient mental stimulation, it is only right that we give them the opportunity to alter for the better the way that they care for their animals.

The vast majority of animal owners would be prepared to do the right thing if they knew what it was. Of the 257 improvement notices issues in the RSPCA's eastern region, only 17 were ignored. Let us just think of the court time saved and how beneficial it would be to inspectors to be empowered in that sensible and practical way, which would improve animal welfare. It is those 17 people whom we are after. That is the path to cruelty, so they are the people whom we want to prosecute, and we want to do so in the spirit of the Bill, before their animals have suffered cruelty; we do not want to prosecute people who are willing to change.

Furthermore, the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which considered a draft version of the Animal Welfare Bill more than a year ago, recommended that provisions for improvement notices should be included in the Bill. So if we fail to amend the Bill to give law enforcers the power to issue improvement notices, we will open the floodgates to prosecution.

The RSPCA has pointed out that some clarity on those notices would be helpful, and I am sure that there will be opportunities in another place to clarify how we deal with people who abuse this important merciful intervention. We can overcome the technical difficulties associated with people who hide behind the time frame, or who repeatedly fail for different reasons.

We know that such orders work, so let us give them the full backing of Parliament by ensuring that they are issued on a mandatory basis before all prosecutions under clause 8(1). Amendment (a), which I tabled to new clause 9, would serve that purpose, as would new clauses 3, 4 and 5, which I also tabled. However, it was the Minister's wish that I should not press that amendment or those new clauses to a vote. I shall happily take his advice on the new clauses, but I intend to seek a vote on amendment (a), which would make Government new clause 9 mandatory.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I wish to intervene briefly on this matter to support my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). Under Government new clause 9, as I understand it, the inspector may serve a notice, rather than having to serve one. That envisages the possibility—as my hon. Friend has confirmed, so I think that my understanding is right—that certain people may be served with a notice and certain people may not be served with one. Those who are served with a notice have an opportunity to remedy the situation and thereby avoid prosecution. Those who are not served with such a notice have no such opportunity at all and can be prosecuted without having the benefit of a notice. I can see no reason whatever why there should not be a uniform approach, involving the need to serve a notice in every case. Otherwise certain persons will be disadvantaged and become defendants, when if they had had the privilege of being served with a notice, they would not necessarily have become defendants.

No provision in the new clause governs the discretion in the service of the notice. We have no guidelines on when a notice may be served or when one may not be. I should like to know, for example, how the notice will be served. Will it be served personally or by post? I should like a little bit more information about the compliance time limits and, in particular, the provision whereby there may be a continuation of a period for the putative defendant to take such steps as are necessary, but I strongly support my hon. Friend. I hope that I have picked up the argument correctly when I say that in this case, it makes much more sense to use the word "must". Otherwise there will be two classes of potential defendants.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Is not the word "may" commonly used in such circumstances? Is it not a way of drafting designed to indicate that the inspector shall serve the notice? If we change the word "may" to "must", how much further is my hon. Friend taking the argument? Is he suggesting that the inspector would commit an offence if he failed to serve the notice?

Mr. Malins: My right hon. Friend, as always, makes an interesting point. Of course, an alternative for the word "must", which my hon. Friend suggests in his amendment, could be the word "shall". I accept the point that my hon. Friend is making, but there ought to be uniformity. It is silly to have one rule for one thing but a different rule for something else. Defendants would turn up in court—I am sorry to say, they may appear before me.

Bill Wiggin: They would be lucky to do so.

Mr. Malins: It is kind of my hon. Friend to say so, but if a defendant said, "I must tell you, your honour, that I received no such notice from the inspector, but a friend of mine down the road received a notice and could remedy the situation and was not prosecuted. I would have taken action if I had received such a notice." I would be bound to take that into account as a mitigating factor, and I would regard it as absurd that one person should have a notice served on him without any particular reason and another person did not. My hon. Friend's amendment is compelling, and would bring much more sense to the otherwise sensible clause.

Mr. Drew: I would be grateful if the Minister clarified the provision. I was lucky to serve on the Standing Committee, where we were led to believe by the Minister that there were disadvantages in the process of serving a notice. The greatest disadvantage is one of time: some animal welfare issues may need to be dealt with immediately, but if a notice is served there are opportunities not just for delay but for someone to produce mitigating circumstances. The Bill is an animal welfare measure that presumes that we are thinking on the animals' behalf, so I would be grateful if my hon. Friend clarified whether the Government have moved towards accepting the Opposition's proposal of a yellow card as an alternative to peremptory action. Can he assure me that there would not be any delay? Our discussions in Committee suggested that urgent interventions could be necessary.

Bill Wiggin: We share common ground on the issue of cruelty and the need to tackle it urgently. The new clause, however, applies to the breach of the welfare offence, which is obviously a lesser offence. It is important to serve a statutory improvement notice because we are not dealing with direct cruelty.

Mr. Drew: I agree, but there are gradations. What appears to be a welfare offence to one person is straightforward cruelty to someone else. Often, such matters are eventually decided in court; that is my dilemma.

Bill Wiggin: If that is the hon. Gentleman's dilemma and he is worried that he cannot decide without the court's help whether something is cruel or a welfare offence, surely the right thing to do is to issue the written warning. If owners ignore them and persist in their behaviour, it is clear that their intention is to be cruel. If they react immediately to the improvement notice and improve the animals' welfare, everyone has won, including the animals, on whose welfare the hon. Gentleman places key importance.

Mr. Drew: I largely agree with the hon. Gentleman. My only worry is that the treatment of an animal may not improve, leading to further delay. I would be grateful if the Minister assured me that the position will be clarified in regulations, as we need consistency. One inspector may issue a notice, and that is the end of their responsibility. Another inspector, however, may regard the same offence as a clear act of cruelty and take the animal into care, leading to a prosecution of the owner and so on. The Minister made a clear statement in Committee that that was not the Government's preferred approach, but if he can provide a good justification for the change I will happily go along with it.

8.15 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I thought that I understood the provision until I heard the last few exchanges. I, too, served on the Select Committee that conducted pre-legislative scrutiny of the draft Bill, and we discussed improvement notices at considerable length. That was a worthwhile discussion, which is reflected in the Government new clause. The word "must" suggests compulsion, but timing is an important issue too. There are sometimes conditions under which it is impossible for improvement to take place in a realistic time scale. Improvement notices, however, should be written in such a way that they are meaningful. People should try to write something to show how, step by step within a reasonable period, the animal's welfare can be addressed and hopefully it can recover. On some occasions, however, the abuse has gone so far that it would be difficult to codify a notice to deal with the problem. In those circumstances, the only logical thing to do is to proceed to prosecution, because an improvement notice would be meaningless.

Bill Wiggin: The point that the hon. Gentleman is making is valid if there were a prosecution for cruelty. If neglect has taken place for such a long time that there is no possibility of improving the animal's welfare, the animal has been treated cruelly. The purpose of my new clause is to tackle the welfare offence, which is partly dealt with by default in the code of conduct. Evidence suggests that when people are issued with an RSPCA improvement notice the vast majority want to comply with it. The problem is dealing with people's ignorance, and the new clause would help to address that.

Mr. Breed: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. We may be talking about only one word, but that word is significant. We are all travelling in the same direction, as we want to try to ensure that the improvement notices are designed to address the problem. Sometimes, however, flexibility on the part of people who are judging the situation can provide a more just solution. We are therefore dependent on the issuing of the notice and on its terms. It is not sensible to adopt a prescriptive approach to the issuing of a notice, insisting on the terminology to be used and the issues to be addressed if the animal is in a dire situation. We must trust the people who will go out and investigate offences. If there is an obvious case of cruelty they will tackle it straight away. There are always borderline cases, however, and people will take a subjective view as to whether bad welfare extends into cruelty. The flexibility provided by the use of the word "may" offers that opportunity, so that is my preferred option.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I have listened carefully to the arguments advanced by the hon. Gentleman and, indeed, by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). Surely, the problem is not poor welfare tipping over into cruelty but poor practice tipping over into poor welfare. For example, many of us believe that keeping two Alsatians in a flat is contrary to the animals' best interests, but does that constitute treatment that justifies the serving of a notice under new clause 9?

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): It depends on how much exercise they have.

Mr. Turner: Indeed, but does that allow them to exhibit, in the words of—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Is the hon. Gentleman able to bring his remarks to a close?

Mr. Turner: Indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can the hon. Gentleman say whether, at that end of the spectrum, it would be better for the inspector to have discretion as to whether to serve the notice?

Mr. Breed: Broadly, yes. The discretion should be with the officer who is confronted with each individual situation. In general, the desire of such inspectors is to issue an improvement notice when it is clear that matters can be resolved over time if the conditions in which the animal is kept are improved. Bearing in mind that inspectors will deal with a wide spectrum of cases, compulsion is not helpful to them in gaining people's trust and co-operation and working with them.

Bill Wiggin: If the inspector is of the opinion that a person is failing to comply with clause 8, that means that the inspector has had the opportunity to make a judgment. He must then issue the notice to improve. He does not have to issue such a notice if he believes cruelty is taking place. In that case, he must prosecute. He does not have to issue an improvement notice if he does not believe the person is in default of clause 8(1). The freedom of choice is available to the inspector. That may help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Breed: I wish it did. We are considering a range of cases, and some are more subjective than others. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches believe that giving reasonable latitude and discretion in the issuing of a notice would be a more sensible approach than compulsion.

Mr. Greg Knight: Should there not, though, be a provision to challenge the issuing of a notice? There may be a case where the inspector takes one view, and a vet who knows the animal takes another. Rather than subject the owner to the risk of costs being awarded against him if he goes to court, should there not be some provision through which to challenge the issuing of a notice?

Mr. Breed: That would cause the situation to escalate even further. If it is possible to challenge whether the notice should have been issued in the first place, the situation becomes unnecessarily complicated. Do we not trust the judgment of those who go and inspect the situation on the ground, the circumstances of the animal and the circumstances of the person who is likely to be issued with the improvement notice or prosecuted? We know that some people are negligent, cruel or passively delinquent in the way they look after an animal.

Introducing an element of compulsion will not necessarily serve justice or provide the flexibility and discretion that inspectors need. I therefore support the original wording "may".

Bob Spink: I do not want to rain on anyone's parade. Broadly, clause 8 is a good clause and is improved by the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin). Subsection (2) highlights the fact that an animal's needs include the need for a suitable environment and a suitable diet. Subsection (4) exempts the humane destruction of the animal, but makes no comment about the transport of animals for eventual destruction—for instance, the transport of farm animals abroad to be destroyed in very unsuitable and distressing conditions, where their environment is certainly not conducive to their welfare and their diet is nil.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going wide of the amendment under discussion.

Bob Spink: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Can the Minister find a way to address that issue in the context of the clause?

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): My hon. Friend should be aware that the Bill does not apply to farm animals, which is perhaps why Madam Deputy Speaker called him to order.

Bob Spink: I take that advice.

Clause 8(2)(c) calls for the animal

"to be able to exhibit normal behaviour patterns".

Does that mean that an inspector could object to the extreme use of an electric shock collar on an animal and issue an improvement notice to prevent that? Is that clarified in the Bill?

Bill Wiggin: The extreme use of an electric shock collar would be deemed to be cruelty, in which case the inspector would proceed immediately to prosecution.

Bob Spink: Having received those clarifications, I am happy to draw my remarks to a close and hope that I can support the new clause with amendment (a).

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause: (a) in line 2, leave out 'may' and insert 'must'.—[Bill Wiggin.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 153, Noes 342.

Division No. 189] [8.26 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Amess, Mr. David
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Baron, Mr. John
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Browning, Angela
Burt, Alistair
Butterfill, Sir John
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Conway, Derek
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorrell, rh Mr. Stephen
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Field, Mr. Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gauke, Mr. David
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Harper, Mr. Mark
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Herbert, Nick
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Horam, Mr. John
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
Maclean, rh David
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rosindell, Andrew
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wright, Jeremy
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. David Evennett and Mr. Henry Bellingham

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, Danny
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian

Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Baker, Norman
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barrett, John
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Benn, rh Hilary
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brake, Tom
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brennan, Kevin
Brooke, Annette
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bruce, Malcolm
Bryant, Chris
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Burt, Lorely
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Davey, Mr. Edward
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Farrelly, Paul
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Mr. Don
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harris, Mr. Tom
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Heath, Mr. David
Hemming, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hermon, Lady
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Holmes, Paul
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horwood, Martin
Howarth, David
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Knight, Jim
Kramer, Susan
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lamb, Norman
Lammy, Mr. David
Laws, Mr. David
Lazarowicz, Mark
Leech, Mr. John
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
Meale, Mr. Alan
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moore, Mr. Michael
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Price, Adam
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Pugh, Dr. John
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, Mr. Alan
Reid, rh John
Rennie, Willie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Rowen, Paul
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Russell, Bob
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Short, rh Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, rh Jacqui
Smith, John
Smith, Sir Robert
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Swinson, Jo
Taylor, Ms Dari
Teather, Sarah
Thornberry, Emily
Thurso, John
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don

Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Webb, Steve
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Vernon Coaker and Gillian Merron

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause added to the Bill.

New Clause 2

SALE OF ANIMALS ON THE INTERNET

'(1) Within one year of the passing of this Act the Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament regulations making provision regarding the sale of animals on the Internet.

(2) The regulations shall, in particular, make provision with regard to persons who are involved in such sales but who are not themselves responsible for the animals concerned.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), the sale of an animal includes transferring, or agreeing to the transfer of, the ownership of the animal in consideration of entry by the transferee into another transaction.

(4) Regulations under this section—

(a) shall be made by statutory instrument, and

(b) may not be made unless a draft has been laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.'.—[Mark Pritchard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mark Pritchard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 6—Abandonment—

'(1) A person commits an offence if he abandons an animal for which he is responsible.

(2) A person commits an offence if he leaves an animal for which he is responsible and, without reasonable excuse, fails to make adequate provision for its welfare.

(3) A person who assumes responsibility for the care of an abandoned animal may apply to a magistrates' court three months after an animal was abandoned and seek an order transferring legal ownership to him.'.

New clause 10—Circus animals—

'(1) A person commits an offence if he uses or keeps in, or for the purposes of, a circus an animal not of a kind designated under subsection (2).

(2) The appropriate national authority may by regulations designate a kind of animal for the purposes of subsection (1) if that authority is satisfied, on the basis of scientific evidence, that the welfare needs of animals of that kind are likely generally to be met if they are used or kept for the purposes of a circus.

(3) It is unlawful to keep or use a winter holding quarters to which this Act applies except under the authority of a licence issued under this Act by the local authority for the area within which the whole or the major part of the winter holding quarters is situated.

(4) The appropriate national authority may by regulations make such provision for licensing in relation to the keeping or using of winter holding quarters as the authority thinks fit for the purpose of ensuring the welfare of animals to which subsection (2) applies and which are being used or kept in winter holding quarters.

(5) Without prejudice to the generality of the power under subsection (4), the appropriate national authority may by regulations apply in relation to such animals section 9A, 10, 11 and 12 of the Zoo Licensing Act 1981 (c. 37) ("the 1981 Act") (inspection of zoos by local authorities) with such modifications as the appropriate national authority considers appropriate.

(6) For the purpose of ensuring the welfare of animals to which subsection (1) applies and which have been used or kept in, or for the purposes of, a circus the appropriate national authority may by regulations apply in relation to such animals—

(a) subsection (2) to (11) of section 16E of the 1981 Act (obligations of zoo operator on closure of zoo); and accordingly

(b) sections 16F (power of local authority to dispose of animals), 16G (powers of entry) and 19(3D) to (3F), (4) and (5) (offences and penalties) of the 1981 Act, with such modifications as the appropriate national authority considers appropriate.

(7) In this section—

(a) "circus" means a place where animals are kept or introduced wholly or mainly for the purpose of performing tricks or manoeuvres at that place;

(b) "winter holding quarters" means any establishment other than a circus where animals which are kept or used in, or for the purposes of, a circus are kept on more than seven days in any period of 12 consecutive months.'.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 3, page 2, line 16, at end insert—

'(5) For the purposes of this Act, in the event of a person unlawfully taking possession of an animal, he will be treated as being responsible for that animal on a temporary basis, until such time as that the animal is recovered by its lawful owner or taken into the care of an inspector.'.

Amendment No. 3, in clause 4, page 3, line 4, at end insert—

'(3A) In this section, the term "suffering" includes both mental and physical suffering or cruelty.'.

Amendment No. 107, in page 3, line 4, at end insert—

'(3A) For the purposes of subsection (3)(c), the protection of property shall only be considered a legitimate purpose when animals are used by the police or armed forces in the carrying out of their duties.'.

Amendment No. 108, in clause 9, page 5, line 14, at end insert—

'(7) A person who takes part in an activity which could result in them receiving an animal as a prize shall have a duty to ensure that they make preparations to meet the need of the animal as set out in section 8(2) as soon as is practical after the receipt of the prize.'.

Amendment No. 17, in clause 16, page 9, line 4, at end insert—

'(7A) An inspector or constable acting under subsection (6) must seek the advice and certificate of a veterinary surgeon as soon as is practicable so to do.'.

Government amendment No. 78

Amendment No. 18, in clause 18, page 10, line 17, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

'(4) A court may not make an order under subsection (1) unless it has given the owner of the animal an opportunity to be heard, and—

(a) the prosecutor certifies that no prosecution is intended to be commenced, which certification shall be binding in respect of each animal the subject of the application, or

(b) it is satisfied to the criminal standard of proof that it is not reasonably practicable to communicate with the owner.'.

Amendment No. 19, in page 10, line 30, leave out subsection (6) and insert—

'(6) The appropriate national authority shall issue guidance about the exercise by a court of powers under subsection (1).

(7) In determining how to exercise its powers under this section, the court shall have primary regard to the welfare of the animal.'.

Amendment No. 20, in page 10, line 38, at end insert—

'(9) The Legal Aid Act 1988 shall have effect in relation to an application under this section as if those proceedings had been included in the definition of criminal proceedings under the Access to Justice Act 1999.'.

Amendment No. 21, in clause 22, page 11, line 41, at end insert—

'(1A) For the purposes of subsection (1), an inspector shall only be able to require the licence holder to produce records relevant to the previous 12 months.'.

Amendment No. 22, in clause 28, page 13, line 25, leave out 'this Act' and insert

'sections 8, 10, 11 or 30(9)'.

Amendment No. 23, in page 13, line 26, leave out 'three years' and insert 'twelve months'.

Amendment No. 24, in clause 29, page 14, line 3, leave out from 'liable' to end of line 7 and insert—

'(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 51 weeks, or a fine not exceeding £20,000, or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or a fine not exceeding £20,000, or to both.'.

Amendment No. 26, in clause 30, page 15, line 5, at end insert—

'(4A) A person appointed under subsection (4)(a) must be a veterinary surgeon or other person who the court is satisfied has the appropriate training and qualifications in, and experience of, animal welfare.'.

Amendment No. 119, in page 15, line 22, at end insert

',where it is appropriate so to do in the interests of the animal.'.

Amendment No. 120, in clause 32, page 17, line 4, at end insert

',where it is appropriate so to do in the interests of the animal.'.

Amendment No. 121, in clause 33, page 17, line 26, at end insert—

'(c) whether it is appropriate so to do in the interests of the animal.'.

Amendment No. 133, in clause 42, page 22, line 15, at end insert

'in accordance with its interests'.

Government amendment No. 61

Amendment No. 109, in clause 57, page 30, line 19, at end insert—

'(3A) Subsection (3) does not apply to a yard or garden where an animal is in the open and can clearly be seen from public land.'.

Amendment No. 1, in schedule 3, page 42, line 25, at end add—

'Gambling Act 2005

15(1) In section 25 of the Gambling Act 2005 after subsection (3) insert—

"(3A) The Commission shall publish guidance under subsection (1) to the appropriate local authorities for the provision of the welfare of greyhounds, including—

(a) independent veterinary attendance at race meetings,

(b) the provision of welfare protection for retiring greyhounds,

(c) the identification of greyhounds,

(d) the licensing of kennels, and

(e) track layout and condition.".'.

Mark Pritchard: The new clause is intended to end the sale of endangered animals on the internet. It follows on from my ten-minute Bill, which was presented to the House on 31 January. Hon. Members will know that it is illegal to buy and sell endangered animals, but the fact is that that trade goes on every single day and is growing. It is increasingly being used by serious criminals to raise revenue for other activities that they are involved with.

The new clause would introduce third party responsibility, not least in relation to those who are involved on the internet through internet service providers. ISPs increasingly say to us that the volume of traffic and chatter on the internet is too great. I was in my office in the House of Commons some weeks ago and went online. Hon. Members will be astonished to know that I could have purchased a leopard, an American bald eagle, an alligator, a chimpanzee, a dromedary camel and many other endangered animals.

It is not good enough any more for internet service providers to say that they do not know what is going on through their infrastructure systems. As I said, they say that there is too much chatter and that the volume of traffic is too great to monitor such things. However, we know that internet service providers have been very successful in working with the police and law enforcement agencies to deal with child pornography through the work of the Internet Watch Foundation. I congratulate the Internet Watch Foundation on the good work that it does. If we can regulate—rightly so—child pornography on the internet, which is clearly illegal, internet service providers could do more to stop the sale of endangered animals on the internet. Some of those animals may well be extinct in a decade. The Government and the House have a responsibility to play their part to ensure that that does not happen. Hon. Members may have seen the new BBC series, "Planet Earth", featuring David Attenborough, at the weekend. There were some marvellous animals on display in that programme, including the mountain leopard.

Sir Patrick Cormack: It was a snow leopard.

Mark Pritchard: It was, and I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. In fact, the mountain leopard is also an endangered species. Whether we are talking about a snow leopard or a mountain leopard, the fact is that they are endangered and it is incumbent on us all, as Members of Parliament who value the natural environment, to use this opportunity to ensure that internet service providers do far more to protect them.

Norman Baker: I welcome the new clause and agree that the proposal is important. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Home Office has shown that action can be taken on child pornography and that therefore the mechanism is already in place to achieve what he wants to achieve, which I support? Does he agree that the Home Office ought to do rather more than it is doing at present on the matter?

Mark Pritchard: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, but I would not wish to be adversarial today. I know that the Government wish to do all that they can through the Bill to safeguard the welfare of all animals. The relationship between the Opposition and the Government has been constructive throughout all the Bill's stages and I am sure that the Minister would wish that to continue today—specifically in relation to my new clause, of course.

8.45 pm

The Government are considering filtering, monitoring and regulating violent pornography on the internet and the Home Office is holding discussions on the matter. I welcome the fact that filtering on the internet will be extended in that regard. Internet service providers need to be careful that they are not viewed as aiding and abetting an illegal trade that is growing and being used more and more by serious criminals. If ISPs can regulate political thought in China, given the amount of chatter and volume of traffic produced by a population of such a size, the very least that they can do is to filter and monitor, and to assist law enforcement agencies and wildlife crime officers in constabularies—super-constabularies—throughout the nation to try to track down people who peddle such an evil crime.

Internet service providers have the opportunity to use animal welfare to give them a legitimate competitive advantage. They could differentiate their product by marketing themselves, as Marks and Spencer has successfully done in the past few weeks and months, as an animal welfare company. Given the choice, many of my constituents would prefer to give their business to an ISP that cares about the problem than to an ISP that does not give two hoots about the sale of endangered animals on the internet—perhaps that is fitting because one can even get owls on the internet. Rather than ISPs saying that the requirement would be an affront to their business models or an assault on their bottom-line profit margins, they should see the situation in the round and realise that they could get a competitive advantage for their business.

Of course, ISPs could take immediate action. I hope that the Government will support my new clause and move swiftly within the 12-month period set out in subsection (1) to get regulations in place. ISPs should make it clearer in their terms and conditions that those who sign up as customers should not partake in any illegal activity, including such sales. I am relaxed about the activity being specified and stipulated in the terms and conditions and set out as a distinct illegal activity.

The reporting of illegal activity should be made much easier. If one sees any illegal activity on some ISPs, one must dig deep in the small print to find out how to report it. I asked ISPs several months ago how many staff responded to any illegal activity that is brought to their attention vis-à-vis the sale of endangered animals on the internet and how quickly they responded. I was horrified to hear that often only a handful of people filter through a lot of reports of all sorts of illegal activity late at night. I am afraid that the sale of endangered animals on the internet was pretty much at the bottom of the pile. With the Government's assistance, I hope that new clause 2 will ensure that the illegal activity is taken more seriously by ISPs and the Government.

I hope that the Government's actions under subsection (1) will include a public awareness campaign. I have long called for a national animal welfare day, but we have not yet had a response from the Minister on that. I am happy for him to take all the credit and glory for the idea—let us just have it. I was also hoping to hear about a legal helpdesk at DEFRA. Many people are not sure about what is and what is not illegal, and it would be helpful to have one desk officer who is an expert on the internet.

As I said in the House some weeks ago when I introduced my ten-minute Bill, the Home Office should set targets for prosecutions of people who have been caught selling endangered animals on the internet. This Government are very keen on targets, and rightly so in many respects. It will horrify Members that last year there were only two successful prosecutions of people involved in this trade, and they were for dead endangered animals, not live ones. The trade in live endangered animals continues. We do not know where they have come from, whether they have been snatched from their mothers' arms, whether they have been transported in an animal welfare-friendly way—I doubt it—or where they are going to reside, whether it be in a small box room at the back of some tower block or in a cage in somebody's cellar. However, we can interdict these evil crimes given the political will.

If the Government are not prepared to support the new clause, that will make a mockery of the whole Bill, which would be a great shame given their commitments on this issue. We have waited a very long time for this Bill, which brings together many other pieces of legislation. We have not seen such a Bill for many decades, and we may not see another such for many decades. The Government say that they are the iPod generation, and that they are committed to information technology and the internet age. If so, this is a window of opportunity for them to show that they are committed in terms of animal welfare as well.

There is dispute in the courts about the downloading of music on the internet, and I understand that the judge has demanded information about the people concerned. I will not mention the case for obvious reasons. The principle of the courts saying, "We want ISPs to give us the information about alleged illegal activity" has now been established. A similar legal wrangle is going on in the United States, where the authorities are asking for information from ISPs about people who have searched for particular words or phrases—"terrorism", "chemical attack", or whatever it might be. That battle is going on.

[Mark Pritchard]

I should like to make a prediction, although that is a dangerous thing for politicians to do. I predict that unless the Government catch up with the will of the people and with consumer discernment about differentiating which ISPs are animal-friendly and which are not, and unless they act swiftly, they will be left behind where the courts and consumers have led. That is not something that the Government would want to be seen to be neglecting, and I am therefore positive that the Minister will be supportive of the new clause.

In conclusion, the objectives of the new clause are to ensure that Her Majesty's Government commit to a timetable, that ISPs take responsibility for aiding and abetting the growing crime, and that ending the sale of endangered animals on the internet has statutory force. The new clause provides a genuine opportunity—it is now down to you, Minister.

Shona McIsaac: I want to speak to new clause 10, the subject of which is circus animals. We debated the matter on Second Reading and held a lengthy discussion on it in Committee, although most of the debate was probably simply my arguing the case against performing animals in circuses.

I do not want to reiterate all the reasons that I gave in Committee for believing that animal welfare standards cannot be fulfilled in a travelling circus environment. The nature of the travelling gives cause for concern. Rules and regulations govern the transport of farm animals, but there are none for circus animals. Rules and regulations govern the size of battery hens' cages, and we will phase out battery production in this country, but no rules or regulations govern the size of circus animals' cages and beast wagons.

In Committee, we had an interesting debate about definitions. We asked what sort of animals we would prohibit from travelling circuses: wild animals, non-domestic species, exotic species and so on. Although legal definitions exist, I believe that we got unnecessarily caught up in the definitions. I therefore tabled new clause 10, which develops the amendments that I tabled in Committee. Tabloid treatment of them would have been, "the total ban". I am trying to be more sophisticated in new clause 10. Protecting the welfare of circus animals is the end that I seek. I do not mind what method is used—a total ban or an amendment such as the new clause—as long as we achieve our end.

I listened to the Under-Secretary's comments in Committee about not wanting to include bans on the face of the Bill, although we did that with tail docking. He likes to have the power to make regulations and the new clause gives him that power in respect of any animal in a circus environment. If, following expert advice, it was deemed that the welfare needs of an animal could not be met, the Under-Secretary would have the power to prohibit its being kept in a travelling circus.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I presume that the Under-Secretary could also say that, if the conditions were right, the animal could continue in the circus.

Shona McIsaac: Yes, of course. The new clause provides for it to be demonstrated that the animal's welfare needs are fulfilled. I am trying to follow on from the Under-Secretary's comments in Committee. Speaking personally, I do not believe that the welfare needs can be fulfilled. Animal behavioural scientists do not believe that the welfare needs of those animals can be met. Organisations such as the Born Free Foundation, Animal Defenders International and the RSPCA feel that those welfare needs cannot be met. I appreciate that many of the hon. Members who are in the Chamber tonight will not have read the debate that we had in Committee, but I do not want to go over all those arguments again. However, there is strong evidence that those animals' welfare needs are not met in travelling circuses, which is why I have tabled the new clause.

9 pm

Peter Luff rose—

Shona McIsaac: I have seen the amendment that the hon. Gentleman has tabled to the early-day motion. Perhaps that is what he wants to ask me about.

Peter Luff: I want to ask the hon. Lady a genuine question. I am seeking her view, not trying to make a point. The Kiley-Worthington report, commissioned by the RSPCA, substantially challenges the hon. Lady's view that it is impossible to meet animals' welfare needs in touring circuses. Why does the hon. Lady dismiss the conclusions of Dr. Marthe Kiley-Worthington?

Shona McIsaac: I have read a far larger body of evidence that challenges those findings. That was one particular examination; there are others.

Mark Pritchard rose—

Shona McIsaac: Given what happened in the debate on tail docking, I do not want to take up the House's time by allowing everyone to intervene on me. There are other important amendments to be debated tonight. I shall take just a few more interventions, then I must make some progress.

Mark Pritchard: I have a lot of sympathy with the hon. Lady's new clause. Will she join me in condemning those circus owners reported in the Sunday press who allegedly said that if the new clause were adopted, they would be prepared to shoot their animals? Does that not illustrate the kind of welfare standards under which those animals might be living?

Shona McIsaac: The hon. Gentleman tempts me on that. Yes, I did read those comments. They came from a circus that is opening a two-week run in Grimsby—the next constituency to mine—tonight, and that had a two-week run in my constituency about this time last year. I know from people who have visited that circus that the proprietor is telling audiences that if the Government introduce provisions such as those in my new clause, he will destroy his animals. He has been telling that to audiences that include children, in spite of the fact that the Born Free Foundation has sanctuaries for lions and tigers and has said that it could give them homes. That demonstrates that person's attitude towards the animals in his care.

Bob Spink rose—

Miss Widdecombe rose—

Shona McIsaac: I shall give way first to the hon. Gentleman, and then to the right hon. Lady.

Bob Spink: The hon. Lady is being very generous in giving way. Will she be generous enough to acknowledge that many circus proprietors do stable and transport their animals in a decent manner? Indeed, it would not be in their interests to do otherwise, because the animals would be unable to perform and entertain the many people, including children, that they do. I believe that 18 per cent. of people visited a circus in this country in 2000. Will the hon. Lady give the House a list of the animals that would be allowed or proscribed under subsection (2) of her new clause?

Shona McIsaac: I have tried not to be prescriptive in the new clause, because of the nature of our debate in Standing Committee, in which we got rather caught up with which species would be covered and which would not. I hope that we can acknowledge the advice of animal behavioural experts and other interested organisations—

Bob Spink: Does the hon. Lady have some idea of what she is talking about? Give us some names.

Shona McIsaac: I am trying to be objective. I have my own view, and I do not believe that the welfare needs of animals are met by travelling circuses. That is a personal view, but I am trying—

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Shona McIsaac: I am trying to answer the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink). What I am trying to say is, "Let's have it based on evidence." A circus owner would have to show that an animal's welfare needs were being met. I am confident, as are many organisations, that they will not be met. Therefore, the Secretary of State would have the power to prohibit those animals being kept in circuses.

I heard what the hon. Gentleman said about the statistics. The statistics that I have from my constituency show that 78 per cent. of people would ban all animals from travelling circuses and 16 per cent. would— [Interruption.] Seventy-eight per cent. of my constituents who responded to me would ban all animals in travelling circuses. Of those, 16 per cent. would apply the ban to all wild animals. There is a lot of strong feeling on the issue.

I apologise. I said that I would give way to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe), and I shall do so now.

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for allowing me to intervene, and I wish to take her back to the argument she was making when I asked her to give way. She was dealing with circus owners who claim that they will shoot their animals if the proposal is carried. Will she reflect on the fact that we have perhaps heard all this before? Perhaps the House remembers that thousands of hounds were to be put down were we to put a ban on hunting.

Shona McIsaac: As ever, the right hon. Lady makes her point superbly and succinctly. I wish that I were as superb and succinct as she is on these issues.

My new clause proposes to try to get some read-across between the Zoo Licensing Act 1981 and circuses to ensure that the owners and proprietors of circuses cannot simply destroy the animals. If a zoo closes, the owner cannot inflict euthanasia on the animals. That is the law as it stands. If we applied the same standards to circuses, the circus owner who said that he would put down his animals would be breaking the law. Besides, these are valuable assets. Owners are far more likely to want to sell them, to be honest.

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for allowing me to intervene; I have two reasons for doing so. First, she has repeated what she said before my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) intervened on her, which is that her new clause would give the Secretary of State power to designate those animals that may not be kept in circuses. In fact, it would do the opposite. It assumes that no animal may be kept in a circus, unless the Secretary of State designates it.

That is an important distinction, which I hope the hon. Lady will not glide over, because her new clause would ban the keeping of poodles in a circus.

Shona McIsaac: No, it would not.

Mr. Turner: Yes, it would. It says:

"A person commits an offence if he uses or keeps in, or for the purposes of, a circus an animal not of a kind designated under subsection (2)."

That would be illegal until the Secretary of State had the evidence that it was not against the welfare interests of that animal. That might or might not be what the hon. Lady intends—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that interventions must be brief. He might have an opportunity later in the debate to take that point further.

Shona McIsaac: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Subsection (2) says that there must be scientific evidence to show

"that the welfare needs of animals . . . are likely generally to be met".

Poodles have been mentioned, which trivialises the issue. There are dogs that perform in circuses. Members of the Committee will recall that we touched on the subject at that stage. In some circuses that I know, dogs come in with the clowns and are in effect their pets. I do not seek to prohibit that, because there is sufficient evidence to suggest that the welfare needs of those animals will be met. The effect of the new clause will not be to ban all animals from being kept in circuses. [HON. MEMBERS: "It will."] That is not my interpretation.

[Shona McIsaac]

Mr. Turner: The hon. Lady is misinterpreting her own new clause. The effect of subsection (1) is to ban the keeping of any animal in a circus. Subsection (2) will then take effect, permitting the Secretary of State to exempt certain animals. We are talking about a ban, which will affect a poodle as it will affect a leopard. Only at that point will we be in a position to present evidence that it is not against the welfare interests of the poodle to be banned.

Shona McIsaac: That is not how I interpret the new clause, or how the people with whom I have been working interpret it. The principles are what I consider important. I have been asked what species I think it would be inappropriate to keep in circuses. I certainly think that it would be inappropriate to keep big cats in circuses, and, as I said in Committee, I think it inappropriate that Ming, the ancient black bear, is kept in a circus. [Laughter.]

Bill Wiggin: He is not that ancient.

Shona McIsaac: Apparently Ming is led into the ring and forced to drink some milk as part of his performance. [HON. MEMBERS: "Her performance."] Her performance, then.

Hon. Members have mentioned a circus elephant called Anne. Apparently the Great British circus, which is appearing in Grimsby, is importing an elephant from Germany for performances tonight. Another circus has been advertising for an alligator. I do not know how the welfare needs of an alligator can be met. If I were following that circus up the A1, I would keep well clear of any beast wagon. Those are the animals with which we are concerned. Talking of poodles detracts from the main concern of the vast majority of people in this country, which is the keeping of large cats, bears and elephants in travelling circuses.

Mark Pritchard rose—

Sir Patrick Cormack rose—

Shona McIsaac: I said that I would be brief. I wanted to be brief when we discussed tail docking. I will give way a little more, but I want to end my speech shortly.

Mark Pritchard: I am intrigued by what the hon. Lady said about—allegedly—an alligator going into the circus. I am led to believe that alligators are an endangered species. I should be grateful if, as a result of my intervention and the hon. Lady's comments, the Minister's officials investigated and spoke to the local constabulary. If it turns out that the alligator is to be in the circus, I trust that the necessary investigations will take place.

Shona McIsaac: I do not know whether the circus's advertisement was successful, but other advertisements have been placed asking for bottle-fed black bear cubs and the like. Circuses are trying to bring more animals in. I hope that people appreciate the essence of what I am trying to achieve.

Sir Patrick Cormack: From what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), it would appear that the hon. Lady is inadvertently contributing to the passage of another law of unintended consequences. Would it not therefore be sensible for her to discuss what she really wants to achieve with someone in the other place, where there are plenty of very learned lawyers who could doubtless frame an amendment that would exactly meet her requirements? We would then be able to incorporate in the Bill a measure that would allow poodles and other animals to perform, while providing an opportunity for the hon. Lady's misgivings to be adequately addressed.

9.15 pm

Shona McIsaac: I take that point. As I have said, I want a certain result; that certain animals are not kept in travelling circuses. I am happy to be guided as to how we get there; whether it is a simple one-line amendment or whether we give powers to the Secretary of State. Part of the reason for the amendment is to find out the Minister's stance, which will govern what I do. Having read recent press reports, I know that the Minister is sympathetic and is going in the same direction as me, although he may have a different way of achieving the result.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Minister wishes to confirm anything at this stage, but my understanding is that he wants to bring in regulations that will prohibit certain animals from being kept in travelling circuses and that he does want to start regulating the winter quarters of travelling and static circuses.

This is not quite a probing amendment but, as a result of the Minister's press statement, I wanted to put on the record tonight how we will achieve what I and many others want in terms of the keeping of large cats in travelling circuses. If the Minister is amenable to my suggestion, I will probably seek further clarification. If not, I would be inclined to push this to a vote. However, it depends on what my hon. Friend the Minister says.

I know that many others want to speak on many other subjects and I feel that I have detained the House for far too long this evening—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Some people are not terrible savvy; that tempts me to continue. I have taken the names of those who cheered there and I will not be quite so generous in giving way in future.

I hope the Minister will be sympathetic to what we are proposing and that the Government can take forward what I, my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and many others are trying to achieve. I hope that he will agree to that tonight.

Mr. Paice: If the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) were to force a Division on the amendment, there would be a free vote for my colleagues and myself. Speaking for myself, I am not quite sure where she thought she was getting to. Towards the end of her speech, she said that all she was seeking was some indication from the Minister as to what he was going to do. We all got that last week in the newspapers.

I made it clear in Committee that I do not particularly like the idea of wild animals in circuses, but I think that the matter is better dealt with by regulation, as it is conceivable—barely, in my view—that it is possible to meet their welfare needs by some means. If a circus cannot meet the necessary codes of practice and regulations laid down by the Government to meet the welfare needs of the animals, so be it; it cannot keep them. If it can, whatever the expense and however grand or palatial the accommodation, that is all right.

There is a risk that hon. Members are confusing the issue of the animal's welfare with the issue of whether or not it is right for an animal to perform for human entertainment. Those are two distinct debates—

Shona McIsaac rose—

Mr. Paice: I am sorry, but with respect the hon. Lady has had a good crack of the whip. [Interruption.] They are not all asleep, Madam Deputy Speaker. Despite the hon. Lady's best efforts, they are still awake.

There is a free vote on this issue and I certainly would prefer that it be dealt with by regulation, but as I said, my personal view is that it is not right to keep wild animals in a travelling circus.

New clause 2 was moved admirably by my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), who reminded the House that he has already introduced a private Member's Bill on the selling of animals on the internet. He feels very strongly about this issue as, indeed, do I and other hon. Friends, which is why we have added our names to his new clause. I do not know what the Minister intends to say, but I point out that I and most of my colleagues strongly support my hon. Friend in his efforts.

As we know, the internet has brought tremendous benefits to many, but it is also a means of dispersing information, products and goods that we perhaps do not want to be dispersed so easily. The hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) rightly intervened to point out that the Home Office has found a way of dealing with some aspects of paedophilia and child pornography on the internet, so it is only right that, if possible, the same methods be applied to the sale of animals. As my hon. Friend said, some species of animals are sensibly traded on the internet. The Farmers Guide website, for example, carries adverts for farm animals, which is perfectly logical, and one can look at them and then buy them. However, as he said, it is stretching the point when one can buy an animal such as a leopard, given that the seller does not know to whom they are selling the animal.

Subject to the Minister's response, we may want to divide separately at a later stage on new clause 6, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin), which returns us to the issue of abandonment. We discussed it in Committee and the Minister was helpful, pointing out that the abandonment of an animal would be an offence under the Bill's cruelty or welfare provisions, which we wholly support. He made it clear that the act of abandoning an animal is still an offence under the Bill, but that no explicit provision has been made for it because the Government do not want to make the Bill any longer or more complex than is necessary. Of course, we have already done just that through earlier votes this evening, and I am not sure that such considerations should be the guiding factor in getting animal welfare provisions right, given that we seem to visit these issues only once every 100 years.

Where somebody has abandoned an animal, it is uncertain whether that will trigger the cruelty offence or the welfare offence, which is why we still believe that abandonment should be treated as a separate offence. What could be more complex than not knowing whether the act of abandoning an animal constitutes a cruelty or a welfare offence? If we follow the Minister's argument to its logical conclusion, why did he need to include in the Bill separate offences of fighting, poisoning and mutilation, all of which could be covered under the cruelty or welfare provisions? In fact, he was right to include them as separate offences, and we believe that he should do the same with abandonment.

If we follow the Minister's reasoning even further by having two abandonment offences—a cruelty offence and a welfare offence—and we apply the logic to the other offences dealt with independently in the Bill, his argument falls apart. For example, if the fighting offence was dealt with in the same way as abandonment, an owner whose animal is involved in a fight but escapes unharmed would be subject to prosecution and punishment under the welfare offence only. I doubt whether many in this House would find that acceptable. The Select Committee expressed the concern that such changes to the legislation would weaken the existing law on animal abandonment, under which a person found guilty of abandonment is deemed to have committed a cruelty offence. The Abandonment of Animals Act 1960 shows that abandonment was deemed to be so serious an offence as to warrant a separate Act, so I find it difficult to understand why the Government now believe that it does not even deserve its own section in the Bill. I might also point out that the animal welfare legislation before the Scottish Parliament will retain abandonment as an offence in its own right.

Amendment No. 2 covers responsibility for a stolen animal. The issue was discussed in Committee, but we did not feel that the Minister really addressed the issue of who would be responsible for the welfare of a stolen animal. He said that

> "if someone were to take possession of an animal unlawfully, they would in most cases be considered to be responsible for it. They would, after all, almost certainly be 'in charge' of it on a temporary basis."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 17 January 2006; c. 28.]

No one would disagree with that, but it contains two important caveats in the words "in most cases" and "almost certainly". In the cases not covered by "most cases", who would be considered to be in charge of the animal? I hope that the Minister has had a chance to reconsider the issue in some depth and decide who would be in charge of a stolen animal in such circumstances. It is, after all, conceivable that someone who has stolen an animal may treat it improperly and be liable to prosecution, but we need to know who that would be.

[Mr. Paice]

Amendment No. 3 relates to mental and physical suffering. The Minister has recognised the point and will no doubt speak to his own amendment in a minute, but I welcome the Government's agreement to introduce that concept into the Bill.

Amendment No. 107 was tabled by the hon. Member for Lewes. I understand and sympathise with his objectives, but the drafting of clause 4(3)(c)(ii) is broad on the protection of property. I am not sure that I would go as far as he wishes and narrow it solely to the police and armed forces, because we have a huge private security industry. However, I hope that the Minister will consider narrowing the scope of that provision in the other place.

Amendment No. 17 covers similar ground to amendment No. 78. We welcome amendment No. 78 because the Government have basically accepted the arguments made in Committee. Clause 16 contains no requirement for an inspector or constable who acts without the approval of a veterinary surgeon to seek any further advice or to obtain confirmation that the right action was taken. Amendment No. 17 seeks to close that loophole and would guarantee that animals in distress would be treated according to expert advice. It would not remove the right or ability of an inspector or constable to act quickly, but it would ensure that they had to seek the advice and certificate of a veterinary surgeon as soon as practicable after the event.

Amendments Nos. 18, 19 and 20 cover substantial issues to do with offences and we may wish to divide the House on them as they fall to be considered. If an offence has not been committed or a person has not been criminally negligent, but they are no longer able to look after their animals, it would be right to take the animals away and give them a proper home where their needs could be met. Under clause 18 as drafted, it appears possible that someone could have their animal taken away from them even when they have not committed an offence or been unintentionally negligent. Amendment No. 18 would provide a resolution to that problem. It supports the principle of taking all steps possible to communicate with the owner of an animal to obtain their views on its future. That principle has been accepted by the Minister and is reflected in Government amendment No. 78, but we ask him to consider amendment No. 18 as well.

9.30 pm

The amendments also deal with an important matter that might place prosecutors in breach of the requirements of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to retain exhibits in connection with a prosecution. If a prosecution is mounted some time after a seizure, the animal that is the focus of the case may have been destroyed or disposed of. The Attorney-General's code of practice for investigators, which applies to anyone carrying out an investigation, sets out a duty to seize and retain all relevant exhibits that are the subject of an investigation for use in court, or for examination by the defence; failure to do so can result in the proceedings being dismissed.

As drafted, clause 18 could allow the destruction or disposal of an exhibit before the person who is to become a defendant has the chance to have the exhibit examined by his own experts. At the time that such an application is made, he will not know that there is a need for such an examination and might not object to disposal. Without the change proposed in the amendment, we suspect that clause 18 may be challenged under articles 6 and 8 of the European convention on human rights.

By inserting a new subsection, amendment No. 20 would provide that a financially constrained person who is unable to afford legal representation may have the benefit of a representation order.

Amendment No. 21 is designed simply to reduce the excessive bureaucratic burden that we all seek to lift from small businesses. Under clause 28, persons can be prosecuted for offences dating back three years. We have pressed the Minister on why three years was chosen. Such a provision could well mean that businesses have to keep records for three years. There are some 10,000 pet shops, kennels, catteries and grooming salons in England and Wales, many of them micro-businesses with only one or two employees, and requiring them to keep all that extra information for three years would impose an immense burden of red tape. We have rehearsed the arguments before, but I hope that the Minister has now had a chance to consider the matter further.

Amendments Nos. 22 and 23 are important amendments that would introduce an element of common sense in the prosecution of offenders who are suspected of committing offences under the Bill. The three-year period in which prosecutions under the welfare offence can be pursued is, we believe, too long. It demonstrates a lack of urgency and may throw up some practical problems. To take an extreme example, hamsters live for only two years, yet the Bill suggests that it might be possible to bring a prosecution three years after the offence. There are clear logistical problems. Clause 28 could require an animal—or, even worse, a dead animal—to be kept in custody for up to three years. We have raised the matter with the Minister, and rather than go through all the arguments again I shall merely express the hope that he will look favourably on our amendments.

Amendment No. 24 would have the same effect on the time limit, reducing the time limit for prosecutions under the welfare offence to a more practical 12 months.

Clause 29 provides what we consider to be unacceptably soft prison sentences for the worst crimes. When I raised the matter on Second Reading, the Secretary of State replied:

> "If the House feels that a change should be made, no doubt that can be considered."—[Official Report, 10 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 169.]

I hope that her comments were sincere—I am sure that they were—because I believe that we need to reconsider the issue. The proposed maximum sentence is 51 weeks, which early release schemes could halve. We do not believe that such a maximum sentence will always be sufficient.

We know that the Government are anxious to avoid the overcrowding that is now occurring in our prisons. They are encouraging the judiciary to reduce the period in custody and to use other forms of sentence. Again and again, we see sentencing policy being driven by the needs of the prison system rather than by the offence. We believe that to be wrong. It seems odd to have a situation where a pensioner refusing to pay his council tax could be imprisoned for longer than somebody guilty of an offence under this legislation. That is incorrect and the amendments address that issue.

Amendment No. 26 ensures that anybody appointed by the court to deal with the disposal of an animal where the court has decided to deprive the owner of it is a veterinary surgeon or otherwise has the appropriate training and qualifications. It may be self-evident that that should be necessary, but it should be in the Bill. There are many amendments and new clauses in the group and they are all worth while. I hope that the Minister will respond to them constructively.

Mr. Drew: The hour is getting late, so I shall be brief. I shall speak to new clause 10, which is tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), and make a couple of observations about other amendments in this group. I commend the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) on persevering with his important proposal, of which I am proud to be a sponsor. I wish him well. It may not advance at this stage, but it should do so in another place. I hope that the Government are taking careful note and will do something about it.

The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) raised many issues, but he is on to something with abandonment. We discussed that subject at length in Committee. The Government need to be clearer about what they will do about people who neglect their animals. The only thing that worries me is what is meant by abandonment. If one tries to bear down on people, they can get rid of their responsibilities by dumping the animal somewhere else. That form of extreme abandonment needs to be dealt with and prevented.

I am happy to put my name to new clause 10, but I wish to query a very helpful and responsive statement by my hon. Friend the Minister on 8 March. It might be called half a loaf: we did not get everything we wanted, but we got half of it. It is worth supporting. I hope that if and when the Minister is able to say a few things in response to my questions I will feel satisfied. People who have campaigned for a generation on this issue, whether Animal Defenders International or, more particularly, the Born Free Foundation, which feels passionately that it is wrong to have animals in circuses, certainly those that we used to call wild animals, will feel some vindication.

The interchange between my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who is no longer in the Chamber, was interesting. It clarified part of the problem, which is that if legislation lists what should be banned, those who wish to have rare species in their circuses can go for something even more exotic. The problem to which the hon. Gentleman alluded needs to be thought about very carefully. We should state what we will allow—if, indeed, we allow anything—rather than what we will not allow. That is simpler, even though it is more restrictive.

I largely welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister intends to clarify in secondary legislation what will be allowed, but I am somewhat concerned by the use in his statement of 8 March of the words "certain non-domesticated species". We would not expect a long list in a statement and we do not need one in this debate, but those words are fairly imprecise. I take it that the statement represents the Government's position, so once the principle has been established, it behoves my hon. Friend to clarify exactly which types of animal are inappropriate.

The list does not need to be exclusive, but how will the process be developed? It is good to hear that secondary legislation will be used, but what is the time scale for that? What are the possible repercussions of secondary legislation? As we know, someone from the circus fraternity has already said that he will take drastic action if the measure comes to pass. Would such animals be put into sanctuaries, or will someone else take them on? They might go to a permanent circus or a zoo. Will my hon. Friend clarify those issues?

My hon. Friend has given us half a loaf. Perhaps he could put some butter and jam on it, by giving us provisions that are long overdue. As Members on both sides of the House said, such a change is the essence of the Bill.

Peter Luff: We are actually talking about only one circus that uses wild animals—the Great British Circus. The hon. Gentleman said that if the circus had to get rid of its animals they could go to a permanently sited circus, so I understood that his attack was on the use of such animals in travelling circuses. However, although new clause 10 refers to winter quarters, it would apply to the use of animals in all circuses, not just static ones. I am confused about the purpose of the hon. Gentleman's new clause.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman is right, but I was not talking about new clause 10; I was trying to tease out from the Minister what his statement of 8 March would mean. I cannot speak for my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes, but if my hon. Friend the Minister can confirm that something really can be achieved through secondary legislation, I should be willing to withdraw new clause 10. Perhaps the measure could be made more robust in another place. I am reasonably happy that we have made progress, but I should like some clarification from my hon. Friend.

Norman Baker: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). I assure him that I have not been given the chop, as he suggested earlier, but have resisted the temptation to carry on in my present post. I am merely withdrawing from it for the time being. I am happy to give him that reassurance and correct his statement.

New clause 2 has much to commend it. The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) has highlighted an important issue which has not been properly dealt with in the Bill. More and more species—often endangered or exotic species—are being traded on the internet as pets, which is hardly a suitable medium to sell such animals. There is no guarantee that they will be properly looked after during transportation, or, if they are still alive when they arrive, that the people buying them will know anything about how to care for them. Of course, many of those animals are listed in CITES—the convention on international trade in endangered species—and should not be traded at all. So this is an important issue.

[Norman Baker]

As I said in an intervention, the Home Office has done some good work on countering child pornography, so the systems are in place in the Home Office to deal with such matters, and I hope that they will be taken more seriously than they have been so far. As the hon. Member for The Wrekin is my brother's MP, I shall pass on the news that he is doing something useful in the House when I next speak to my brother.

9.45 pm

New clause 6, on abandoned animals, is also something for which I have considerable sympathy, and if it were pressed to a vote, my colleagues and I would support it.

We heard a very long presentation about new clause 10, on circus animals, from the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) and a long discussion of it, too, all of which was slightly academic because we heard from the Minister last week that he intended to take some action on the matter. I very much welcome the statement that he made last week. We need to get to the stage, with which many people are comfortable, whereby dogs, horses and certain other animals can carry on in circuses and animals with much more complex needs—lions and tigers, and so on—do not end up in circuses any more. That is where the centre of gravity lies in the House, and the Minister seems to be getting there, so let us allow him to do so.

Incidentally, some of the animals shot by circus owners are doubtless endangered species, such as tigers, so I ask the Minister to investigate whether it is legal for circus owners to shoot endangered species if they no longer require them in their circuses.

The hon. Lady referred to Ming. Ming has clearly had a very bad deal. Ming deserves full respect and support from hon. Members, and I am sure that that will happen if the Minister's actions are forthcoming. Ming needs to achieve full potential, and I am sure that that will be achieved if we end up with the Minister's proposals.

I want to refer briefly to amendments Nos. 107, 108 and 109, which I tabled. I hope that, if the Minister has a chance, he will respond to them, because they deal with matters of concern. I particularly want to refer to amendment No. 107, to which the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) also referred. As the Minister knows, I have supported the Bill throughout, as have my Liberal Democrat colleagues. The thrust of clause 4, on unnecessary suffering, is the right way forward, but he will be aware that it uses the word "property", which is of great concern to me, as it seems to provide the opportunity for a large loophole—a significant exemption from the provision on unnecessary suffering in that clause.

When I raised the issue in Committee, the Minister mentioned that, for example, the police or the armed forces may need to use animals to defend property. I accepted that there might be occasions when it is necessary to use animals in those circumstances. However, in return, I asked the Minister to accept that, by including the word "property" without qualification, we could end up with the opportunity for a defence against the charge of causing unnecessary suffering being made to stick because property has been defended. The Minister has not qualified that word in any way, and I am very concerned that the use of the word "property" significantly weakens the clause on unnecessary suffering and provides a get-out for those who want to use that as an excuse. I tell the Minister quite seriously that he needs to do something about that, so I encourage him to respond to amendment No. 107 in particular, and I look forward to his comments on that matter. If he does not accept amendment No. 107, I hope that he will undertake to consider something similar in another place, as the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire suggested.

Amendment No. 108 also picks up points, to which the Minister responded in Committee, about people receiving animals as prizes. He will remember our discussion about ponies being won at gymkhanas and so on. My amendment recognises that individuals win prizes in such circumstances, but it imposes a duty on entrants, requiring them to be prepared to meet the animal's needs if they are successful in the draw. That would allow ponies to be raffled, but it puts the onus on the person winning the prize.

Finally, amendment No. 109 deals with a concern that I raised in Committee. The Minister will remember our discussions of the words "yard" and "garden". I expressed concern about the fact that there is a big difference between a yard in which an animal can be seen—people may have a genuine desire to intervene if they see that the animal is subject to unacceptable treatment—and a private area such as a garage. The Minister said that a yard could be enclosed, and asked whether we would like someone climbing over our back fence to deal with a problem.

Amendment No. 109 deals with his objection by defining a yard more closely. It says that the provision would not apply "to a yard or garden where an animal is in the open and can clearly be seen from public land."

That answers the point that the Minister made in Committee, so the example that he gave of an enclosed garden would no longer be a problem. The amendment is constructive and tries to meet his concerns while retaining my point about the area being seen from public land. If there is a vote on new clauses 2 and 6, or new clause 10, I shall recommend to my colleagues that we support those provisions. I shall be grateful if the Minister responds to amendment No. 107 when he has the opportunity.

Peter Luff: I half expected the Minister to have caught your eye by now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as he might have things to say about new clause 10 that will help the House considerably.

I shall speak mainly to new clause 10, and I share the reservations expressed by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) about the use of wild animals in circuses, but emphatically not domestic animals. He struck the right balance and correctly identified the centre of gravity. I have taken an interest in circuses for some time, largely because I was at school with Billy Smart's grandson. I remember the great days of the big animal circuses such as Bertram Mills at Olympia. During the interval, a cage was erected and the lions and tigers were brought in. That has all gone. There is only one circus left in the UK with a significant number of wild animals—the Great British Circus—and two more circuses have one or two animals, whose life expectancy is limited. The measure is therefore a sledgehammer to crack a nut.

Circus people are not properly understood, which is a tragedy. We belong to the nation that invented the circus, which was created across the road, on the site of St. Thomas' hospital, yet every other nation celebrates it much more than we do. It is a glorious unsubsidised art form that brings the performing arts to societies and communities that would not otherwise see them. It introduces hundreds of thousands of children every year to the glories of performance. The circus is already under threat from the Licensing Act 2003, but I have received helpful signals from the Government that they may look at ways of reducing the burdens of bureaucracy, cost and inflexibility that it has imposed. If new clause 10 were accepted, resulting in the loss of both domestic and wild animals from the performing routine of the circus, it would be a devastating blow to the appeal of circuses to the UK market.

Mark Pritchard: Would my hon. Friend clarify the point that he is making and say whether there are any circumstances in which circus animals should not be kept?

Peter Luff: I do not want to get into a big debate about the evidence for and against the welfare benefits for animals of appearing in circuses. There is a great deal of academic research that shows that many animals benefit from the learning experience in the circus. As long as their transport and housing conditions are good, there is no problem at all.

Mark Pritchard indicated dissent.

Peter Luff: My hon. Friend may shake his head in disbelief, but that is the scientific evidence.

I want to put on record my concern about the nature of the campaign fought by Animal Defenders International. They produced opinion poll research which appeared to show very large majorities against the use of animals in circuses. In fact, MORI has now admitted to the circus industry that the poll should never have been published, because of the prejudicial way in which the questions were ordered and the nature of those questions. A new poll conducted by MORI for the circus industry shows that over 60 per cent. of people have no objection specifically to the use of horses in circuses. Public opinion, honestly sought, does not want a ban.

I know that much has been said about the inimical conditions of circuses for animals when they are being toured. I do not agree. Last summer I made it my business to go and see two circuses which tour horses—Gifford's circus and Zippo's circus—and I saw for myself the excellent conditions in which they are kept. It is worth quoting a description of the transportation conditions for a typical circus in the UK. Martin Burton states in a letter to the Minister:

"Since many of the discussions focused on transporting animals I would like to address this specifically. The practice at my circus is that after their last performance the 7 horses and ponies are loaded into their horse transporter and driven to the next venue. Since my circus travels mainly within the M25 these journeys are between 5 miles and 25 miles long and it is rare for journey times to be longer than one hour. The stables are then immediately erected at the new venue, in an area which has already been marked out for them. Erecting the stables takes less than an hour. The horses are then unloaded and stabled on clean bedding with fresh water and best quality hay. So the average journey time takes one hour, and the time the horses wait in the horse transporter while the stables are built up is less than one hour. The whole process is over in less than 2 hours. These moves happen once a week, or sometimes once a fortnight.

The stalls themselves are large loose boxes"—

I have seen them and I can confirm that—

"which were designed in consultation with Born Free. Each horse has an individual loose box which is EXACTLY the same as found in many riding schools and racing stables. The stable is a purpose built tent which is warm and dry. In cold weather the horses are rugged up for extra warmth but since the circus does not operate in the winter extreme cold is not an issue."

So circuses have pretty humane conditions for the domestic animals that they tour.

The circus industry has no problem with regulation and welcomes the constructive discussions that it has been having with the Minister's Department about a new regulation. Circuses have concerns about the inadequacy of the current regulatory regime that they face, which is little more than a rubber-stamping exercise. The circuses are developing codes of conduct. Circus bodies such as PAWSI—Performing Animals Welfare Standards International—are in discussion with the Department. New regulations on animal husbandry in circuses are being developed by a DEFRA working group, which includes representatives from the Born Free Foundation, the RSPCA, the Animal Consultants and Trainers Association, the Kennel Club, the Arts Council, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, the Dogs Trust, the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and so on.

The news is extremely good. The approach that the Minister will set out to the House will, I think, commend itself to the House and to circuses. There have been some ludicrous situations in the past. In my home city, Worcester, a few years ago, when the city was under different political control, a circus applied to erect its tent, with only horses, in the middle of a race course. The local authority would not permit that because it considered that the circus was cruel to the animals. On that racecourse many horses will die every year. The bizarre hypocrisy of not allowing a circus, which relies on well trained and much loved horses, to set up in Pitchcroft in the middle of Worcester, while every year horses die on the race course around it, was extraordinary.

I believe passionately that circus needs to be protected, defended articulately and supported, not demonised as it often is, or neglected. I quote from a marvellous article written in The Guardian by a journalist called Dea Birkett about seven years ago. She wrote:

"The circus people I met were not elephant-beating barbarians. They were a small, disenfranchised people, struggling to survive against odds that would have defeated almost anyone else. Animal-rights groups—including the RSPCA—should negotiate with people who travel, live and work with their animals. Instead of shouting outside the circus gates, instead of leaning on councils, they should sit down and talk. They should argue for better conditions in circuses. They should treat circus people as they treat all other people who keep animals—not as freaks, but with respect. Our last travelling players should be cherished."

[Peter Luff]

I hope that what the Minister says to us in a few minutes will show that he is prepared to cherish those travelling players.

Mr. Bradshaw: I apologise to those Conservative Members who served in Committee if I do not respond to their specific points, but I shall write to them. If they choose to intervene—

Mr. Hollobone: I am not sure whether this is an intervention, a point of order or merely an inquiry, but I have not had the chance to move my amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. All that matters at this stage is that the lead amendment has been moved.

10 pm

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) moved new clause 2, which was supported by Conservative Front Benchers, and we take the issue seriously. Most of his speech dwelled on the problem of the trade in endangered species, but he will appreciate that the Animal Welfare Bill is not the best place to deal with the matter. CITES restricts the trade in endangered species, and if the trade is illegal, then it is illegal on the internet. I know that the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), has held constructive talks with Home Office Ministers about what more can be done to tighten up the hon. Gentleman's particular area of concern.

The regulatory impact assessment makes it clear that we intend to address the issue, but we are not prepared to allow ourselves to be tied to the hon. Gentleman's time scale of making regulations within one year. If we were to tie ourselves to his time scale but were unable to achieve the objective, there is a danger that we would be unable to do anything at all. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that point and withdraws his new clause.

Mark Pritchard: Notwithstanding the Minister's comments, prosecutions are not being brought under the existing legislation. New clause 2 relates directly to third parties and internet service providers, which are aiding and abetting that illegal and evil practice. The Bill is an opportunity for the Government to stand by their warm words on animal welfare, and if they want to pass by that opportunity, then people outside this Chamber should know about it.

Mr. Bradshaw: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern, but I repeat that this is the Animal Welfare Bill, which does not cover the illegal trade in endangered species.

Government amendment No. 61 fulfils a commitment that I made in Committee. The Government always intended that the concept of suffering, wherever it occurs in the Bill, should include both mental and physical suffering. We thought that point self-evident, so we did not include a definition in the Bill, but because of the unease expressed in Standing Committee, I agreed to table an amendment to put the meaning of the concept beyond doubt. Government amendment No. 61 defines suffering clearly, wherever it is mentioned in the Bill.

In Committee, the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) drew our attention to the point that an inspector or constable could feasibly exercise his powers under clause 16 without the person responsible for the animal in question being aware of it, and we agree that that point requires rectification. That is why we tabled Government amendment No. 78, which requires an inspector or constable to notify a person responsible for the animal in question as soon as reasonably practicable.

On new clause 6, I made it clear in Committee that we have not replicated the specific offence of abandonment, because it would be unnecessary. Abandonment is merely one way in which either the welfare offences or the cruelty offences can be committed. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has asked why we have made poisoning, mutilation and fighting special offences, but not abandonment. Those three offences do not necessarily involve suffering, which is why they are included separately. In Committee, we discussed administering heroin to a dog, mutilating an animal under anaesthetic and betting on an animal fight, all of which are offences. I also have concerns about the definition of abandonment in new clause 6, which we believe would risk catching the release of game birds or fish into a stream or pond or the release of animals on to common land. I am sure that Conservative Members do not want to prevent those activities.

Bill Wiggin rose—

Mr. Bradshaw: I will not give way, because I have very little time left.

From our proceedings in Committee and today, we are well aware of how strongly my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) feels about circuses. I hope that she and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) were reassured by the written statement on the use of animals in travelling circuses that I gave the House last Wednesday. For the benefit of hon. Members who have not read the statement, it contained an undertaking to use a regulation under clause 10 of the Bill to ban the use of certain non-domesticated species in travelling circuses and to impose zoo standards on circuses' permanent premises.

As I have previously indicated, I sympathise with the view that performances by some non-domesticated species in travelling circuses are not compatible with meeting their welfare needs. I have also said that the welfare offence in clause 8 will be a significant step forward for circus animals, as it will for all animals. However, having listened carefully to my hon. Friends and Opposition Members on Second Reading and in Committee, I have concluded that a regulation under clause 10 will provide much needed clarity to both circus proprietors and enforcers on which animals' needs can be met adequately in a travelling circus environment. I have also undertaken to see that there is read-across between zoo standards and those for circuses' permanent premises. I trust that that undertaking will address my hon. Friends' concerns.

Shona McIsaac: I have been listening carefully to what the Minister has said following his statement to the House. Will he give us clarification on the timings—I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) has asked a similar question? I think that the statement said that the Minister would be undertaking consultation shortly, so will he give me some time scales? Will zoo licensing regulations also read-across to static circuses?

Mr. Bradshaw: I have already addressed static circuses. As I said in Committee, when we consider time scales, we will want to make the matter a priority.

Amendment No. 2 relates to responsibility for a stolen animal. As I explained to the hon. Member for Leominster in Committee, we believe that the amendment is unnecessary. More than one person can be responsible for an animal. Just because an owner is responsible for an animal, it does not mean that someone else who is in charge of the animal is not considered to be responsible for it, even if that responsibility is temporary, as is the case for a stolen animal. The person or persons responsible are required to take such steps as are reasonable to ensure the animal's welfare. Clearly, if someone's animal has been stolen, there are few such steps that that person could reasonably be expected to take.

Amendment No. 107 was tabled by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker). While I have the chance, may I give him my thanks and express my regret at his departure from the Front Bench? He has made an important contribution to the Bill and the cause of animal welfare in general. I have appreciated the co-operative way in which he has worked with me and the hon. Member for Leominster on the Bill.

We explored the question of protecting property at considerable length in Committee. I note that I have succeeded in persuading the hon. Member for Lewes—a bit, at least—that there are legitimate considerations in some situations. As I said in Committee, the protection of property is not an absolute defence against the offence of cruelty, but one factor that a court may take into account. That does not indicate a belief on my part that property rights should somehow trump animal suffering. It simply reflects the reality that the protection of property might justify some animal suffering in certain circumstances. I cited the example of the use of riot horses by the police in Committee and clearly the hon. Gentleman has accepted that. I also gave the Committee the example of guard dogs that are used by private individuals to protect their homes or businesses. Sometimes, unfortunately, a guard dog will be injured by a person who threatens a property. For example, a burglar might hit a dog when it restrains him. In principle, that person could be held responsible for its suffering by virtue of clause 4(2). I hope that hon. Members will agree that that is an example of the protection of property being a legitimate purpose outside the police and armed forces.

Norman Baker: Just as the Minister successfully constructed a list of tightly drawn exemptions for tail docking, why could he not construct tightly constrained exemptions to limit the use of the protection of property as a defence?

Mr. Bradshaw: Because it is best to leave that up to the discretion of the courts.

On amendment No. 108, I understand the motives of those who want a complete ban on giving an animal as a prize, but the Government have taken the view that it would be overly intrusive to dictate that an adult is not capable of making an informed and responsible decision about their ability to care for an animal on offer. As long as an adult is ultimately responsible for the decision to enter a competition in which an animal might be won, the Government do not feel that it is proper to interfere.

Amendment No. 17 would create a requirement for a vet to see an animal after it had been seized under clause 16. I can understand what the hon. Member for Leominster is trying to achieve. In practice, however, if an inspector removes an animal in a hurry because it is suffering or likely to suffer, and it is not reasonably practicable to wait for a vet, I cannot envisage a situation whereby he would then retain the animal without seeking veterinary advice. Indeed, if a person takes a suffering animal into their care under clause 16(6), they have, in effect, assumed responsibility for it, and they might fail to meet their obligations under clause 8 if they do not take it straight to a vet for attention and advice. We do not therefore think it necessary to include such a requirement in the Bill.

Amendment No. 18 deals with certifying that there would be no prosecution before an animal is disposed of. As I explained in Committee, an order can be made under clause 18 before a conviction is obtained or before a prosecution is started. In fact, an order can be made if a prosecution never takes place. A prosecution can take months to come to a conclusion, and it is sometimes necessary to take a decision about an animal's future without waiting that long. In some cases, a prosecution will not be in the public interest at all—for example, where the animal's owner is elderly or mentally impaired—but it will nevertheless be necessary to take a decision about the fate of the animal. That is what clause 18 allows.

Amendment No. 23 would reduce the time limit for prosecutions from three years to 12 months. As I explained in Committee, three years was chosen to reflect the Animal Health Act 2002, which inserted an extension to three years of the time limit in the Animal Health Act 1981. We believe that it is sensible to impose the same time limit for a welfare offence prosecution as for prosecutions of offences relating to animal health. There are precedents in more than 60 other pieces of legislation covering subjects such as agriculture, food safety and trades descriptions for a long-stop prosecution period of three years in place of the usual six months in summary cases.

The RSPCA told us of a case two years ago in which one of its inspectors found a dead dog in a cupboard under the stairs. The owner of the house admitted that he had starved the dog to death. However, because a vet estimated that the dog had died more than six months previously, the RSPCA was unable to prosecute. We do not believe that it is right that a person should get away with such animal cruelty simply because he has been successful in hiding the evidence or the evidence does not come to light quickly.

[Mr. Bradshaw]

Amendments Nos. 22 and 24, tabled by the hon. Member for Leominster, would create a two-tier system of offences whereby offences under clauses 8, 10, 11 and 30(9) would be subject to a time limit of one year, and more serious offences would be triable either way and therefore not subject to any time limit. They would also impose a maximum penalty of a level 5 fine and 51 weeks' imprisonment. My Department has considered very carefully where the balance needs to be struck in terms of which court should handle cruelty cases and what the penalties should be. I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's view that we should treat those who cause animal suffering more harshly than we do currently. However, we are already increasing the fines that a magistrate can impose. Moreover, it is important that in offering animals the protection that they need and deserve under our law, we maintain consistency with other criminal offences.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Does the Minister agree that a 13-week maximum custodial sentence for the worst cases of animal cruelty is insubstantial and insufficient, and sends out exactly the wrong message to organised criminals who are engaging in offences such as cruelty and dog-fighting?

Mr. Bradshaw: As we discussed in Committee, it is not strictly the case that the penalty would be a maximum of 13 weeks—not, at least, until custody plus is introduced. If sentences were served consecutively, they could be longer. The main point is that we are quadrupling the maximum fine and doubling the maximum custodial sentence. Existing penalties that magistrates imposed on the 800 cases that were brought before them under the Protection of Animals (Amendment) Act 2000 do not suggest a need to increase the maximum limit. Courts are not using existing powers. We explored that point at some length in Committee.

We are also advised that increasing sentences beyond what the Bill proposes would be disproportionate and inconsistent with our handling of offenders who have committed other offences.

Amendment No. 109 tackles some but not all the arguments that I presented in Committee. With respect to the hon. Member for Lewes, I do not agree that we have got the definition wrong. As soon as we try to define "private dwelling", we have to strike a balance. The question of which part of someone's property should be considered their private dwelling will always be a matter of degree. It is not possible to make a definition so watertight that there will be no borderline cases. The hon. Gentleman had such a borderline case in mind: a dog in a garden that an inspector can see from the public path outside the house. The amendment deals with one of the points that I made in Committee, namely that an emergency could only be perceived and that we could not run the risk of allowing unfettered access to private homes when emergencies were only perceived.

However, I do not agree that the visibility of an animal changes the balance of interests. If someone can clearly see my animal through my front-room window, should that change the balance of interests? Whether it is in my garden or in my front room, it is on my private property. Either way, my animal is suffering or likely to suffer. If the hon. Gentleman wanted to force my front door to get to my animal in the front room, he would need a warrant. There is no difference between the two examples, either to my interests or my animal's, so why make the distinction?

I understand that there are enduring concerns about the definition but the balance must be struck somewhere and we are satisfied that we have got it right. There will be difficult cases but that is inevitable and the police have reassured us that acquiring a warrant will not be a significant problem when there is a clear case.

The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) did not have an opportunity to speak about amendment No. 1, so I shall deal with it and then give him a chance to intervene in the remaining two or three minutes. When the Gambling Act 2005 was debated, consideration was given to attaching minimal welfare provisions to the future licensing regime for greyhound tracks. Hon. Members will know that the Joint Committee on the Gambling Bill did not recommend that animal welfare issues should be included in the measure, despite receiving representations on that. Such provisions were not included because the Bill was on the horizon. It is more appropriate for tackling greyhound welfare and we intend to do that through the delegated powers in it.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful to the Under-Secretary for his generosity, which is much appreciated. However, the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs stated:

> "We are unconvinced by the argument that the greyhound racing industry should be allowed until 2010 to regulate itself and improve its own welfare standards."

Amendment No. 1, which has cross-party support, would amend the Gambling Act to ensure that proper greyhound welfare standards were introduced through the Bill. If I am lucky enough to test the opinion of the House, I hope that there will be a vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Bradshaw: As I said to the hon. Gentleman in Committee, we intend the Bill to improve the welfare of greyhounds. Indeed, the welfare offence will improve not only greyhounds' welfare but that of all animals before any regulation is introduced under secondary legislative powers. We have not ruled out regulating greyhound tracks if self-regulation proves not to work. As I said in Committee, we are keen to try to bring that process forward from 2010 if possible. I simply repeat that it is not the Gambling Commission's role to regulate animal welfare. That is why we believe that the amendment is perhaps not the most sensible way of proceeding.

Did the hon. Member for The Wrekin wish to intervene?

Mark Pritchard: I thank the Under-Secretary for giving me the opportunity but I was hoping for a longer opportunity at the end of the debate.

Mr. Bradshaw: I therefore urge the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mark Pritchard: I am very disappointed by the Government's response. There is a genuine opportunity for the House to send a clear signal to those who would trade in endangered animals on the internet that it will no longer be tolerated. They will be hunted down, just as they hunt down animals, prosecuted and sent to prison for peddling this evil trade.

I am also disappointed that, for Labour Members, there is a whipped vote against my new clause. However, Conservative Members have a free vote, which I welcome.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm what the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) said earlier—namely that it would not be his intention to cause any restriction on the sale of cattle or other farm animals, other than via markets?

Mark Pritchard: The fact is that there are people who trade in animals on the internet legally, although I would hope that any new clause that is accepted would ensure that the transport of such animals improves. Zoologists trade in endangered animals on the internet, but they have licences to do so.

New clause 2 addresses the growing problem of the sale of endangered animals on the internet. Serious criminals are using the internet for these purposes. I am disappointed to see the Minister shake his head, because we had discussions on animal welfare issues before I came into the House. I know that he sits uncomfortably next to his colleague, the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment, this evening by ruling out acceptance of my new clause.

The fact is that the next time we open our newspapers and see another case of an endangered animal being abused and perhaps dying in transit—

Mr. Bradshaw: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I repeat that the trade in endangered species has absolutely nothing to do with the Bill. That is covered by existing laws.

Mark Pritchard: The Minister's complacency is astonishing. The fact is that there have been only two prosecutions under the existing legislation to which he refers, yet the trade globally is worth £25 billion a year, and the trade from United Kingdom websites is worth tens of millions. So to suggest that existing legislation is catching these criminals does not give the full picture—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is misleading."] Well, I would not go that far. I know that the Minister is serious about animal welfare, so it is a mystery to me why he is not supporting the new clause. Have the Government been got at by internet service providers? I do not think so. I would not say that. However, the fact is that the next time we open our newspapers and read about cruelty to those endangered animals that we enjoy watching on documentaries while sitting comfortably at home, we will realise that we have missed an opportunity this evening. Members of animal welfare charities across the nation know that this has been a missed opportunity. This is an important Bill, and we might not have another opportunity to put such a clause into legislation. I feel let down, and I am sure that many other hon. Members feel let down. The endangered animals that are coming into our country across borders from around the world will certainly feel let down as well. I hope that the Minister will reconsider.

Mr. Hollobone: My hon. Friend mentioned missed opportunities. Animal welfare Bills come along only once every 100 years, and unless the House takes the decision tonight properly to regulate the greyhound industry, the chance will have been lost to transform the fate of 30,000 greyhounds—7,500 of which disappear every year—perhaps for another 100 years.

Mark Pritchard: My hon. Friend makes some valid points indeed, and I know that Labour Members will want to seize this opportunity. My new clause has cross-party support and my ten-minute Bill had cross-party support, so why are the Labour Whips preventing the new clause from being supported by those Members who previously supported my ten-minute Bill?

We all read our newspapers, and I refer to animal welfare stories that come across our desks every single day. I hope that Labour Members who feel that they have perhaps been bullied by the Whips might reconsider. I applaud the courage of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) in the face of the onslaught from his own side.

The fact is that this is a serious and growing issue, and I hope that the Government will reconsider their position. How can they have introduced such serious legislation to address such serious animal welfare issues and yet not have included a clause on such an obvious difficulty? This is a multi-million pound industry that is being driven by serious criminals, and we know that the problem is increasing because of wildlife crime statistics.

I am disappointed in the Government. The new clause is not heresy; it is a reasonable suggestion. I hope they will reconsider.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 128, Noes 280.

Division No. 190] [10.26 pm

AYES

| | |
|---|---|
| Ainsworth, Mr. Peter | Conway, Derek |
| Amess, Mr. David | Davey, Mr. Edward |
| Atkinson, Mr. Peter | Davies, Philip |
| Bacon, Mr. Richard | Dodds, Mr. Nigel |
| Baker, Norman | Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M. |
| Baldry, Tony | Dorries, Mrs. Nadine |
| Barker, Gregory | Drew, Mr. David |
| Barrett, John | Ellwood, Mr. Tobias |
| Beith, rh Mr. Alan | Fabricant, Michael |
| Benyon, Mr. Richard | Farron, Tim |
| Binley, Mr. Brian | Featherstone, Lynne |
| Bone, Mr. Peter | Foster, Mr. Don |
| Bottomley, Peter | Francois, Mr. Mark |
| Brake, Tom | Fraser, Mr. Christopher |
| Brokenshire, James | George, Andrew |
| Brooke, Annette | Gidley, Sandra |
| Browne, Mr. Jeremy | Goodwill, Mr. Robert |
| Bruce, Malcolm | Gove, Michael |
| Burstow, Mr. Paul | Gray, Mr. James |
| Burt, Alistair | Greening, Justine |
| Burt, Lorely | Harper, Mr. Mark |
| Cable, Dr. Vincent | Harris, Dr. Evan |
| Campbell, Mr. Gregory | Harvey, Nick |
| Carmichael, Mr. Alistair | Heath, Mr. David |

Hemming, John
Hermon, Lady
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holmes, Paul
Horwood, Martin
Howarth, David
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
McDonnell, John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Moore, Mr. Michael
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Öpik, Lembit
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rosindell, Andrew
Rowen, Paul
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Smith, Sir Robert
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Williams, Mark
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Wilson, Sammy
Wright, Jeremy
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mike Penning and Bob Spink

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Benn, rh Hilary
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clelland, Mr. David
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Farrelly, Paul
Fisher, Mark
Fitzpatrick, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Price, Adam
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn

Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Thornberry, Emily
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Parmjit Dhanda and Mr. Vernon Coaker

Question accordingly negatived.

It being more than five hours after the commencement of proceedings, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of the business to be concluded at that hour, pursuant to Order [this day].

Clause 5

MUTILATION

Amendment made: No. 38, in page 3, line 25, at end insert—

'( ) Nothing in this section applies to the removal of the whole or any part of a dog's tail.'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 7

FIGHTING ETC

Amendments made: No. 62, in page 4, line 3, leave out 'arranges' and insert 'causes'.

No. 63, in page 4, line 3, at end insert

'to take place, or attempts to do so'.

No. 64, in page 4, line 4, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 65, in page 4, line 5, at end insert—

'( ) knowingly receives money for admission to an animal fight;'.

No. 66, in page 4, line 5, at end insert—

'( ) knowingly publicises a proposed animal fight;'.

No. 67, in page 4, line 5, at end insert—

'( ) provides information about an animal fight to another with the intention of enabling or encouraging attendance at the fight;'.

No. 68, in page 4, line 9, at end insert—

'( ) has in his possession anything designed or adapted for use in connection with an animal fight with the intention of its being so used;'.

No. 69, in page 4, line 9, at end insert—

'( ) keeps or trains an animal for use for in connection with an animal fight;'.

No. 70, in page 4, line 9, at end insert—

'( ) keeps any premises for use for an animal fight.'.

No. 82, in page 4, line 10, after 'or' insert 'reasonable'.

No. 83, in page 4, line 11, at end insert—

'(2A) A person commits an offence if, without lawful authority or reasonable excuse, he—

(a) knowingly supplies a video recording of an animal fight,

(b) knowingly publishes a video recording of an animal fight,

(c) knowingly shows a video recording of an animal fight to another, or

(d) possesses a video recording of an animal fight, knowing it to be such a recording, with the intention of supplying it.

(2B) Subsection (2A) does not apply if the video recording is of an animal fight that took place—

(a) outside Great Britain, or

(b) before the commencement date.

(2C) Subsection (2A) does not apply—

(a) in the case of paragraph (a), to the supply of a video recording for inclusion in a programme service;

(b) in the case of paragraph (b) or (c), to the publication or showing of a video recording by means of its inclusion in a programme service;

(c) in the case of paragraph (d), by virtue of intention to supply for inclusion in a programme service.

(2D) Provision extending the application of an offence under subsection (2A), so far as relating to the provision of information society services, may be made under section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 (c.68) (powers to implement Community obligations by regulations) notwithstanding the limits imposed by paragraph 1(1)(d) of Schedule 2 to that Act on the penalties with which an offence may be punishable on summary conviction.'.

No. 84, in page 4, line 14, at end insert—

'"commencement date" means the date on which subsection (2A) comes into force;

"information society services" has the meaning given in Article 2(a) of Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce in the Internal Market (Directive on electronic commerce);

"programme service" has the same meaning as in the Communications Act 2003 (c. 21);

"video recording" means a recording, in any form, from which a moving image may by any means be reproduced and includes data stored on a computer disc or by other electronic means which is capable of conversion into a moving image.

( ) In this section—

(a) references to supplying or publishing a video recording are to supplying or publishing a video recording in any manner, including, in relation to a video recording in the form of data stored electronically, by means of transmitting such data;

(b) references to showing a video recording are to showing a moving image reproduced from a video recording by any means.'—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 14

Making Codes of Practice: Wales

Amendments made: No. 79, in page 8, line 9, leave out from 'force' to end of line 10 and insert

'in accordance with its provisions.'.

No. 80, in page 8, line 11, leave out

'An order under subsection (3)'

and insert

'A code (or revised code)'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 16

Powers in Relation to Animals in Distress

Amendment made: No. 78, in page 9, line 17, at end insert—

'( ) If a person exercises a power under this section otherwise than with the knowledge of a person who is responsible for the animal concerned, he must, as soon as reasonably practicable after exercising the power, take such steps as are reasonable in the circumstances to bring the exercise of the power to the notice of such a person.'—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 19

Seizure of Animals Involved in Fighting Offences

Amendments made: No. 71, in page 10, line 41, leave out from 'that' to 'an' in line 42 and insert

'it is one in relation to which'.

No. 85, in page 10, line 42, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'.

No. 72, in page 10, line 42, at end insert 'has been committed'.

No. 73, in page 11, line 15, leave out from 'animal' to 'an' in line 16 and insert 'in relation to which'.

No. 86, in page 11, line 16, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'.

No. 74, in page 11, line 16, after '7' insert 'has been committed'.

No. 75, in page 11, line 17, at end insert—

'( ) In this section, references to an animal in relation to which an offence under section 7(1) or (2) has been committed include an animal which took part in an animal fight in relation to which such an offence was committed.'—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 20

Entry and Search Under Warrant in Connection with Offences

Amendment made: No. 39, in page 11, line 30, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails],'—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 21

Entry for Purposes of Arrest

Amendments made: No. 40, in page 11, line 36, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 87, in page 11, line 36, after 'to' insert '6 and'.

No. 88, in page 11, line 36, after '7' insert '(1) and (2)'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 29

Imprisonment or Fine

Amendment proposed: No. 24, in page 14, line 3, leave out from 'liable' to end of line 7 and insert—

'(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 51 weeks, or a fine not exceeding £20,000, or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or a fine not exceeding £20,000, or to both.'—[Bill Wiggin.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 79, Noes 325.

Division No. 191] [10.42 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Atkinson, Mr. Peter
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bone, Mr. Peter
Bottomley, Peter
Brokenshire, James
Burt, Alistair
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Clark, Greg
Conway, Derek
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Fabricant, Michael
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Greening, Justine
Harper, Mr. Mark
Hayes, Mr. John
Hermon, Lady
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Horwood, Martin
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Leech, Mr. John
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Luff, Peter
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Price, Adam
Pritchard, Mark
Randall, Mr. John
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rosindell, Andrew
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Spink, Bob
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Watkinson, Angela
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Wilson, Sammy

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mike Penning and Mr. Brian Binley

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Baker, Norman
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Beith, rh Mr. Alan

Benn, rh Hilary
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brake, Tom
Brennan, Kevin
Brooke, Annette
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bruce, Malcolm
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Lorely
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Caton, Mr. Martin
Caveey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clelland, Mr. David
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael Cook, Frank
Cooper, Rosie
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Davey, Mr. Edward
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Elman, Mrs. Louise
Farrelly, Paul
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Fisher, Mark
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Foster, Mr. Don
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, Andrew
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harris, Mr. Tom
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Heath, Mr. David
Hemming, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Holmes, Paul
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Hopkins, Kelvin
Howarth, David
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunter, Mark
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Iranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Johnson, rh Alan
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Lynne
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Laws, Mr. David
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McDonnell, John
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moore, Mr. Michael
Morden, Jessica
Morgan, Julie
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mudie, Mr. George
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Pugh, Dr. John
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, Mr. Alan
Reid, rh John
Rennie, Willie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Rowen, Paul
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Bob
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheridan, Jim
Simpson, Alan
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, Sir Robert
Snelgrove, Anne
Soulsby, Sir Peter
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Stringer, Graham
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Stunell, Andrew
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Swinson, Jo
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, David
Teather, Sarah
Thornberry, Emily
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Usher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Webb, Steve
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David

Winterton, Ms Rosie
Wood, Mike
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Vernon Coaker and
Mr. Parmjit Dhanda

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 29

IMPRISONMENT OR FINE

Amendment made: No. 41, in page 14, line 3, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 30

DEPRIVATION

Amendment made: No. 42, in page 14, line 25, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 31

DISQUALIFICATION

Amendments made: No. 43, in page 16, line 15, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2),'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 34

DESTRUCTION IN THE INTERESTS OF THE ANIMAL

Amendments made: No. 44, in page 17, line 36, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 89, in page 17, line 36, after first 'to' insert

'6, 7(1) and (2) and'.

No. 90, in page 18, line 24, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'. .—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 35

DESTRUCTION OF ANIMALS INVOLVED IN FIGHTING OFFENCES

Amendments made: No. 91, in page 18, line 28, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'

No. 76, in page 19, line 9, leave out second 'an' and insert 'the'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 36

REIMBURSEMENT OF COSTS RELATING TO ANIMALS INVOLVED IN FIGHTING OFFENCES

Amendment made: No. 92, in page 19, line 14, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 37

FORFEITURE OF EQUIPMENT USED IN OFFENCES

Amendments made: No. 45, in page 19, line 23, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 46, in page 19, line 34, at end insert—

'(ba) in the case of a conviction for an offence under section Docking of dogs' tails or (2), to anything designed or adapted for removing the whole or any part of a dog's tail;'.

No. 93, in page 19, line 38, after '7' insert '(1) or (2)'.

No. 77, in page 19, line 39, after 'in' insert 'connection with'.

No. 94, in page 19, line 39, at end insert—

'(e) in the case of a conviction for an offence under section 7(2A), to a video recording of an animal fight, including anything on or in which the recording is kept.'.

No. 47, in page 19, line 44, after 'paragraphs' insert '(ba) and'.

No. 95, in page 19, line 44, leave out '(d)' and insert '(e)'. .—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 39

ORDERS WITH RESPECT TO LICENCES

Amendment made: No. 48, in page 20, line 36, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2),'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 42

DEPRIVATION ORDERS IN CONNECTION WITH OFFENCE UNDER SECTION 41(2)

Amendment made: No. 96, in page 22, line 41, after 'provided' insert '(orally or in writing)'. .—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 43

SEIZURE ORDERS WHERE DISQUALIFICATION BREACHED: SCOTLAND

Amendments made: No. 97, in page 23, line 38, after 'provided' insert '(orally or in writing)'.

No. 98, in page 24, line 2, at end insert—

'(8A) When an application is made under subsection (2)(a), the court may make an order under this subsection (an "interim order") containing such provision as the court considers appropriate in relation to the keeping of an animal until the application is finally determined.

(8B) Subsections (4), (5)(a) and (8) apply in relation to an interim order as they apply in relation to a seizure order.'. .—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 44

APPEALS AGAINST DEPRIVATION ORDERS AND SEIZURE ORDERS

Amendments made: No. 99, in page 24, line 15, leave out from 'may' to end of line 16 and insert

'appeal to the High Court of Justiciary against the order by the same procedure as applies under subsection (1) in relation to a deprivation order.'.

No. 100, in page 24, line 17, leave out from the beginning to 'may' in line 18 and insert

'The disqualified person by reference to whom a seizure order is made, or any person (apart from that disqualified person) who entered the process prior to the making of the order,'.

No. 101, in page 24, line 19, leave out subsection (4).

No. 102, in page 24, line 28, leave out 'an' and insert

'a deprivation order or seizure'.

No. 103, in page 24, line 28, after '(5),' insert

'or such an order is not executable because decree has not been extracted,'.

No. 104, in page 24, line 32, at end insert 'or inexecutable'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 45

DEPRIVATION ORDERS, SEIZURE ORDERS AND INTERIM ORDERS: OFFENCES

Amendment made: No. 105, in page 25, line 16, after 'section' insert '43(8A) or'. —[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 56

ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Amendments made: No. 81, in page 29, line 24, after 'Act' insert

', except the power under section 15(1) of the National Assembly for Wales,'.

No. 49, in page 29, line 26, after '5(4),' insert

'Docking of dogs' tails,'. —[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Clause 57

GENERAL INTERPRETATION

Amendment made: No. 61, in page 30, line 9, at end insert—

'"suffering" means physical or mental suffering and related expressions shall be construed accordingly;'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Schedule 3

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Amendments made: No. 50, in page 39, line 16, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 51, in page 39, line 31, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 52, in page 40, line 17, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 53, in page 40, line 25, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 54, in page 40, line 35, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 55, in page 41, line 4, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 56, in page 41, line 21, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 57, in page 41, line 26, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 58, in page 41, line 30, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 59, in page 41, line 34, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.

No. 60, in page 41, line 37, after 'sections' insert

'[Docking of dogs' tails] (1) and (2) and'.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

10.56 pm

Mr. Bradshaw: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The hour is late, we have discussed many weighty matters in the course of this afternoon and evening and I think that the House would prefer it if I kept my remarks brief. I start by acknowledging a satisfying, but not altogether common, feature of our deliberations this afternoon, this evening and over the past few weeks, which is that the Bill has benefited from substantial cross-party support. The Opposition parties did not divide the House on Second Reading, and they have played a constructive hand during the detailed consideration of the Bill. We have had a good and rational debate, and Members on both sides have made important contributions. That good atmosphere enabled the Government to listen and, I hope Members will agree, improve the Bill in several important respects.

I pay tribute to all Members who participated in debates on the Floor of the House and in Committee. The debates have been conducted with good humour and in a positive spirit. I thank Members on both sides of the House, Back Benchers and others, particularly the hon. Members for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) and for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), as well as the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) who has recently announced his, I hope, temporary retirement from his party's Front Bench. He will be missed, particularly on issues of animal welfare. I also thank the hon. Members for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) and my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) for chairing the Committee proceedings with such skill and verve. We should also thank the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, chaired by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), for its work on the pre-legislative scrutiny of the Bill. I also thank the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), under whose stewardship the Bill saw its conception. I am sure that all Members of the House will acknowledge his long-standing and valuable contribution to furthering animal welfare in this country. I also acknowledge the support of the members of my team in DEFRA. They were superb. They worked long and hard hours to bring the Bill to this stage and I fear that they have more such hours ahead of them.

This is an historic day for the welfare of animals in this country. I commend the Bill to the House.

Bill Wiggin: The Bill has been four years in the making and I have followed it closely since the beginning. I was a member of the Select Committee that scrutinised an earlier draft of the Bill and I saw the current Bill through Standing Committee on behalf of the Opposition.

The Conservative party has always supported what we see as the Bill's primary intentions: updating and consolidating a century of fragmented and outdated legislation, and introducing the positive duty of care. We recognise the importance of the legislation and have taken every opportunity to work consensually and constructively with Members on both sides of the House. Moreover, the scientific evidence to which I attach so much importance is such that legislation founded on it will always transcend political divides.

[Bill Wiggin]

With that in mind, I pay tribute to the role played by the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), in making the legislation possible. It was his first Bill and I congratulate him on the result. He was always prepared to welcome comment and counsel and subsequently to change his position. In any other Minister that could easily have been misconstrued as uncertainty or indecision, but not in the hon. Gentleman. He listened to advice about statutory improvement notices, allowed me to convince him of its merits and changed Government policy accordingly. I have no hesitation in thanking him publicly.

The hon. Gentleman listened carefully to the case for expanding the fighting offence in clause 7 to include all those with involvement in animal fights. At the behest of the Opposition, he added provisions to improve procedures under clause 16 for notifying owners that their animal is in distress. He allowed colleagues to persuade him to resolve the future of tail docking on the face of the Bill rather than, as he planned, through secondary legislation. He proved to be flexible about expanding the definition of "suffering" to include mental as well as physical harm.

If the hon. Gentleman continues to legislate in that constructive manner, and allows Parliament to scrutinise his proposals, I shall look forward to working with him again. Furthermore, other Ministers could do a lot worse than to learn from him.

I thank all members of the Standing Committee, as well as my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and all Members who spoke. I also thank the Chairmen of the Committee, the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) and my hon. Friend the Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale), the Select Committee, chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), and all the people outside this place who so assiduously—indeed, copiously—wrote in with their views.

Tonight, we shall send the Bill to the other place and their lordships will be grateful for the hard work and effort made by the Chamber and for the improvements that we are proud to have made.

11.1 pm

Mr. Drew: I, too, express praise for my hon. Friend the Minister. He certainly listened and went further than some of us anticipated on tail docking, allowing us a full debate even if, in my opinion, we came to slightly the wrong conclusion—we live to fight another day.

My hon. Friend has made it clear throughout that he did not want the Bill to become a Christmas tree Bill—as he described it—to which we could all stick our baubles. I look forward to the resolution of issues such as electric shock collars, snares and the keeping of primates as pets.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend lists some of the unresolved matters, but as a fellow member of the Select Committee, does he agree by and large that the Bill is a shining example of what can be done with pre-legislative scrutiny in achieving a relatively uncontroversial Bill with the wide consensual support of the House? Does he agree that the Government should use pre-legislative scrutiny much more as the Bill is a classic example of that working at its best?

Mr. Drew: I agree. I took part in the pre-legislative scrutiny of the Bill as well as serving on the Standing Committee. I thank all Members who took part. One of the most interesting things was that Government Members probably talked for as long as Opposition Members, which must be unique. In doing so, I hope that we were able to make our points. No party can claim the monopoly of righteousness on this matter so it is right that Back Benchers should make proposals, even if we did not get them to exactly the point we wanted. However, the Government and my hon. Friend the Minister will want to continue that work in due course, and I hope that the measure makes progress and that a good Bill comes back from the Lords.

11.4 pm

Norman Baker: I thank all members of the Committee and the Minister for his constructive approach to the Bill. At the beginning of its passage, I drew his attention to the way that his colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), had dealt with the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill in a constructive and consensual manner, which had improved it. The Minister has followed that path, emulated his colleague and we have a better Bill. I congratulate him on the way he has brought the Bill through Committee and to the House. As I told the Minister's colleague, when Ministers listen and amend Bills, it is a sign of strength, not of weakness. I congratulate the Minister on proposing a Bill that was good to start with, and is better as a consequence of the amendments that have been made in Committee and on Report.

I congratulate the Conservative Front Benchers—the hon. Members for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) and for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice)—on their approach to the Bill, as well as Labour Back Benchers on theirs, to pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). Those hon. Members who have served on many Standing Committees are used to seeing massed ranks of statues behind Ministers—the Labour Back Benchers who say nothing and sit there doing their casework for days on end. On this occasion, without exception, the Labour Back Benchers who served on the Committee took part and made some constructive comments. Generally, the Bill was considered more fully and sensibly as a consequence of their efforts as well, and I hope that Labour Back Benchers will take a lesson from that and apply it elsewhere.

Anne Snelgrove: Labour Back Benchers always make constructive comments; we do not necessarily make them in public.

Norman Baker: On grounds of accountability and democracy, I encourage the hon. Lady to make her comments in public in future—obviously, we could then all hear what was being said and we might even agree with it. The example set by the Bill is one that should be followed in future.

It is a good Bill. It is not perfect, of course. There are issues with which we disagree—it would be extraordinary if we did not—and I hope that some of the issues to which the hon. Member for Stroud referred will be dealt with under secondary legislation. I understand the comments about Christmas trees, but we have taken on trust the Minister's assurance that measures will be introduced on a range of issues that people feel very strongly about—whether electric shock collars, greyhounds or the other issues that hon. Members have raised in the Chamber today and in Committee—and we want the Minister to deliver those assurances under secondary legislation and look forward to that happening.

I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that, under clause 63, there is a commitment to do nothing very much at all in implementing the Bill. We only have his word about that—I am happy to take his word, of course—but we want further action to ensure that this enabling Bill, which we will shortly pass on to the other place, is acted on using statutory instruments in due course.

Of course, I am particularly pleased about clause 8, which introduces the RSPCA's five freedoms and is the cornerstone of the Bill in many ways. It is very important indeed and will go a long way to ensure that some of the awful examples of cruelty, which the RSPCA and others have drawn to hon. Members' attention over many years, will be curtailed and can be properly prosecuted by the appropriate authorities when they are detected, often earlier than has been hitherto possible.

This is the first Animal Welfare Bill for 95 years. Of course, the Protection of Animals Act 1911 was introduced by a Liberal Government. Obviously, animals have had to wait for another Liberal Government, which has not happened since those days, unfortunately—so we have had to rely instead on a Labour Government to introduce another Bill to update that very important 1911 Act. I am pleased that the Government have done so. Animals will be better protected as a consequence of the Bill. I am also pleased that it has been possible to do so in a spirit of consensus and co-operation across all parties—something of which we can be proud.

Lastly, I thank the Minister for his kind comments and assure him that it is my intention that my departure from the Front Bench will be temporary.

11.8 pm

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): The hour is late and I shall be brief. The House has been genuinely congratulatory of the Minister, and those hon. Members who took part on Second Reading and watched the Committee in progress feel that he has made a particular contribution to the Bill. For those in the animal welfare lobby who have been arguing about bits of the Bill for nine years now, there was some doubt whether it would ever come to fruition. On Second Reading, we spoke about it being a Christmas tree Bill, which is why Conservative Members were always a bit scared of introducing such legislation when we were in power. I am very glad that the Conservative Front-Bench team has welcomed the Bill tonight and has been constructive as well.

What the Minister has achieved is undoubtedly notable, and what the animal welfare charities will look for in the future is what happens with the regulations and how the Government respond. The one word of advice that I urge on him is that, both in the House and particularly among those who advise Ministers, there is the view that the only organisation that has a serious view on animal welfare interests in this country is the RSPCA. It is a really good organisation and, although it has its critics, it does a splendid job. The companion welfare charities, however, such as the Dogs Trust and Cats Protection, with which I have been involved, take an interest in a single species, so their experience and knowledge tends to be much better than that which Ministers will find in the RSPCA. As regulations are introduced, I hope that the Minister will seek a wider input and look beyond that notable charity to charities with a specific interest in different types of animals. The Minister is rightly to be congratulated, and people working in animal welfare on a daily basis will not forget his contribution.

11.10 pm

Mr. Hollobone: I, too, congratulate the Minister on the Bill's passage through the House. I very much enjoyed serving on the Committee, and I am grateful for his comments. He will not be surprised to learn that I am disappointed that he has not taken on board the seriousness with which greyhound welfare charities view the state of the greyhound industry. There are many well-organised greyhound tracks, as he knows, and the British Greyhound Racing Board has a good reputation. However, there are 20 or so unregistered greyhound tracks, and proper regard is not paid to the welfare of thousands of greyhounds. In this country, there are—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I hate to intrude on the benign atmosphere on Third Reading, but I am bound to remind hon. Members, particularly the hon. Gentleman, that on Third Reading one must confine one's remarks, apart from the usual thanks, to the contents of the Bill, rather than the things that are not in the Bill.

Mr. Hollobone: As always, I am grateful for your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is extraordinarily difficult in the House, especially for a new Member, to advance the cause of greyhound welfare. I have done my level best to try to make the Government listen to my concerns.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I always want to be helpful, particularly to new Members, so may I suggest the device of an Adjournment debate?

[Mr. Hollobone]

Mr. Hollobone: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am genuinely pleased that the Government have introduced a Bill on animal welfare, but I hope that the limited provisions on greyhounds are applied.

Norman Baker: I wish to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, so can he explain how clause 8, which deals with the duty of people responsible for animals to ensure their welfare, applies to greyhounds?

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, and I believe that clause 8 would be helpful. In the Bill, the Government are looking at draft codes of conduct, so at this late stage may I urge the Minister to consider introducing an early draft code of conduct on greyhounds? That would be very much appreciated in the greyhound industry, and I hope that the issue is debated further when the Bill proceeds to the other place.

11.13 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), with whom I very much agree.

I wish to stick to a specific matter in the Bill. I congratulate the Government on introducing a very good welfare Bill, but I should also like to comment on the fact that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) said, the RSPCA is not the only organisation that is worried about the welfare of animals. I have received a representation in my constituency from Mr. Andrew Meads, who runs Safe Wings. That unusual organisation protects wild birds, and injured birds are brought to the sanctuary from miles around. They are housed and rehabilitated before being released into the wild. Unfortunately, the Bill was not designed to take that unusual project into account, which may well have to close because of the licensing arrangements. Mr. Meads is concerned that unless there is a light regulatory touch that wonderful bird sanctuary will have to close. I hope that that will be considered in the other place.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I shall put together the two motions.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Disabled Persons

That the draft Rail Vehicle Accessibility (Gatwick Express Class 458 Vehicles) Exemption Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 7th February, be approved.

Pensions

That the draft Occupational Pension Schemes (Levies) (Amendment) Regulations 2006, which were laid before this House on 15th February, be approved.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

Air Traffic Management

That this House take note of European Union Document No. 15143/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Communication and draft Council Regulation on the establishment of a Joint Undertaking to develop the new generation European air traffic management system (SESAR); and endorses the Government's prudent approach to the Commission's proposals, as set out in the Explanatory Memorandum.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT (EASTER)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 25 (Periodic adjournments),

That this House, at its rising on Thursday 30th March 2006, do adjourn till Tuesday 18th April 2006.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

NORTHERN IRELAND GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 116 (Northern Ireland Grand Committee sittings)),

That—

(1) the matter of the Review of Public Administration in Northern Ireland be referred to the Northern Ireland Grand Committee;

(2) the Committee shall meet at Westminster on Tuesday 28th March at half-past four o'clock; and

(3) at that sitting—

(a) the Committee shall take questions under Standing Order No. 110 (Northern Ireland Grand Committee (questions for oral answer)), and shall then consider the matter referred to it under paragraph (1) above;

(b) the Chairman shall interrupt proceedings not later than two and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the matter referred to the Committee; and

(c) at the conclusion of those proceedings, a motion for the adjournment of the Committee may be made by a Minister of the Crown, pursuant to paragraph (5) of Standing Order No. 116 (Northern Ireland Grand Committee (sittings)).—[Mr. Dhanda.]

Question agreed to.

PETITION

Sentencing Guidelines

11.15 pm

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to present a petition. It concerns the very serious issue of the deliberate manslaughter of Stuart McKibbin. I record my thanks and that of the McKibbin family for the support shown to them by the petitioners, the local press and Peter Lewis from Support After Murder and Manslaughter.

The petitioners declare that the sentence passed for the manslaughter of Stuart McKibbin is inadequate and further declare that, despite taking a life, the perpetrator could be freed after serving only three and a half years of a seven-year sentence.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Home Secretary to refer the sentencing guidelines for manslaughter to the Sentencing Guidelines Council.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Wind Farms (Northumberland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

11.16 pm

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): The House seems to be returning to its old ways. This is the second night running that I have taken part in an Adjournment debate after 11.15 pm, but I am nevertheless glad of the opportunity to raise the role of the Department of Trade and Industry in wind farm applications in Northumberland.

Northumberland is facing a massive wave of applications for wind farms, with a heavy concentration of applications in the stretch of beautiful open countryside that lies between Berwick and Alnwick, and further clusters of applications or potential applications around the boundaries of my constituency at Ellington, Lynemouth and Longhirst, around Longhorsley, and around Kirkwhelpington, which lies over the boundary in the neighbouring Hexham constituency. The hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) is present tonight.

Those sites lie in the areas of four planning authorities. I have so far counted four actual and one potential application in Berwick borough, one actual and three potential applications in Alnwick district, one actual and seven potential applications in Castle Morpeth, and two over the border in Tynedale. A total of almost 200 turbines is in prospect in or alongside my constituency, with further applications over in the Kielder area. Even many constituents who are sympathetic to the development of wind power have found this a bewildering and daunting prospect.

The Department of Trade and Industry has several roles in relation to these applications. First, it takes to itself the decision on wind farms with an installed capacity of 50 MW or more. So far this includes the Middlemoor application, north of Alnwick, and the Ray estate proposal near Kirkwhelpington. Secondly, it has a role alongside the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister if an application below that size is the subject of an appeal against local authority refusal. Obviously, any of the sites may be the subject of such an appeal following a local planning authority refusal, and then the issue would be taken out of the hands of the local community.

Thirdly, the DTI is responsible for Government energy policy, for delivering on the Government's renewables targets, and indeed for the incentives that have encouraged so many companies to put in applications for wind farms, which many people would see as a conflict of interest with its role in the planning process. I shall consider each of those aspects of the Department's role.

A question ought to be raised about why the DTI is taking decisions at all in cases such as Middlemoor. The power under which this is happening was, I suspect, included in the Electricity Act 1989 to make it easier for major strategic power plants to get approval. Even if that could be justified—I served in Committee on the 1989 Act, where we sought to amend those provisions—it hardly seems appropriate to use the 1989 Act to separate a few wind farm applications from the rest for central consideration without a proper local planning decision. Because wind power is intermittent, the average output of a 50 MW wind farm is probably less than 20 MW. Why does the Minister not hand the planning responsibility for Middlemoor back to Alnwick district council, which is the local planning authority? Why not let local people decide?

[Mr. Alan Beith]

If the DTI insists on making the decision, the local planning authority can insist on a public inquiry, but central Government will still make the decision, which seems completely inappropriate. Incidentally, I understand that this week the DTI asked Alnwick district council to defer consideration of its views on Middlemoor while further information is sought from the developer. Perhaps the Minister will tell me what that is all about.

When the DTI deals with an application, how does it assess local opinion? There are differing views on the various applications in Northumberland, but a number of them, including Middlemoor, have attracted vigorous opposition. The DTI's process of inviting comments by an early date has not left people with the feeling that they have had a fair hearing or that their views are being taken seriously. Furthermore, the Middlemoor and Ray applications need to be seen in the context that I have described, because so many applications are coming forward. How can the DTI rule on the Middlemoor application without knowing what Berwick borough council will decide on the nearby Wandylaw application or the three sites further north?

What frightens many people is the prospect of a chain of five or more sites with more than 60 turbines stretching through the countryside west of the A1 from Alnwick to Berwick, all visible from popular viewpoints such as Ros castle and the Cheviot hills. Tourism is now of crucial importance to jobs and businesses in Northumberland, and, although I do not accept the argument that every wind farm necessarily poses a threat to tourism, a development on anything like this scale would totally change the landscape and views that tourists come to enjoy. The Minister must tell us how he will prevent a situation in which he takes a decision on the Middlemoor site without regard to the risk of a ribbon development of wind farms.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. The chain will be even longer than that, because it will run from the A68 to the A1. We could end up with a chain of turbines running right across some of the most beautiful landscapes in Northumberland.

Mr. Beith: That is a genuine concern. People who would judge one application on its merits are seriously worried about the cumulative effect.

If the local planning authorities decide to refuse most of the major applications in the area, will they face having their decisions overturned by the combined forces of the DTI and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on appeal? In that respect, they have taken some encouragement from the Minister's acceptance of the inspector's decision to refuse a major wind farm application at Whinash in Cumbria, but will the Cumbrian refusal make refusals in Northumberland less likely, so as to keep up with the targets?

Critics of the wind farm plans see such developments against the background that the DTI leads on energy policy. The DTI has targets to meet—10 per cent. of energy use from renewables by 2010 and 20 per cent. by 2020. It has chosen to place very heavy emphasis within renewables on onshore wind power to meet those targets, despite the potential of wave and tidal power, solar power, geothermal power and biomass.

This week, I have received representations about the withdrawal of DTI and Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs funding from the community renewables initiative. That will directly hit the REALL organisation in Northumberland, which supports and enables community renewable energy projects in the very villages that are most likely to be affected by the wind farm proposals, such as ground force heat pumps in Lowick and Etal.

While those incentives are being removed without anything being promised in their place to promote community renewables, the incentive for the generating companies to go for the wind power option seems to have been set too high. There is a lot of scope for the use of wind power in micro-power projects. The smaller windmills powering local businesses or groups of houses gain much readier public acceptance, and some such schemes are under discussion, but we need a more broadly based renewables strategy. For the Department that has locked itself into wind power targets to decide local planning decisions strikes many of my constituents as wrong in principle and worrying in practice.

I should also mention something that might influence the Minister more than it should: the regional spatial strategy. The strategy has been produced by the unelected regional assembly, so it has no democratic authority. Its proposals are fiercely contested on many grounds, some of which relate to housing. It is especially relevant for tonight's purposes that the strategy is contested, because of its designation of a significant part of Northumberland as having the potential for wind farm development.

The draft strategy is at the consultation stage, and the Minister needs to be aware that major objections have been put in about the question of areas that are claimed to be suitable for wind farms. Some of the objections challenge the principles on which areas have been designated, while others challenge the technical accuracy of the work done on the strategy. The target that the assembly has set for wind power in Northumberland is three times what the national 10 per cent. target would suggest, so that, too, is being vigorously contested by many people who have put in objections to the strategy. At this stage, the Minister cannot rely on the draft, and much questioned, regional spatial strategy to justify a presumption in favour of applications at Middlemoor or elsewhere in Northumberland, so I hope that he will not attempt to do so.

Many people accept that wind generation has a part to play, alongside other renewables, in reducing $CO_2$ emissions and developing a sustainable energy policy. Some people genuinely like the sight of wind turbines and do not find them too intrusive. For example, the wind turbines on the harbour wall at Blyth often get quite favourable comments. However, most people think that there are landscapes and views that are too attractive and distinctive for us to allow them to be fundamentally changed by the erection of turbines, pylons or a variety of other developments, and that a cumulative growth of wind turbines marching across many miles of countryside is something to be avoided.

The process by which some decisions are taken by a central Department with a policy interest in approving wind farms, with others taken separately by neighbouring planning authorities, is not a satisfactory way of reconciling concerns and making good decisions. I would like local authorities to be able jointly to mount a public hearing at which all applications could be considered at the same time, without the involvement of the DTI. All local views could then be heard, as could the developers, and coherent decisions could be made by local planning authorities. It would be much better if the Minister would take a step back and persuade his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to help him to ensure that there are no obstacles to such a genuinely local process along the lines that I have suggested. Would it be possible to have an open hearing at which all views could be heard, but with the decision still taken locally, or is that too much to hope for?

11.27 pm

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) for giving me the opportunity to explain the role of the DTI in wind farm applications. He referred to the relative lateness of the hour, but I am bound to say that when I rose at 5 am to go to Brussels, this was always going to be the highlight of my day—I mean that most sincerely. I should make it clear that I am unable to comment, as he will understand, on individual applications, given the Secretary of State's quasi-judicial role on consent decisions. However, I realise that the right hon. Gentleman is questioning that role.

Let me say something about the statutory position. Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 gives the Secretary of State responsibility for decisions on development consents in England and Wales for onshore electricity generating stations, including wind farms, with a capacity above 50 MW. When granting such consents, he can also deem planning permission to be granted under section 90 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. Applications for generating stations up to 50 MW are dealt with by local planning authorities under the normal planning regime.

The logic behind applications above 50 MW being determined by the DTI is that energy supply is of vital national importance. While that is generally recognised, there can also be a tendency for any local community to resist the location of energy infrastructure in their area. Clearly we need the infrastructure and it has to go somewhere. The right hon. Gentleman would soon be initiating an even grander debate if his constituents found that they were not getting an electricity supply, so there is a tension between the two requirements.

As we need the infrastructure, the long-standing arrangement has been that central Government take decisions on projects above 50 MW. However, that is not to say that decisions on larger projects circumvent the planning system or that local people do not have a say. Local planning authorities are always consulted. Their views, and those of local communities, are taken into account by the Secretary of State, who also seeks advice from the relevant environment, nature, conservation and heritage bodies before taking a decision. Should a planning authority object, the Secretary of State is obliged under the 1989 Act to hold a public inquiry. Even if a planning authority does not object, he has the discretion to hold an inquiry in the light of other representations received. Were a public inquiry to be held, it would be presided over by an independent inspector, and those who wished to attend and give evidence would be invited to do so. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the inspector's latest judgment on Whinash, which the Secretary of State supported.

As well as seeking inputs from local authorities on applications, my Department also has written advice and guidance to take into account. Planning policy statement 22 on renewable energy is particularly relevant to wind farms, as is PPS7 on sustainable development in rural areas. The same guidance is followed by the DTI and local planning authorities. There are also regional spatial strategies. Local authorities often have local development plans. Those only offer guidelines on what level of development might be appropriate, but where they exist they are clearly important factors in any decision. I am also aware that the north-east assembly and local authorities in the area have commissioned landscape capacity studies to help to inform decisions on wind farm applications in terms of their cumulative landscape impacts. Those, too, will provide an important input to decisions.

Of course, undertaking any environmental impact assessment can be complex. That is particularly so for wind farms where there are several applications in the same region.

Mr. Beith: I want to reinforce the point that I made in my earlier remarks. The regional spatial strategy that affects this region is still in draft and is fiercely contested, so the Minister ought not to rely heavily on its very controversial content.

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, I hear that. I was hoping that the right hon. Gentleman might address the need of his constituents, and all our constituents, to have energy from somewhere, and that he might add what would be acceptable to him. Perhaps that is asking too much of an Adjournment debate.

It is open to developers to acquire access to land and to submit their applications. That is in the nature of our planning system. As wind turbine technology advances, it becomes possible to site wind farms in areas where it was previously thought that the wind speeds were too low. Developers may then see potential in separate but nearby sites. Such situations raise questions as to whether allowing more than one of them to be built would create potential cumulative impacts, whether in terms of visual effects or other matters. There is an onus on the wind power industry to act sensibly in considering whether to submit applications in areas where others have already made them. It also makes sense for developers to co-operate in providing environmental impact assessments.

However, it is a competitive industry, and while multiple applications can make life more complicated for regulators, they do not make it impossible. Any application submitted to my Department would have to include an environmental impact assessment that set out the applicant's view of the likely impacts of the project in its own right and its cumulative impacts with other projects. Those other projects could be operational, already consented or simply ahead in the planning queue.

[Malcolm Wicks]

Mr. Atkinson: The problem that we face in my constituency is that we have an application for one large wind farm that will be determined by the DTI and other applications for another wind farm, some of the turbines of which will be on the site of the first wind farm. How on earth does the local authority reconcile that problem?

Malcolm Wicks: To debate that fully, we would have to introduce into the picture national energy security, the importance of securing our energy from somewhere and the balances that we need to strike.

We do not require applicants to take account of proposals that are in the pipeline but not yet submitted. That would place an unfair burden on the applicant, as proposals not yet submitted might lead to an application. Details may be scanty and that could make it impossible to consider them in an environmental impact assessment.

Further complications arise when multiple applications in an area come under both the Electricity Act 1989 and the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. It is not for the Secretary of State to try to influence decisions that properly fall to local authorities. Authorities will consider applications on the basis of the same guidance and advice as is available to the Department of Trade and Industry, but the decisions are up to them.

When applications that could interact are made under both regimes and go to inquiry, they could be tackled by a single inquiry. The inspector would need to consider the individual merits of each application and the possible cumulative effects before making recommendations to the relevant decision makers.

I shall not comment on whether all or any of the applications lodged in Northumberland might have cumulative impacts on each other. Some may be too far apart to have combined effects. However, officials in the Department have been working with applicants, local authorities and the Government office to ensure that the handling of those applications is fair and transparent.

Mr. Beith: The Minister made a helpful point. He said that it is possible to hold a public inquiry that brings together an application—or several—with which the Department and the local authority are dealing and ensure that the inspector reports back to the respective decision makers. Is he willing to encourage the relevant authorities to take that approach to contiguous applications? Is the Department willing to co-operate with that?

Malcolm Wicks: As I said, that can sometimes make sense. Of course, it is also a matter for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and we are trying to pursue that strategy when appropriate.

We remain firmly committed to renewable energy. As the most advanced of the renewable technologies, wind power will continue to play an important role. As we consider our energy requirements and become a net importer of gas—we import 10 per cent. at the moment but 80 per cent. is projected to come from other countries by 2010—we need to have some answers about the source of energy. Some people need to talk about "yes", not "no". I hope that the right hon. Gentleman does not mind my pointing that out gently. The lateness of the hour probably means that I should not mention that Liberal Democrat spokespersons often urge me to accept that the answer is not nuclear or many other things but simply efficiency and renewables. The words, "wind farms" often pass their lips. If that is a principle, which many of us accept, we need to put it into practice from time to time. We cannot always take a "not in my back yard" position. I do not refer to the right hon. Gentleman's county, but I am trying gently to point to a dilemma as he urges us to reject wind turbines in his area.

Mr. Beith: I did not say that we should reject all wind turbine applications. I tried to suggest that we need a process whereby decisions for large numbers of neighbouring applications can be considered carefully on their merits and not in a way that deprives local people of a key role in such decisions.

Malcolm Wicks: I must not trespass on particular decisions, but I assume that that means that the right hon. Gentleman is supporting certain applications. However, it would not be fair if I were to point to that dilemma more markedly than I have done.

I do not expect the energy review, on which I am leading, to change the principles at the heart of the planning regime. In short, these are designed to ensure robust consideration of applications, which allows good projects in the right location to get approved. Sometimes, despite the controversy, the answer will be yes. Sometimes, however, as we have recently illustrated very graphically with the Whinash decision, when the answer should be no, we will be absolutely determined that the answer will be no.

I thank the right hon. Gentleman for raising the issues that particularly affect Northumberland, and for allowing us at least to consider in draft form some of the dilemmas that we are presented with when many people want to say no to all sorts of developments, although we are on the cusp in regard to energy security. We need some projects in our nation to go forward if we are to have energy security in the first half of the 21st century.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty minutes to Twelve o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 15 March 2006

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

The unavoidable absence of MR. SPEAKER having been announced, THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS took the Chair as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Northern Ireland Assembly

1. Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the prospects for the restoration of the Northern Ireland Assembly; and if he will make a statement. [57301]

5. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the Northern Ireland Assembly. [57305]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): All the Northern Ireland political parties support the principle of devolution. All of them support the principle of an Assembly and devolved government. They differ on how to achieve it. Our challenge is to bridge those differences, but one thing is certain: the current impasse cannot and will not continue. We cannot keep the Assembly standing idle; we cannot continue to pay Members of the Legislative Assembly indefinitely during suspension; and we cannot have meaningless elections in May 2007, to an Assembly that does not exist. This year is decisive, and all the party leaders will be facing some hard choices.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. What is the single biggest impediment to the Assembly being reinstated? Who is to blame for the fact that the process is dragging out?

Mr. Hain: In the end, the Assembly can only be re-established and power-sharing governance instituted if the parties agree. Neither the Prime Minister, myself, the Irish Government nor anyone else can force Northern Ireland's parties to agree—it is a decision for them—but they will face a hard choice later this year if they do not reach that agreement.

Mr. Ellwood: Although the Assembly is suspended and has not met for three years, it continues to cost the taxpayer more than £100 million and 108 Members of the Legislative Assembly continue to draw their salaries. Two months ago, the Secretary of State said:

> "I'm not giving a particular month, but I am saying that if we haven't seen progress by the summer, the first decision that I'm going to have to make is over continued payment of salaries and also allowances."

Can he update the House on what progress has been made on the re-establishment of the Assembly and the cutting of salaries?

Mr. Hain: What I said previously—the hon. Gentleman quotes me accurately—remains the case.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): After an ill-advised deadline of 8 March has come and gone, will the Secretary of State now address the proposals of the Social Democratic and Labour party, which called for the re-establishment of a fully devolved Administration—if necessary, with a temporary Executive appointed from non-elected members or, indeed, consisting of the Northern Ireland Office Ministers themselves—until such time as an agreed Executive can be formed? Does he not agree that that would encourage the parties to participate and that their failure to do so would be a rejection of their mandate and, in a sense, an illustration of the fact that they are putting party before people?

Mr. Hain: I understand the point that hon. Gentleman makes, but he has not persuaded, nor has his party, any other party to support that proposition. That is his problem, and there is no point in inviting me, as Secretary of State, to back that policy, when no party, apart from the SDLP, will subscribe to it.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Secretary of State talks about the restoration of the Assembly, but he allows his Ministers to make extraordinarily important decisions—for example, about the Northern Ireland education system—that should be left to a reconstituted Assembly. If he is so sure that we can get the Assembly running again, why does he allow the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), to talk about doing away with the selection process, which, as everyone knows, needs to be the subject of considerably more consultation and discussion in Northern Ireland? Surely, regardless of where individual Ministers stand on selection, the Government need to agree that such a decision should be left to the Assembly. If they do not, it raises questions about how optimistic they are about the reconstitution of the Assembly.

Mr. Hain: Is the hon. Gentleman telling me that he supports a child's future being decided on the basis of a test at the age of 11? Is that what he supports? Is it new Liberal Democrat policy that a child can either be relegated to a secondary school in Northern Ireland, with no decent future, or go to one of the excellent grammar schools? Is that the Liberal Democrat policy? Of course, such a decision should ideally be made by a devolved Assembly. However, until there is a devolved Assembly, we must govern in the interests of Northern Ireland on the economy, on health, with waiting lists coming down, and on reforming the school

14 to 19 curriculum in the interests of all those children in Northern Ireland who have been failing so consistently under the system for so long.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): Why does the Secretary of State not face up to issue that there is one party that will not agree to the so-called basis of the agreement, namely that we all should be democrats? When will the Government be prepared to say, "There's only one way in, and that way is for everyone. You have not kept that way. Therefore, you have to be excluded."? The time has come when he has to decide whether he will tell those who agree with terrorism that they can be in the Government.

Mr. Hain: If the right hon. Gentleman is saying that Sinn Fein has not committed itself following the IRA statement—and, to be fair to it, for many years before—to a democratic, peaceful and political path, I do not think that he is judging the evidence as it has been presented to us. If he is also asking me to bar a very important part of the Northern Ireland political constituency from representation in the Assembly or a power-sharing Government, I cannot agree with him on that. We have got to make progress. His party needs to talk to the other parties and, at some point sooner rather than later, his party needs to talk to Sinn Fein, because it is the second largest party in Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): As the Secretary of State knows, we hope that these talks succeed. However, can he confirm that the Government accept the principle that no one should serve as a Minister in a Northern Ireland Executive unless he or she is willing to accept the legitimacy of the police and the courts and give firm support to both those institutions?

Mr. Hain: Obviously, it is essential that all parties subscribe to the rule of law, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman on support for policing as well. We have repeatedly called for Sinn Fein to come into line and support policing in Northern Ireland. There is absolutely no reason for it not to do so. Indeed, there is increasing pressure from within republican communities for their elected representatives to co-operate with the police in combating ordinary crime. So we are absolutely agreed on that.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful for that assurance from the Secretary of State. If, as we hope does not happen, these talks do not succeed in allowing for the reconstitution of the devolved institutions, can he give the House an assurance now that, although we welcome and value close co-operation with the Irish Republic, joint authority as a means of governing Northern Ireland in the absence of devolution would be at complete variance with the principle of consent in the Belfast agreement and, therefore, should be rejected?

Mr. Hain: I do not think that anybody is talking about joint authority. I very much welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the general strategy that we have adopted, and I acknowledge that and the constructive role that he is playing in seeking to persuade all the parties to find a common way forward. But I am not anticipating failure. I think that there is a real prospect of getting the Assembly up and running and getting power-sharing governance at the end of that. Let us work on that together, as I am sure that he wants to do.

Health and Personal Social Service Regulation and Improvement Authority

2. Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): What the remit is of the Health and Personal Social Service Regulation and Improvement Authority; and if he will make a statement. [57302]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): The remit of the independent authority is to monitor, inspect and encourage improvement in the availability and quality of health and social services, and to regulate a wide range of services delivered by HPSS bodies and by the independent sector.

Mrs. Robinson: I thank the Minister for his response, but he will be aware that the authority has recently investigated the tragic death of Janine Murtagh at the Royal Victoria hospital. The coroner in the case wrote to the previous Health Minister to express concern about a claim by seven consultant surgeons at the RVH about obstruction in getting gravely ill patients to theatre for surgery. The authority said that this was not a factor in the Murtagh case, but will the Minister agree to a meeting with me and Mr. Murtagh to discuss Mr. Murtagh's grave concerns about the letter and the authority's response?

Mr. Woodward: First, I know that the trust has already apologised to the Murtagh family, and may I, on behalf of the Department, extend my deepest condolences to Mr. Murtagh following the tragic death of his wife? The hon. Lady knows that the coroner made those recommendations and that the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), when she was Health Minister, asked the regulation authority to conduct an independent review. The independent review published its findings last October and it found that, in this instance, there was no evidence to support the allegations made by the hon. Lady. That being said, it has been necessary to make a number of very significant changes to clinical practice at the hospital—those have happened—and the authority will monitor and report on those changes. There are also implications for the health service more widely in Northern Ireland, and I am insisting that we learn the lessons of the tragic death of Mrs. Murtagh and that we apply those lessons for the benefit of all patients in Northern Ireland. I will be more than happy to meet Mr. Murtagh, with the hon. Lady, to discuss those changes.

Unemployment

3. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on levels of unemployment in Northern Ireland. [57303]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): Over the past year unemployment fell by 4,000 and now stands at 4 per cent., with 32,000 people unemployed, compared with the UK rate of 5 per cent. That is the lowest recorded level in Northern Ireland and we also have the highest levels of employment ever.

Ben Chapman: That is good news, but there is a particular issue about those who are classified as economically inactive. Will my hon. Friend tell me what is being done to give help and encouragement to them?

Angela E. Smith: One of the key areas that we have to address in supporting the economically inactive back into work is skills. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's announcement about the skills and science fund is so important. Despite the support from the Liberal Democrats for an education system that currently supports 24 per cent. of the working population having no qualifications—the figure is only 13 per cent. for the rest of the UK—we have to ensure that our work force are skilled. Through the skills and science fund, we will support pathways to work to get the economically inactive back into work, but also ensure that we provide additional support for young people coming out of school and those who have been out of work for some considerable time.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Given the Government's strong support for restorative justice schemes in Northern Ireland, I am sure that the Minister will be very concerned to know that those who run and work for the very successful IMPACT restorative justice scheme in North Down are about to become unemployed through lack of funding. Will she try to prevent the increase in unemployment in my constituency by pledging support for the IMPACT scheme today?

Angela E. Smith: My hon. Friend has found a creative way to address the issue of unemployment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has indicated that guidelines are currently being prepared on restorative justice and they will inform decisions that are being made on the issue.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I thank the Minister for her comments and welcome the relatively low levels of unemployment. However, does she agree that there are significant levels of under-employment, with well qualified people employed in jobs for relatively unqualified people or low level jobs? Secondly, there is a fairly high level—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. One question will be enough on this occasion. We are limited for time.

Angela E. Smith: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend on that issue. As our recent manufacturing report highlighted, we must consider three requirements if we are to increase employment and grow the economy. We need to be innovative and creative, invest in research and development and ensure that we have a highly skilled work force. Only by skilling up our work force, using the skills and science fund, can we address the points that he makes. We need to attract inward investment in Northern Ireland to create jobs. We will create high quality jobs only if we have the skills that match.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Of those who are unemployed, 33.8 per cent. are long-term unemployed, compared with the UK average of 20.7 per cent. Those are the figures that the Secretary of State quoted in a speech to the Fabian Society in January. Equally worrying are the new deal figures, which show that as many young people in Northern Ireland are economically inactive now as when the Government came to power. Why are those figures so unfortunate and what can the Minister do about it?

Angela E. Smith: There are a number of issues. One of them is about ensuring that we have an education system and training system that addresses the challenges of the future. At present, we find that 24 per cent. of the working population have no qualifications. If young people are coming out of school with no qualifications because, at the age of 11, they were put into a system that did not allow them to reach their full potential, we do not meet the employment needs that we need to meet. The skills and science fund, the reviews of education and the changes in the curriculum will ensure that we skill our young people and get the economically inactive back to work. We are extending the pathways to work scheme, which has been very successful in England.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): Although I welcome the reduction in unemployment figures and the work that the Government are doing, the Minister will be aware that the public sector contribution to gross domestic product from Northern Ireland is the highest in the UK. What initiatives has she undertaken with the private sector to ensure that there is a more even distribution and, in an increasingly globalised world, what initiatives and talks has she undertaken with the Republic of Ireland on that issue?

Angela E. Smith: My right hon. Friend is quite right to highlight that point. Public spending, at more than 60 per cent. of the GDP a head, is nearly one third higher than the UK average. The imbalance in jobs between the public and private sectors is a problem when looking to the long-term future of the economy. We need to encourage businesses to be innovative, creative and invest in research and development. Those factors encourage investment into Northern Ireland. If we do not improve the performance of the private sector, we do not meet those challenges. There are a number of international investors—Coca Cola, Oracle and Seagate—investing in Northern Ireland and they will grow jobs to ensure that we improve the balance between the public and private sectors.

Decommissioning

4. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What recent acts of weapons decommissioning have taken place; and if he will make a statement. [57304]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): The Independent International Commission on Decommissioning has reported that it has witnessed full and final decommissioning by the IRA. The IICD continues to engage with the representatives of loyalist paramilitary groups on how they can make the transition from conflict to peace.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be aware that the eighth Independent Monitoring Commission report did not endorse the de Chastelain commission's findings relating to the decommissioning of the totality of IRA weaponry. When will the Government bring about the total decommissioning of IRA weapons and ammunition in a way that is transparent to all the people not only of Northern Ireland but of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is a very respected Member of this House—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, Hear."] Indeed, and I am sure that he is not questioning the integrity of the international independent decommissioning agency under General John de Chastelain, that of the other independent commissioners or that of the two clerical witnesses from the Methodist Church of Ireland and the Catholic Church. The IICD reported on 26 September that it had "determined that the IRA had met its commitment to put all its arms beyond use in a manner called for by the legislation".

In January, it said that "in the absence of evidence to the contrary our 26 September assessment regarding IRA arms remains correct".

I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would take account of that. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appeal to the House to reduce the noise level. We must hear all the questions and answers.

Electricity Supplies

6. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): What plans he has to improve the long-term sustainability of the electricity distribution system in Northern Ireland. [57306]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): The new £59 million environment and renewable energy fund which the Government have established will help to increase the proportion of electricity from sustainable sources currently distributed to customers in Northern Ireland from 5.6 per cent. to 12 per cent. by 2012. We have also commenced an all-island electricity grid study to facilitate renewable generation up to 30 per cent. by 2020.

Jeff Ennis: Obviously, the Minister is absolutely right to say that we need to invest more in renewable energy in Northern Ireland. What specific steps is he taking to encourage individuals to invest in renewable energy?

Mr. Hanson: As part of the £59 million fund, over the next two years some £8 million will be available to enable more than 4,000 private households to install solar, wind or geothermal energy systems. Also, there is almost £2 million for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to install 600 solar panels in its properties. That will, I hope, encourage the use of renewable energy. To set that in context, I can say that if that investment had been made in England, more than 100,000 properties would, over the next two years, have benefited from investment in solar power and other forms of renewable energy. I think that is very positive.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Given the Minister's support for power-sharing, does he agree that the future of Northern Ireland's electricity industry is bound up with the national industry throughout the rest of the United Kingdom? Will he support the greater integration of the Northern Ireland network into the UK national network and the sharing of power between the two islands?

Mr. Hanson: We will look at whatever is in the interests of Northern Ireland as a whole. In the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill before the House we are looking at the potential for an all-Ireland electricity generation market. We shall certainly consider the potential for links with the United Kingdom. The key point is what is in the interests of the people and the consumers in Northern Ireland, and we will do whatever is right and necessary in terms of co-operation with the Republic and with the rest of the United Kingdom to achieve those aims.

Unemployment

7. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What steps he is taking to assist those in Northern Ireland who are economically inactive back into work. [57307]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): A comprehensive range of provisions is available which includes the new deal, disablement advisory service programmes and the bridge to employment programme.

Mary Creagh: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. What specific measures has my hon. Friend introduced to help lone parents return to economic employment?

Angela E. Smith: My hon. Friend highlights a specific area that we have addressed. Lone parents are included in the pathways to work project, which is funded by the skills and science fund. To ensure joined-up government we have linked pathways to work for lone parents with the extended schools programme so that when parents who want to work are at work their children are cared for in a secure and safe environment.

Paramilitary Ceasefires

8. Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): What his assessment is of the observance of the paramilitary ceasefires in Northern Ireland. [57308]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Shaun Woodward): The Independent Monitoring Commission made it clear on 8 March that it believes that the Provisional IRA has taken a strategic decision to follow a political path. It does not, in its view, present a terrorist threat. The Government continue to engage with loyalist paramilitary representatives, and we remain firmly committed to helping them make the transition from conflict to peace.

Mr. Gauke: Notwithstanding the IMC reports, there are persistent claims that some IRA members have kept their arms, despite the announcement of the IRA ceasefire in July. What is the Minister's assessment of those claims, and is there any validity in the suggestion that the IRA continues to hold arms?

Mr. Woodward: First, I agree with the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman read that report and not be too selective in his judgments. I remind him, too, that on 8 March the Independent Monitoring Commission made it clear that it believes that PIRA has taken the strategic decision to follow a political path, does not present a terrorist threat, and is not a threat to members of the security forces. The IMC, the IICD and the Government have no reason to doubt the commitment of the IRA leadership to the undertakings that it has given.

Northern Ireland Education Order

9. Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): If he will reverse his decision to introduce the Northern Ireland education Order. [57309]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): No. Consultation on the draft Education (Northern Ireland) Order ended on 7 March. I will carefully consider the responses and whether any changes should be made to the draft order before it is laid before Parliament in the spring.

Sammy Wilson: Despite the Secretary of State's blustering defence of the proposals, the Minister will be aware that in the last consultation 90 per cent. of respondents opposed the proposed changes. Her refusal to accept that view has caused increasing anger. Those changes should be rightly decided by local people in the Assembly, which the Secretary of State is determined to set up, so does she not agree that it is for local people to make that local decision?

Angela E. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman wants those decisions to be made in a devolved Assembly he knows the route that he must take. While the Assembly is suspended, the Government will make decisions. I fail to understand how academic selection at the age of 11 can be the appropriate way to decide the right pathways to education for young people.

Post-primary Education

10. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): What plans he has to change arrangements for post-primary education in the Province. [57310]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): The Government have introduced a number of reforms, including a revised curriculum, an entitlement framework to widen access to academic and vocational courses for all pupils, and new admissions arrangements which will replace academic selection at the age of 11 with a system based on informed parental choice.

Mr. Hands: I thank the Minister for her answer, but the Prime Minister has made it clear that he has no intention of scrapping academic selection in parts of the UK where parents want it. Why should Northern Ireland be any different?

Angela E. Smith: The system to be introduced in Northern Ireland is one of informed parental choice, and the Prime Minister has made it clear that he is in favour of such choice. In Northern Ireland, we have a system in which 40 per cent. of children go to grammar school, yet the majority of the population do not achieve their potential. We will introduce a system that best meets the needs of children, young people and the economy in Northern Ireland. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must keep quiet so that we can hear the questions and answers.

Animal Welfare Legislation

11. Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What changes are proposed to animal welfare legislation in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [57311]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): Department of Agriculture and Rural Development officials are currently finalising a wide-ranging review of animal welfare legislation aimed at identifying measures needed to strengthen powers to deal with animal welfare abuses, and they will consult stakeholders on the review after Easter. The detailed provisions of any new arrangements will depend on the outcome of the review and subsequent consultation, and they will take account of the provisions in the Animal Welfare Bill.

Mark Pritchard: Does the Minister not agree that the law is an animal ass if people in Northern Ireland need a licence to keep a dog but not an alligator? If so, will she tell the House what changes she intends to put in place?

Angela E. Smith: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that there are measures in place to address the matter. We will examine the increased powers and write to him on that point.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Given the recent revelations about many wild animals being caught in Northern Ireland under obscure circumstances, when will the Minister introduce the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 in Northern Ireland?

Angela E. Smith: The Minister of State, my noble Friend Lord Rooker, is looking into the matter. We are examining it carefully to see what improvements can be made to existing legislation.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [58392] Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 15 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Ms Keeble: Will my right hon. Friend come to Northampton to open the new £5 million police call centre funded by the Labour Government, and to listen to the complaints from my constituents, who will not get their new community police support officers because the funds for them have been cut by Conservative-controlled Northamptonshire county council? Is that compassionate Conservatism or same old Tories, same old cuts?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we have supported the new Northamptonshire police call centre. As my hon. Friend says, it is a £5 million state of the art facility that will bring better services to the people in her area and others. That is in addition to extra numbers of police and extra community support officers. That is why it is important that we keep up the investment under Labour, not cut it under the Conservatives.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Everyone in the House will be deeply concerned by what happened yesterday in the Palestinian territories. We understand the extremely difficult situation under which the British monitors were operating at the prison in Jericho, but is the Prime Minister satisfied that the consequences of withdrawing the monitors were properly thought through?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am satisfied about that. The question gives me the opportunity to explain to the House and, indeed, to the country that for the past three months we have been warning the Palestinian Authority that the security of the monitors was at risk and that the procedures at the particular detention centre were not adequate and proper. That culminated last week, on 8 March, in both the US and UK consuls-general jointly writing to President Abbas, making it clear that unless the Palestinian Authority met its obligations, we would have to terminate involvement with the mission with immediate effect. So for months we have been warning about that.

Let me emphasise to the House that the monitors are unarmed civilians whose roles is not to do the policing and to make sure that people are properly imprisoned, but simply to monitor that the procedures agreed were being implemented. For a very long time they had been saying that the procedures were not being properly implemented, so the idea that the withdrawal was precipitate, uncalled for or not thought through is wrong.

Mr. Cameron: I am grateful for that answer. People will also have been concerned by the attacks on the British Council in the Gaza strip. Can the Prime Minister tell us what steps he is taking today to protect British citizens, buildings and organisations that have been working so hard to help the Palestinian people? Can the Prime Minister tell us whether they were given any advance warning to take extra security precautions yesterday?

The Prime Minister: On the last point, I am not sure of the precise precautions that they were told to take, but I know that the matter had been discussed extensively with people, precisely because we were concerned about the situation that might arise. Perhaps I could make one other point. The United Kingdom has been immensely generous in the help that it has given to people in the Palestinian Authority area. We will continue to do everything we can to support the Palestinian people, but there is one issue that must be addressed by the Palestinian Authority—that is, security on the Palestinian side. If people want progress towards a two-state solution, which we have championed—an independent, viable Palestinian state living side by side with Israel—the security within the Palestinian area is of prime concern. We have done everything we can to support them, but we need some help back from the other side. Incidentally, one other thing I should mention is that another reason for our concern was the recent statement from Hamas following the elections in the Palestinian Authority that it intended to release the particular people in that detention centre. I hope that people understand, therefore, that we could not continue with a situation where wholly unarmed people were put at risk.

Mr. Cameron: I am grateful for that answer. Specifically on the issue of Hamas, its election victory and the effect on the funding of the Palestinian Authority, do not the events of the past 24 hours reinforce the need to ensure that Hamas abides by the conditions set down by the international community, which are to recognise Israel, abandon violence and abide by all the previous agreements between the Palestinian Authority and Israel, one of which concerned the running of the Jericho prison?

The Prime Minister: It is the case that in addition to the bilateral assistance, which in this financial year amounts to some £36 million, we have also supported the €120 million package from the European Union, so we are giving every support of a humanitarian kind to the Palestinian Authority. The only way that we are ever going to get a peace process beginning again in the middle east is if it is accepted that the solution to which the international community is committed—a two-state solution—can be proceeded with only if both sides accept the existence of the other state. Otherwise, it is extremely difficult to see how we can make progress. One thing should be made very clear again: we totally respect the mandate that Hamas secured in the elections. We supported those democratic elections, we support them still. But if it wants our help—both financially and politically—to make progress, it has to be on an understood basis, which means giving up violence, negotiating peacefully and accepting the existence of Israel.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Yesterday in the House of Commons, the Foreign Secretary admitted that he knew that when the UK and US monitors were withdrawn from Jericho, the Israelis would immediately seek to take the prisoners by force, giving the impression across the Palestinian territories of collusion. Given that yesterday the Israeli Government also reiterated their intention unilaterally to seize more Palestinian land by extending the wall, incorporating more illegal settlements into Israel and effectively annexing the Jericho valley, what are the British Government doing now to re-establish their shattered reputation as an honest broker between Israel and the Palestinian Authority?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that I have to disagree with my hon. Friend. Let me just explain the circumstances in which we came to do this monitoring function. We did it under what was called the Ramallah agreement, entered into in 2002, whereby people who were charged with serious offences, including the assassination of Israeli politicians, would be kept in the detention centre and we would monitor their detention. The agreement on both sides, with Israel and with the Palestinian Authority, is that the Palestinians would take charge of the detention, but it would be independently monitored by us. That was the agreement brokered. We have kept to that agreement every inch of the way. We have done the independent monitoring. The breach has been because the proper detention procedures were not being observed on the Palestinian side. I stress to my hon. Friend that three months of saying to the Palestinian Authority, including, last week, directly to the president of the Palestinian Authority, "Look, this is a serious situation, you have to act", is evidence of our good faith, not our bad faith. I repeat to my hon. Friend, I think it is important that the message sent out from this country, is that we stand ready to take this process forward and to help in any way we can, but it has to be on the basis that agreements entered into are adhered to by everybody.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): The Prime Minister will remember that six years ago the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, South-West (Mr. Darling) then the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, now the Secretary of State for Transport, told the House that his Department should give accurate and complete information about pensions.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Declare your interest.

Sir Menzies Campbell: If the Chancellor of the Exchequer ever gets round to accepting Adair Turner's proposals, it will be some time before I get a pension.

The former Secretary of State for Work and Pensions also said that if someone lost out because of inaccurate information, the Government should offer redress as a matter of principle. What happened to that principle?

The Prime Minister: It is partly in recognition of it that we established both the Pension Protection Fund and the financial assistance scheme, so that for the first time there will be help for people whose pension schemes have been wound up. I accept and understand entirely the sense of loss, anger and anxiety of those who have lost pensions for which they have paid for many, many years, but we have been asked to give, on behalf of the taxpayer, a £15 billion commitment and we simply cannot do that in circumstances where the reason for the loss is the collapse of the pension schemes themselves.

Sir Menzies Campbell: What is the point of an independent ombudsman and a report which makes recommendations when the Government will not accept the conclusions? Does not the Prime Minister understand that if the Government fail to offer compensation it will operate only as a further diminution of public confidence in pensions?

The Prime Minister: Except that, as I said to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, although of course we must and do treat seriously the ombudsman's findings, we are being asked as a consequence of them to give, on behalf of general taxpayers £15 billion-worth of commitment. We simply cannot do that. There is a review of the financial assistance scheme, which may be able to help some people, and we will expedite that review and do it as quickly as we possibly can, but it has to be understood that, in the end, if we were to stand liable for the whole of that loss, it would set a precedent of extraordinary financial proportions for this Government and any other.

Q2. [58393] Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): As regards the Education and Inspections Bill, how does my right hon. Friend respond to those who argue that a proliferation of foundation schools directly contradicts the advice in last year's White Paper, "Every Child Matters", which calls for schools and other agencies to work more closely together to secure a better education for all our children?

The Prime Minister: It is precisely because we understand concerns about selection and the possibility of new selection that we have strengthened admissions procedures so that schools have to act in accordance with the code, rather than have regard to it, so that local authorities have the ability to appeal when an admissions policy is breached and so that the admissions forum is strengthened. All those things will mean that, yes, schools will have the freedom and independence we want for them, but within a system of fair funding and fair admissions. I say to my hon. Friend that if people want that strengthened admissions code and procedure, the only way to get it is to vote for the Bill.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Rural Payments Agency had a target to pay 96 per cent. of farmers by the end of March, which was already 18 months since their last payment. Last week, Lord Bach said that the figure should be more than 50 per cent. Has the Prime Minister any understanding of the anger and financial distress of tens of thousands of farmers who are fending off their creditors because of the Government's incompetence?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I understand the concern. That is why the Rural Payments Agency is working extremely hard to make up the time and to make sure that farmers receive their payments. But I entirely understand their concern; we are working on the matter as hard as we can.

Q3. [58394] Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): Everyone in Staffordshire has spoken with one voice to keep Staffordshire ambulance service independent so that it can deliver the fastest response times, save the most lives at the cheapest cost and keep the best-trained community first responders. Further to the Prime Minister's answer to me on 12 October, can he assure me that Staffordshire ambulance service will be able to maintain its uniquely successful management system, rather than adopting the less successful practices of the other west midlands ambulance services?

The Prime Minister: I understand entirely the case that my hon. Friend and other colleagues from Staffordshire are making. As I understand it, there is a 14-week consultation, led by the strategic health authorities, which will end on 22 March. I can assure my hon. Friend that the outcome of the consultation exercise is not a foregone conclusion. No decision has been made, or will be, until the conclusion of the consultation. I can also assure her that all responses, including hers, will be very carefully considered indeed.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Is not the real answer to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) that the evidence shows that schools with greater freedom over budgets, pay, staff, buildings, curriculum and admissions achieve better results? Does the Prime Minister agree that everyone who wants to see greater parental choice and less interference by LEAs and independent schools within the state sector should vote for the Bill tonight?

The Prime Minister: Of course I agree that it is important that schools have the freedom to manage their own budgets, staff, buildings and so on, but on this side, we do not agree that selection between schools is the answer. If the right hon. Gentleman is so keen on supporting the education legislation tonight, why has he only got a two-line Whip for his Members, and why is he trying to delay the Bill by voting against the programme motion? On 14 December, he asked me to "speed up" the Education and Inspections Bill; on 25 January, he said to me, "Why don't you get on with it?"; in February, he asked for an undertaking that there would be no delay; and this evening, he is going to vote to delay the Bill by voting against the programme motion.

Mr. Cameron: I'll tell you what: you worry about whipping your side, and I'll worry about whipping mine. I will support the Government's education reforms, but I do not support the undermining of Parliament. Trust schools give businesses, voluntary groups, faith organisations and others the chance to start new schools and to operate existing ones. In the past, the Prime Minister has said that he would like all schools to become trust schools. Is that still his ambition?

The Prime Minister: Of course I want schools to become trust schools, which is why we are introducing the Bill. [Interruption.] It will be for schools to decide, which is what the Bill says. Let me come back to the right hon. Gentleman's explanation of why he is voting against the programme motion tonight, and what is more Punch and Judy than that? If he wants this Bill to go through—he has said that I should not delay it—why has he not got his Members voting unanimously tonight, and why is he voting against the programme motion? [Interruption.] Well, let me tell him why that is and why he has got a two-line Whip. In the Bill, there is stronger protection against selection, there is a prohibition on interviews for admissions, there is a stronger admissions forum, there are tougher powers for LEAs to intervene in poor and failing schools and there is power for local authorities to give free school meals to all their pupils. Those are all good reasons—no wonder he is hesitating, but we should not.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister is going to need to spend a bit more time talking to his colleagues rather than shouting at me. He is being ridiculous, because he knows that we do not support routine programme motions. We believe in parliamentary scrutiny—I know that the Prime Minister probably cannot even spell those words, but we happen to think that it is important. Why is a Prime Minister with a majority of 70 struggling to explain to his own MPs why we need to reform our schools?

The Prime Minister: First, let me deal with the right hon. Gentleman's extraordinary contention that he is voting against the programme motion because it is routine to do so. I have here a list of 22 Bills this parliamentary Session in which he has not opposed the programme motion. Why is he opposing the programme motion tonight? He is opposing the programme motion for the same reason he has got the two-line Whip—the reasons why people should support the Bill are to do with equity and fair admissions, which are reasons that he cannot get his side to accept.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): The Prime Minister is aware that I have been campaigning for some time on behalf of my constituents and others who have lost their pensions. Does he agree that those affected are not looking for a handout but their own money back, which they saved on Government advice? Will the Prime Minister give full consideration to the ombudsman's report, which seems to be being dismissed out of hand at the moment? Will he have discussions with the trade union community and Amicus on their European action with a view to finding a solution to this?

The Prime Minister: Of course, I entirely understand that if people have lost the pension entitlement that they built up over many years, they will be extremely worried and angry about that. The question, however, is the degree to which the Government have to stand guarantor. It is precisely because of the concerns that were raised that we introduced the Pension Protection Fund and the financial assistance scheme. The difficulty is that if we end up saying, as the ombudsman would like us to, that we stand surety for all that money, it is a £15 billion bill, and I honestly cannot commit the Government, or any Government, to that.

Q4. [58395] Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): What encouragement will the Prime Minister give to the Ilford, North and Redbridge-based Drugsline Chabad on its 15 years of excellent work in tackling the problems of drug and alcohol abuse? Will he congratulate it on its new pilot scheme involving the Jewish and Muslim communities, showing how that can benefit the entire community of London? Will the Prime Minister please encourage it?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to offer that encouragement and to congratulate it on its excellent work over 15 years; long may it continue.

Q5. [58396] Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): As today may be a somewhat challenging day for the Prime Minister, can I cheer him up by suggesting a policy that would be very popular? If he rejects the moves by the big supermarkets to deregulate Sunday trading, he would be supporting families, protecting small businesses, and pleasing the Churches, and he would get the enthusiastic support of Labour Members. Can he think of any reasons for not doing that?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend probably knows, the Department of Trade and Industry is conducting a review of the Sunday trading rules. It is right to consider these issues because a great deal has changed in the 12 years since the restrictions were put in place. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is meeting the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers to listen to its concerns. If my hon. Friend wishes to make today less challenging for me, the remedy is in her own hands.

Little Havens Hospice (Castle Point)

Q6. [58397] Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): If he will visit Little Havens children's hospice in Castle Point to see the work of professionals and volunteers and to discuss funding.

The Prime Minister: I have no current plans to do so, but I should like to pay tribute to the work done by Little Havens children's hospice in Castle Point.

Bob Spink: I am grateful for that. The whole House will want to join the Prime Minister in paying tribute to everyone who works in and supports the hospice movement. We acknowledge the extra cash that has been put into the national health service, but what has happened to that cash? Children's hospices, on average, get only 5 per cent. of their funding from the NHS. Little Havens gets less than 2 per cent. Will the Prime Minister meet a delegation from the children's hospice movement to discuss the funding of our terminally ill children? Is he aware of the high level of public concern about this issue, as demonstrated by the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has put his point across.

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the hospice movement and all the work that it does, and I want to underline my congratulations to it. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there has been substantial additional investment in the national health service, as well as from the lottery fund—I know that Little Havens benefited from that. We are looking to see what more we can do for palliative care in all sorts of different ways. I am of course always happy to meet representatives of the movement.

Engagements

Q7. [58398] Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Is the Prime Minister aware that it is now more than 10 years since Private Cheryl James died at Deepcut Army barracks, but her parents, Des and Doreen, still do not know how or why? Last Friday, the Surrey coroner, Michael Burgess, concluded his inquest into James Collinson, who also died at Deepcut. He said that the Ministry of Defence

"should take whatever steps are necessary to restore public confidence in the recruitment and training of young soldiers whether at Deepcut or elsewhere" and that

"they have nothing to fear from an inquiry held in public . . . where the various issues . . . can be explored in greater depth".

I simply ask the Prime Minister to agree to meet the parents of the four deceased Deepcut recruits, once Nicholas Blake has completed his inquiry, to hear their views on the matter.

The Prime Minister: I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that the report by Nicholas Blake QC has not yet been finalised. I understand that it will be finalised at the end of the month and I cannot comment further until we have received his findings.

Q8. [58399] Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): I want to ask the Prime Minister about the only direct bus link from Grimsby and Cleethorpes to Hull, which is about to be withdrawn because the Humber bridge board refuses to offer toll concessions for public transport. That is causing great concern to the residents of Grimsby and Cleethorpes. Is not it totally out of kilter with Government policy on promoting public transport, especially when that is the only way that many residents—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister has got the point.

The Prime Minister: I am not entirely sure that I have. The Humber bridge board has applied to the Secretary of State for Transport to increase tolls in line with inflation. The application was considered at a public inquiry on 7 February and my right hon. Friend will consider the inquiry inspector's report and announce his decision in due course. I entirely understand the concerns that my hon. Friend raises, but the matter must be considered in the context of overall funding and the tolls for the bridge.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Does the Prime Minister share my revulsion at the fact that this is the only country in the world that calls itself a democracy where it appears that one can buy one's way into the legislature simply by giving a lot of money to one of the three major parties? Is not it time to bring that squalid system and all suspicion of it definitively to an end?

The Prime Minister: I simply point out that we are the party and the Government who introduced transparency into party funding. It is, of course, important, and no doubt it will be debated in the context of House of Lords reform.

Iraq

Q9. [58400] Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): What discussions he has had with President Bush on the deployment of US and British troops in Iraq.

The Prime Minister: I regularly have discussions on a wide range of issues, including the deployment of US and British troops in Iraq, with President Bush.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the Prime Minister recognise that this weekend is the third anniversary of the invasion of Iraq by British and American troops, that 2,000 American soldiers and more than 100 British soldiers have sadly lost their lives, and tens of thousands of Iraqis have died? Does not he think that it is time to set a date for the withdrawal of British and American troops from Iraq to end the occupation and the growing scandal of the huge profits that British and American companies are making from reconstruction? Does he accept that the continued presence represents more of a problem than a solution?

The Prime Minister: It is correct that American and British soldiers and civilians have died in Iraq. They died in the course of an attempt by those engaged in terrorism and acts of violence to stop the country getting democracy. My hon. Friend referred to an "occupation". We have been there for two and a half years under a UN mandate and with the full consent of the first ever democratically elected Iraqi Government. Twelve million Iraqi people voted in their election—with a higher turnout than here, the US or most European countries. They voted for democracy—they want democracy. Discussions are going on between all the parties—Sunni, Shi'a, Kurds—to try to form a Government of national unity. People are trying to stop them through acts of terrorism. What do we do? Do we walk away and let those who want the bomb and terrorist acts to determine the future of Iraq win or do we stand up for and alongside the 12 million people who voted for democracy and say, "These are values we share and support, and we're prepared to fight for them"?

Engagements

Q10. [58401] Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): To revert to the question about the Government not implementing recommendations from the ombudsman, does the Prime Minister recall telling the Labour party conference in 1997:

"I don't want to live in a country where the only way pensioners can get long term care is by selling their home"?

Scandalously, nine years later in England, that is still the case. Does the Prime Minister intend to retire soon to Scotland where it is not?

The Prime Minister: First, let me point out to the hon. Gentleman that, through our support for pensioners through the pension credit, the Government are spending about £10 billion extra a year for today's pensioners. Secondly, we have introduced the Pension Protection Fund and the financial assistance scheme. We are doing all that we can to help current and future pensioners. I come back, however, to the choice that we face. I know that, because it is a difficult decision, the Liberal Democrats will not want to face up to it. Either we say that we will pay out on behalf of the general taxpayer £15 billion, or we have to look for another way of dealing with the issue, and I do not think that we can afford to do that.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): Last year, College high school in Erdington federated and doubled its GCSE rate to 24 per cent. I am told that that can cause chaos in all the other local schools, throwing their admissions and staff recruitment all over the place. Should we just leave it at that? Is it good enough under a Labour Government that only a quarter of working class kids get a half-decent basic education? Should we just leave it where it is?

The Prime Minister: No, we should not. My hon. Friend is right to say that there has been tremendous progress in the last eight or nine years. Let us not forget that, when we came to office in 1997, funding per pupil was being cut under the previous Tory Government. Since then, we have increased tenfold the investment in our schools and seen increases in results at ages 11, 16 and 18. However, my hon. Friend is right: that is not good enough while any child does not get the education that they need. It is for that reason that, alongside the investment, come the change and reform. Specialist schools and city academies are already making a difference, and the Education and Inspections Bill will give us the chance to ensure that every child, whatever their circumstances or background, gets the chance to succeed. That is why it is a Labour Bill, and it should be supported by Labour Members.

Point of Order

12.30 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. At column 1391 of today's Hansard, I am reported as having participated in the debate on the Animal Welfare Bill, talking about elephants, poodles and alligators. I can assure you that I made no such comments, and that they should rightfully have been attributed to the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac). I wonder whether that could be corrected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I should say to the hon. Lady that it is always advisable to check one's speeches afterwards—

Miss McIntosh: But I did not make one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am answering the hon. Lady's point of order for the benefit of the whole House. Obviously, if the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) had checked her speech, she would have known that there was a problem. I thank the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) for raising the matter. I am sure that due note has been taken by the Official Report and that that correction will be made.

Water and Sewerage Charges (Limit on Household Expenditure)

12.32 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a limit on the percentage of household income spent on water and sewerage charges; to provide for the capping of domestic water and sewerage charges so that the percentage limit is not exceeded; and for connected purposes.

Water and sewerage charges have increased by an average of 48 per cent. in real terms across the country since privatisation in 1989. The increase is an alarming 85 per cent. in the far south-west, mostly due to South West Water having some of the largest infrastructure and environment protection liabilities falling on one of the smallest customer bases. Indeed, the sewerage element of the water bill in the south-west has increased by over 100 per cent.

Failure at the time of privatisation to protect customers in areas where disproportionate charges would have to fall under market conditions, and inaction since, have compounded a problem first identified 30 years ago, and the situation is not set to get any better. Presently, households in Devon and Cornwall on fixed and low incomes are finding the £449 average South West Water bill too much to accommodate. Many people in the south-west are spending more than 3 per cent. of their disposable income on water and sewerage bills alone. That situation is unsustainable. It is projected that bills in the south-west will, on average, be £675 within the next four years. That is not only unjust but a wholly disproportionate burden, especially in the context of the low average incomes in the far south-west. In my constituency people earn 23 per cent. less per week than the United Kingdom average, yet their water bills are 33 per cent. higher than the average. The greatest burden is falling on those who are least able to carry it.

Water poverty is defined as spending more than 3 per cent. of disposable income on water bills. Nationally this year, nearly 10 per cent. of households were in water poverty, and that is set to rise. It is estimated that by 2010, 40 per cent. of the lowest quintile of earners will be spending more than 3 per cent. of their disposable income on water. Families and pensioners should not have to fear the next water bill to arrive, and worry about how it is to be paid.

Those figures are unacceptable. More than 21 per cent. of average-income households in the south-west spend more than 3 per cent. of their income on water and sewerage. That is only the burden on the average household; the position of pensioners, families and vulnerable groups is much worse. In Devon and Cornwall, pensioners spend more than 6.5 per cent. of their incomes on water and sewerage before they find the money to pay their council tax, electricity bills and escalating gas bills.

As we know, the council tax protests started in Devon as a result of what were considered to be high council tax charges. A campaign began, with people withholding some of the increase in their council tax. As the Government are well aware, 75 per cent. of a local authority's income comes from central Government and not the council tax payer. An enormous number of people would have to withhold council tax for it to have any impact on local Government services.

[Mr. Adrian Sanders]

There has recently been talk of a similar campaign over water charges. As 100 per cent. of the charge funds the company, not many consumers would need to withhold a proportion of their payment for its share price to plummet. Who would be there to pick up the pieces if a water company went into liquidation following the cutting off of its income stream by its own customers? The Government would have to intervene to deal with the chaos caused by lack of water and sewerage supplies. That is why the issue demands the Government's attention.

Pension and benefit rates are supposed to reflect essential outgoings such as payment for water and heat, but national rates do not reflect regional variations. Many reasons and excuses are given for that regional disparity, but there seems to be no willingness to change. The far south-west must bear most of the burden of cleaning up the nation's coastline: 3 per cent. of the population pay for the cleaning of 30 per cent. of it. Just under 10 million tourists visit the area each year, and local people must accept the knock-on cost throughout the year in the form of higher water charges. Projects in other regions also have an impact on their water bills—for instance, the renovation of Victorian infrastructure—yet their bills are not increasing by as much as 10 per cent. a year.

There are a number of ways of helping customers who are stuck in this situation. First, there is water bill equalisation. The precedent in Northern Ireland demonstrates that the Government are willing to consider fairer charging, and a similar method could be introduced in the rest of the United Kingdom. The Consumer Council for Water has said that the circumstances of Northern Ireland and the far south-west are identical in terms of low population, lower incomes and huge coastlines.

Under the scheme in Northern Ireland, the water bills of some 200,000 households will be capped at no more than 3 per cent. of their incomes. That will not just help pensioners and those claiming benefits; all households will pay an average of £30 less, and some bills could be as low as £60.

The principle has also been tested north of the border, in relation to electricity bills. Customers in the north of Scotland were burdened with high bills, due to geographical circumstances that increased the cost of distributing electricity. To reduce this unfair burden, subsidies were put in place, saving the average bill-payer £27 a year and keeping 15 per cent. more people out of fuel poverty. That situation sounds remarkably similar to that of the people of the far south-west: geographical circumstances resulting in a higher utility charge.

Another option is a payment similar to the winter fuel payment to help pensioners stay out of water poverty. Pensioners are the group worst hit by high water and sewerage charges, and they would benefit most from support. However, such a payment to all pensioners would not target those who need support—those whose water and sewerage bills exceed 3 per cent. of their income.

So there are many mechanisms that the Government could consider, and which they have shown a willingness to implement in other contexts. They should have a duty of care to ensure that nobody in the United Kingdom lives in water poverty. More than 30 years have elapsed since the problem of disproportionate water charges was first identified, and it is more than a quarter of a century since legislation was introduced in this House to deal with it; sadly, it was repealed prior to privatisation. It is time that action be taken. This issue should not have to come before the House again in 30 years' time.

12.41 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): This is a piece of typical Liberal nonsense, but it is dangerous nonsense and the kind of thing that we have come to expect from the muddled thinking of the Liberal Democrats. I thought that we had many legitimate concerns these days about water supply. In fact, a current concern here in the south-east—and, I suspect, in other parts of our country—is that the water supply is in some danger, so we should be very careful when discussing the delicate balance that inevitably must exist between consumption of water, the price charged for it, security of supply and future security of supply. The Bill would interfere with all that in a very negative and unhelpful way.

This is a very obvious populist pitch by a rather desperate political party, but we must not be seduced by that, must we? We must remain focused on the vital necessity of ensuring that the relationship between water consumers and suppliers remains properly balanced. I, being a great believer in the market—as the Liberal Democrats used to be but seem not to be any more—believe that the price mechanism is still the best means of maintaining that balance. We have to ensure that water suppliers can achieve enough revenue and be sufficiently profitable to invest in security and cleanliness of supply, and to address the environmental concerns that rank so highly these days, not least in respect of sewerage, which the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) mentioned.

I fail to understand how on earth the artificial limit on the amount that can be charged for water that the hon. Gentleman is arguing for would allow us to achieve security and cleanliness of supply. If revenue is arbitrarily limited, investment will inevitably be limited—unless the Liberal Democrats believe that the difference should be made up by the taxpayer. Perhaps they are prepared to contemplate passing on that additional burden to the taxpayer, turning the clock back to the bad old days when we had insufficient investment in the water and sewerage infrastructure. But I doubt whether anyone, except, perhaps, the Liberal Democrats, would deny that under the new regime we have seen a dramatic and consistent increase in investment in our water supply, for which we should all—householders and other domestic consumers, business and industrial consumers—be very grateful. That would be put at risk if we were to succumb to the argument that the hon. Gentleman made. I am sure that if right hon. and hon. Members were to study the terms of the Bill, they would find it completely unacceptable because it would destroy the relationship that has been built up very carefully between consumers and producers, which provides the investment necessary to ensure that our water supply is continued as we would wish.

A ready resort to capping or limitation cannot be the answer. There may be other answers, and the hon. Gentleman hinted at some of the other approaches that he might favour. However, they are not included in the Bill and, therefore, he undermined the argument for his Bill not only by failing to make the case for it, but by distracting our attention to other possibilities. I hope that the House will not support the Bill and that we hear no more about it.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 23 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business), and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Adrian Sanders, Andrew George, Matthew Taylor, Mr. Dan Rogerson, Julia Goldsworthy, Mr. Colin Breed, Mr. Gary Streeter, Mr. Geoffrey Cox, Mr. Anthony Steen, Angela Browning, Richard Younger-Ross and Nick Harvey.

Water and Sewerage Charges (Limit on Household Expenditure)

Mr. Adrian Sanders accordingly presented a Bill to establish a limit on the percentage of household income spent on water and sewerage charges; to provide for the capping of domestic water and sewerage charges so that the percentage limit is not exceeded; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 17 March, and to be printed [Bill 147].

Orders of the Day

Education and Inspections Bill

[Relevant documents: The First Report from the Education and Skills Committee, Session 2005–06, HC 633, The Schools White Paper: Higher Standards, Better Schools for All, and the Government's reply thereto, Cm 6747.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Before I call the Secretary of State, I must announce to the House that I have not selected the reasoned amendment in the name of the leader of the Liberal Democrat party. I have also placed an eight-minute limit on Back Benchers' speeches.

12.48 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Today, I set out before the House a Bill whose very heart and purpose is to give every child—no matter who they are or where they come from—the opportunity to fulfil their potential. I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to make interventions as we go along. I have spent many—mainly happy—hours debating these issues with my hon. Friends and other hon. Members over the past few months, and I will be generous. But with the permission of the House, I will make some introductory remarks before I outline the main provisions in the Bill, after which point I will be happy to take many interventions.

Last month, the parliamentary Labour party celebrated its 100-year anniversary. Every party has played a part in progress towards where we are now, but it is Labour Governments who have delivered the key reforms, backed by the investment that was so badly needed. We brought in comprehensive education, it was a Labour Prime Minister, Jim Callaghan, who 25 years ago led the debate on the national curriculum, and this Labour Government introduced free nursery places for all three and four-year-olds.

Almost nine years into this Labour Government, spending on school buildings has increased sevenfold, there are 30,000 more teachers and more than 100,000 more support staff in our schools. Thanks to our sustained investment and reform, our children have been doing better, but we must do more. Yes, we have record results at ages 11 and 14 and at GCSE, but still 45 per cent. of children do not get five good GCSEs. Yes, schools in deprived areas have improved even more quickly than the rest, but still seven out of 10 pupils on free school meals do not get five good GCSEs. Yes, we have record numbers of our young people staying on to study at A-level, but we still have one of the worst staying-on rates at age 16 of any country in the industrialised world. If Britain is going to go forward in the new global economy, I say to this House that that is simply not good enough. We must do better.

That is what this Bill is about. For the first time, it puts a duty on local authorities to fulfil the educational potential not just of the bright or easy-to-teach child, but of every child. In addition, for the first time in the history of this country, this Bill introduces a right to a high-quality vocational education for every young person from the age of 14, reversing the historic weakness in vocational provision.

[Ruth Kelly]

If we want every school to be a good school, and that is our aim, we must act to make it happen, not just hope that it will. This Bill, through its proposals on trust schools, increased local authority intervention powers and stronger pressure to improve, does just that.

I turn now to the proposals in the Bill on trusts, one of the matters raised with me most frequently over the past few months. Every hon. Member knows that schools work best when they have an effective head teacher who gives strong and inspiring leadership. This Bill will build on what we know works. It will give heads the powers that they need to forge new partnerships and drive up standards in their schools. Therefore, trust school status will allow head teachers to work closely with other schools, with colleges and with external partners such as universities, charities and business foundations, bringing new energy and commitment to the education of pupils at the school.

Some people, including some Opposition Members, have argued that all schools should be compelled to become trust schools. However, I can tell the House that I will never force any school to become a trust school.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to hear the Secretary of State make it clear that she will not force existing schools to become trust schools, and I should like her to confirm that. However, she has moved away from her initial statement that there would be no new local authority schools to suggesting that there could be new local authority schools, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. What criteria would underlie that approval? How can she convince me and others that the change is more than a change in wording and is, indeed, a change in substance?

Ruth Kelly: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I know that she takes this issue especially seriously, and she is right to point out that the Government have, quite properly, made a move in that respect. Some Labour Members, and other colleagues in local government, have made the case very strongly that, where parents want a new community school because they think that that is in their children's best interests, we should not prevent them from having one. It is right that there should be a route for new community schools, but we must make sure that local authorities really think through what is in children's best interests. However, I can tell my hon. Friend that the Secretary of State will, of course, allow local authorities that have done that thinking and that have a good track record to put forward such a proposals.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that her Department will not prevent community schools by the back door, as it were, by starving them of resources? That has happened before, with plans for new schools being rejected unless they have an academy.

Ruth Kelly: I can certainly give that assurance. Trust schools will be funded on exactly the same basis as any other local authority maintained school, because they are local authority maintained schools. I will not use my office to force local authorities to go down a route that they do not wish to go down. I will never force any school that does not want to become a trust school to adopt trust status.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside) (Lab): In relation to the establishment of wholly new schools, will my right hon. Friend confirm that it will be possible to use the corporate performance assessment, the Audit Commission's quality assessment, to vary the approach of the Secretary of State to propositions developed at local level? Those with a high-quality assessment rating would therefore be exempt from intervention by the Secretary of State, on the principle of intervention in proportion to success.

Ruth Kelly: I understand the very interesting proposition put forward by my right hon. Friend. The CPA criterion that he suggests as an objective measure of whether a new community school should be allowed is a potential answer to the problem, and I can assure hon. Members that the use of the Secretary of State's power will be based on objective criteria that can be judged and scrutinised by the House. However, I am not convinced that the CPA is precisely fit for purpose. For example, a local authority might not perform very well according to that assessment, but might also be improving its educational performance very rapidly. In such cases, it might make sense for a new community school to be proposed. That is precisely the sort of matter that I shall want to discuss further in Committee.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab) rose—

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD) rose—

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD) rose—

Ruth Kelly: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), and then to the hon. Members for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) and for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis).

Angela Eagle: I thank my right hon. Friend. Many colleagues on this side of the House have been worried about the concept of trust schools, and especially because of the ethical and financial probity of the sort of organisations that may get involved in such schools. We all seek reassurance about that. As the Bill goes through its Committee and Report stages, will she think about introducing an approved list of those who could bid to become involved in trusts?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. I can tell the House that there will be very strong safeguards to prevent the acquisition of inappropriate trusts. That is essential. As a result, they will be regulated by the Charity Commission as well as by the local authority. They will be funded by the local authority, which will be able to object on educational grounds to any trust that it thinks will damage children's educational standards. However, perhaps the most important safeguard will be the common sense of parents and governing bodies. They will decide whether it is in a school's interest to adopt a particular trust. Moreover, I can reassure my hon. Friend about how that accountability will be reinforced. It should be possible to remove a trust if the non-trust governors on a governing body—parents, local community representatives and staff—decide that that should happen because the relationship has broken down.

Sarah Teather: The Secretary of State said that she would not force community schools to become trust schools. However, if it is such a great deal, can she explain why only 23 secondary schools and one primary school have expressed an interest in becoming trust schools? Those figures were contained in the Government's response to my request under the freedom of information legislation.

Ruth Kelly: I can tell the hon. Lady that I have spoken to dozens of schools that are interested in becoming trust schools. Only this morning, one head teacher wrote to The Guardian and said:

"This is about putting the interests of pupils first, to raise standards and improve outcomes for all. That is why we have such a strong commitment to collaborating with others".

The author of that letter said that he thought that it was his school's duty to consider adopting a trust. Where schools want to raise standards and see opportunities for doing so within the local authority framework, they ought to be able to do just that.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): On potential inducements to schools to become trusts, there is an element of suspicion about the Waltheof school in the constituency of the Minister for Sport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), to which children from my constituency go. It has been made clear to the local authority and the local community that unless they accept an academy, there will be no money for a new school. That was the inducement. Will she say explicitly that there will be no inducements or pressures on schools to become trusts schools? Will she extend that commitment to the future provision of academies, so that that sort of pressure is not put on local authorities to accept, with the obvious proviso being that they will not get the money unless they do?

Ruth Kelly: I can give my hon. Friend the commitment that there will be no financial inducement for schools to become trusts schools. They will not benefit from any additional capital or from any additional revenue funding. They will be funded by the local authority under the local authority distribution formula, which is then agreed locally by heads. That is the way in which the system will operate because trust schools are local authority schools and operate within the local authority framework. My hon. Friend has an issue about academies, but it is important that authorities think through from first principles on how to raise standards for children. However, I can give him the assurance he is seeking on trusts schools.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): A few weeks ago in the White Paper, the Government's position was that there should be no new community schools. Under intense pressure from their Back Benchers, they now say that there can be new community schools subject to a veto. When the pressure dissipates after the Bill is passed, what is to stop the Secretary of State, or indeed any of her successors, changing her mind, going back to the White Paper position and vetoing any new proposals for community schools? Some of us think that that would be a very good idea. Will the Government go back to where they were with the White Paper?

Ruth Kelly: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman has not been seeking the views of his local government colleagues. He only has to ask Alison King, the Tory chair of the Local Government Association's children and young people's board, what she thinks about the proposals for new community schools. She has been arguing that there should be a route for new community schools to be established because that is what is right. I have told the House that the Secretary of State's judgment will be based on objective criteria. We will have that debate in Committee, where we will examine exactly what the best criteria should be.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I hope that my right hon. Friend will continue to encourage trust schools. As a former sceptic about city academies, I think that we need to look at the evidence. The evidence of the London academy in my constituency is that since September 2004, GCSE passes are up by 9 per cent. and A-levels by 40 per cent. The academy is now in the top 5 per cent. of schools nationally in terms of progress for 11 to 14-year-olds and in the top 3 per cent for 14 to 16-year-olds on the same intake as it had before. It is now over-subscribed twice over. Some 45 per cent. of the pupils are entitled to free school meals and more than half are from minority ethnic groups—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One page was enough.

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend was making a very important contribution, because academies can be vital in raising standards for children in under-achieving schools—the worst schools in the country, sometimes—who face the most challenging circumstances. Last year, on average, academies improved the results at GCSE at three times the national average, which is why our commitment to introduce 200 academies by 2010 is so important.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the majority of secondary and college heads in my constituency to whom I have spoken about the trusts and the freedoms proposed by the Bill warmly welcomes them, particularly the additional freedoms? Is she also aware that my LEA is putting forward proposals for two academies in conjunction with our beacon status college, Barnfield college? Does she agree that that will assure parents and heads that we have good quality academies coming forward and that we will be able to raise standards in the two failing schools involved in those proposals?

Ruth Kelly: I agree. Trust schools will be another route that schools might want to consider if they think there is an external partner that could help them to raise standards. That external partner might well be another school. Recently, we had a presentation in Downing street from a group of head teachers who are already working in successful schools, but are helping to drive up standards in schools that are performing less well. That is why federations will be such an important way of raising standards for children and one example of where trusts might well come to be of great benefit.

[Ruth Kelly]

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): On the question of schools collaborating to have a trust, I welcome the statement that my right hon. Friend has just made. May I ask her to go further and confirm that that will entail looking at the league tables and performance measurement of whole collaboratives, not just individual schools?

Ruth Kelly: I agree that collaboration is important. In effect, I see adopting a trust as a way of forging deeper collaboration between schools within the local authority system. For example, if a group of schools decided that they wanted to introduce the 14 new specialised diplomas, mixing vocational and academic studies, they might want to establish a permanent relationship, share staff, set up new facilities and bring in outside experts to help. Our proposal is one way to achieve that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) points to how we will have accountability measures that will affect the proposal. First, the Bill introduces a new duty to secure the educational potential not just of the average child, but of every child, taking a real step forward in making sure that all local authorities concentrate on the difficult to reach children and not the easy to reach children. Secondly, my hon. Friend is right about progression. That, too, is important and we are looking at whether we should introduce progression measures to see how children fare after they leave school, as well as when they are at school. These are all issues that complement the five GCSE external accountability measure that is so important for our young people.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): I welcome what my right hon. Friend has just said about collaborative trust working. Does she think that such working may—indeed, should—encourage employers to work effectively and properly with local authorities and schools in developing career pathways for our young people?

Ruth Kelly: I do, and that is an important point. Getting right the careers information, advice and guidance to our young people is so important and was the key element looked at by the Women and Work Commission. I am very concerned that our young people may be pigeon-holed into studying one type of option rather than another, and may not be aware of the significance of the choices that they make early in the school system. Schools must collaborate to deliver real choices within the school system.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): One of the things that concerns me and my colleagues is the issue of double standards when it comes to assessing the suitability of an organisation to develop a new school. The right hon. Lady is absolutely right to say that local authorities should prove their fitness for purpose in terms of developing a new community school. Yet it appears that by putting down £2 million, a crackpot creationist will be able to open a new school and develop an appropriate curriculum. Where in the Bill are the criteria to determine the suitability of organisations other than LEAs to open and develop new schools?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that we do not want inappropriate trusts to work with our schools—that is not what the Bill is about at all—and I have said that trusts will operate within a strong framework of accountability, where local authorities can object to a trust, where parents and governing bodies do not have to work with a trust at all and can remove a trust if they think that the relationship is not working, and where they are within the Ofsted inspection regime.

Of course, I will issue guidance for decision makers—school governing bodies—to take into account when they consider whether a trust is the right one for them. The schools commissioner, based in Whitehall, will advise schools on the track record of trusts, so that they take those decisions in the full knowledge of what will work for children, but the Bill is about enabling schools that see an opportunity to do the best that they can for their children.

What I cannot accept for a moment is that there should be top universities in our country cheek by jowl with some of our most struggling schools and that they should not be asked to commit to the future of those schools. If we can get universities, further education colleges and public and voluntary sector institutions to commit to the future of our schools—not just on an ad hoc basis, which may or may not last for a few years, but on a permanent basis—we have a real chance of making a difference to school standards.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I very much agree with the point that the Secretary of State makes about trusts encouraging co-operation between universities and schools, but will she clarify a point about trusts' access to possible extra funds? If a foundation has a trust behind it and that trust has finance from other sources, will the trust school be able to access extra funds via the trust?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman makes a point that is relevant to any community school that is working with a specialist school partner, but the Bill is not about financial gain and it is nothing to do with money; it is about expertise, skills and commitment, to help to raise standards in our schools. As the hon. Gentleman said that he wants to encourage collaboration, can he tell me why the Conservative party has consistently tried to characterise our policy of introducing trust schools as a return to the failed old Tory policy of grant-maintained schools?

Grant-maintained schools were bribed to opt out of local authority control. They were unaccountable to parents or the local community and able to select their pupils. They were schools for the elite, of the elite. Our new trust schools are completely different from Tory grant-maintained schools. Our schools are at the heart of their communities and are accountable to parents, with fair funding, fair admissions, collaboration with external partners and with one another to raise standards, while working within a stronger local authority framework.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Ruth Kelly: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, whom I know will vote in favour of reducing academic selection.

Mr. Turner: The right hon. Lady mentions fair funding. Can she explain why, since 2000, the gap between the best-funded primary school pupils and the worst funded has increased in Somerset by 90 per cent., in Southwark by 135 per cent. and in Isle of Wight by 46 per cent.—all authorities under Liberal Democrat control? Why has that happened?

Ruth Kelly: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman makes the point about Liberal Democrat authorities. The Government are giving more resources than ever before to deprived schools and deprived children, and we intend to continue to do so. Under the Bill and as proposed in the White Paper, we will spend an extra £500 million over the next two years to support the individual learning of children and the best teaching and learning for this century, because we want to give every pupil—no matter what their prior attainment when they reach secondary school—the chance to catch up with their peers if they have fallen behind, with one-to-one tuition or small group support and, indeed, if they are gifted and talented, the chance to have their talents stretched and their potential reached. The personalisation of teaching and learning—individual support—with the funding geared to those schools that need it most, is an incredibly important part of our package of reforms.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): With regard to catching up, I am really concerned about one of the schools in my constituency—I have mentioned it to Ministers before—where only 11 per cent. of the students achieve five GCSEs. We do not have a top university in Keighley, so I wonder what will be the solutions for that school.

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend presents me with a challenge, but a welcome challenge. That is why the schools commissioner, based in my Department, will be asked first and foremost to identify those schools with the worst results in the most challenging areas, where children are not fulfilling their potential, to find out how we can put in place the support to help them to succeed. Quite frankly, if that means getting a top university or a business foundation into my hon. Friend's constituency, that is the challenge that I accept and that we have to match.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): My local council and all the MPs for the area will work with any Government to improve standards, which are, indeed, improving in Southwark at the moment. However, can the Secretary of State promise that when the Bill is law, no one who contributes, say, £2 million out of a total cost of £20 million to a new school, as a partner, will be able as a result to buy a majority say on the board of the new school?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman has completely misunderstood the proposals before the House. There is no financial requirement for anyone to form a trust school. That will be done completely at the request of the governing body, and if the governing body does not want a trust to have majority representation, it need not have a majority at all. If it wants more elected parents, it can do so. Those are decisions for the governing body of the school, within a strong system of accountability.

Unlike the Opposition parties, Labour Members are clear about what we stand for and what we need to do: provide more devolved power for schools, but greater strategic control for local government. That is why Labour local government supports the Bill. Sir Jeremy Beecham, leader of the Labour group of local authorities, said:

> "We believe that these measures will be helpful to those councillors up and down the land trying to deliver better education on a daily basis."

He urges all Labour MPs to support the Bill. Why? Because, as he sets out, the Bill will enact a new strategic role for local authorities, making the local authority the key decision maker on school organisation matters, and—most importantly—will give local authorities greater powers of intervention not just in failing schools, but in coasting schools as well—a long-standing local government aspiration, now at long last, delivered by the Bill.

My hon. Friends have been concerned that any new system should ensure fairness in school admissions. In that respect, I have listened carefully and I have responded to the concerns that I have heard. In the Bill, there is no new selection by academic ability and a ban on interviews. The Bill will force schools to act in accordance with a tough new admissions code and the system will be co-ordinated. Admissions forums will play a new role in ensuring that local schools deliver for every child. I stress that hon. Members on both sides of the House who back the Bill will be voting for less academic selection in our schools.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): We see in the Bill a requirement that local authorities must abide by the code of admission, but we do not have a code of admission because the previous one was withdrawn. Is it my right hon. Friend's intention that a new code will be published before the end of the debates in Committee, so that a code can be compared with what is in the Bill?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. It is right that hon. Members should have the opportunity to scrutinise the contents of a new code. In actual fact, there is a full consultation process that a new code has to go through before becoming legislation. Of course, that process will have to take place, but I can give him the guarantee that the main contents of the admissions code will be there to be scrutinised by hon. Members during the Committee stage.

[Ruth Kelly]

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown) (Lab): I have a particularly serious allocation problem in my constituency. I am certainly given no confidence by the code that has just died, because that was in complete conformity to the allocation code and did not address the problems in any way whatever. Given that there will be different criteria in different schools as they so choose, does my right hon. Friend think that there is the potential for considerable chaos in allocations?

Ruth Kelly: No, I have to say that I completely disagree with my hon. Friend on this point. I think that the system will be more robust after the Bill than it was before it. There will be less academic selection in our schools and we will have a tougher code that will make existing practices—which he may or may not disagree with—more difficult after the Bill than before it. I can give the House that assurance.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The admissions policy for most of the secondary schools in my patch is based on catchment area followed by siblings. How is it going to differ in any way if they become trust schools? There is a particular problem in that very popular schools sometimes find it very difficult just fulfilling the demand from the catchment area. Many people in the catchment area want their children to go to those schools, so will they be able to expand? How will the admissions policy change after the Bill? Will popular schools be allowed to expand?

Ruth Kelly: On the first point, if the policy changes, it will be tougher rather than the status quo. Issues such as catchment areas and siblings will, of course, be the issues that schools take into account, but where a school is deliberately manipulating its catchment area to avoid taking certain challenging pupils into the school, that will not be tolerated in future. Admissions forums will scrutinise what is happening at a local level and will, on a yearly basis, produce a report examining what is happening and whether schools are, indeed, following the code of practice on admissions. The forums will examine how special needs children, children on free school meals and ethnic minority groups are faring. They will submit their report to the schools commissioner, who will review the impact on social segregation in a full report that will be available to Members of the House, so that we can show that we are reducing social segregation through the Bill and not increasing it.

The hon. Gentleman also made a point about whether successful schools should be able to expand. I have to disappoint him because there is nothing in the Bill on school expansions. There already is a presumption in legislation to expand. However, the decision maker will change from being the school organisation committee to the local authority—something, again, that local authorities have been calling for for years. There will be a stronger, more robust framework for admissions under this Bill than before it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ruth Kelly: I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) who, I know, has strong feelings on this point, before I come on to parents.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): Have I interpreted what my right hon. Friend has just said correctly? Does that mean that selective schools will not be able to expand?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I can tell him something else that he may not have noticed. Under the Bill and for the first time, partially selective schools will not be able to expand either.

Children achieve more when their parents are engaged in their learning. This Bill will build on the excellent work of schools across the country by giving parents more information about how their child is doing at school—termly reports and regular dialogue with teachers. There will be more information about choosing the right school for their child and we will introduce better, cheaper school transport.

Parents are also concerned about behaviour at school. Most schools have good behaviour most of the time, but this Bill makes tackling bad behaviour a major priority. This Bill will create, for the first time, a clear statutory right for school staff to discipline pupils, putting an end to the "You can't tell me what to do" culture. This is exactly what teachers and teaching unions have asked for for years—reforms first proposed by the Elton committee in 1988, but rejected by the Conservative party when it was in government.

This Bill will transform the quality of the food that is served in our schools. Healthy food will not only help to halt the rise of child obesity, but many teachers believe that it will also improve pupil behaviour, motivation, readiness to learn and attainment.

Lastly, I have always said that, as a country, we need to place the same emphasis on vocational education as we currently do on academic education. This Bill will ensure that every young person, wherever they live, can take any of the 14 lines of the specialised diploma that we are developing as part of our radical reforms of the 14 to19 curriculum—first-class vocational education for the first time, as a right for every child.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I am afraid that I am a little behind my right hon. Friend's words, because I am still trying to fathom out why she is insisting on retaining the veto against new community schools. If the veto is going to be at the discretion of the Secretary of State, what thought has she given to its possible use in the future by a Secretary of State not as reasonable as her?

Ruth Kelly: I have given commitments to Members that any local authority with a good track record that proposes a new community school should be able to have that proposal considered. I have also said that the criteria should be objective, to establish whether a local authority has a good track record. We will have a discussion in Committee about how we establish objective criteria and what those criteria will be, but that is the right place for that discussion. The issues involved are, indeed, technical and complex, and we have got to get them right.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): On the very point about community schools and the Secretary of State's veto, is it not a fact that clause 2 builds in a presumption against community schools, because it clearly says that LEAs will be obliged to secure diversity of provision and "increasing opportunities for parental choice"? That being the case, is it not obvious that councils will be obliged to create non-community schools in order to provide the very diversity that will be a statutory duty if the Bill becomes an Act?

Ruth Kelly: I do not agree with my hon. Friend. The introduction of the duty on diversity was made to meet a very specific point. It has been introduced because local authorities need to be proactive in talking to parents, rather than reactive to poor education and poor education provision. Just as children's trusts in the area of children's services actively go out to map demand and talk to parents about what is required and provide a service that meets the needs of parents, so too should they do that for schools. That is the purpose of the duty; not the one that my hon. Friend infers.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): I welcome what my right hon. Friend has said about the improvement to school meals, minimum nutritional standards and removing junk food from school vending machines. However, could she go further and perhaps consider introducing, at a later stage, a duty on schools to teach children about healthy eating, and also allow Ofsted to inspect school meals and report on the school food?

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend makes a very important point about school food. It is about time that we brought back tough new nutritional standards to our schools and improved the diet of our young people. It is right that they should learn about healthy eating and how to cook healthy food. In fact, the personal, social and health education part of the curriculum does that up to a point at the moment, but I also know that the new schools food trust sees this as an important part of its agenda going forward.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): The Secretary of State said that there would be no selection for foundation schools, but can she confirm that they will be able to select pupils on their ability in foreign languages? Given that they can do that, how will that aptitude be assessed? Will it be by interview, examination or continuous assessment?

Ruth Kelly: No, that will not be the case. Only schools that are specialist schools in those subjects will be able to have an aptitude procedure. I am talking about the existing part of the specialist school system, which will work in the way that it does at the moment.

The guarantee that I can give the House on trust schools, the delivery of vocational education, children's services, and the "Every Child Matters" agenda, is that, after the Bill, every school will have to collaborate to deliver the best for their pupils, but they will have the powers that they need to collaborate as they see fit and to work with other schools and external partners to drive up standards for their children within a strong local authority system.

The Bill will help us to raise standards in our schools, especially the under-performing schools in our most challenging communities. It has been crafted on the basis of constructive discussion and dialogue. I am grateful to many colleagues in local government and schools and, of course, to my hon. Friends and colleagues here today who have contributed to the debate and helped to make this a better Bill. I look forward to an ongoing dialogue.

It is because education is so important to us, on this side of the House, that we debate it so passionately. We always have and we always will. We are united in our aim of using education as an engine of social mobility and social justice. That is why we are taking forward our vision of a modern, outstanding education system. The Bill will ensure that young people have a right to high quality vocational education.

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): On that point, will it be the case that parents who want to name a trust school for their statemented child will have the right to be able to force that trust school to accept them?

Ruth Kelly: Yes, and not only that. I can tell my hon. Friend that in future all looked-after children will also have priority in admissions to all schools, whether they are at the beginning of the admissions round or even later, when the school is full. I will make it a requirement that looked-after children are put top of the admissions list.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ruth Kelly: No, I must make progress.

The Bill will ensure that young people have a right to a high quality vocational education. It will introduce a tough new system to ensure high standards of discipline in the classroom. It will mean good quality school food for every child but, most importantly, it will ensure more good schools in our communities. This is a progressive Bill, a reforming Bill, a Labour Bill. I commend it to the House.

1.33 pm

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): Raising standards in education is one of the most important tasks facing any Government, and any responsible person looking at the evidence of the state of our schools today would recognise that much more needs to be done: too many of our schools are simply not good enough.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: I will in a moment.

[Mr. Willetts]

Our weaker schools are concentrated, as I hope the hon. Gentleman would agree, in some of our poorest areas where children most need a hand up from a strong, rigorous and effective education.

Mr. Bailey: I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's appreciation of the importance of education and good schools. Will he explain why the Tory Government consistently failed to provide adequate funds for schools and why he has consistently voted against the extra resources needed for them?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman should contemplate the important question of why, despite the large increases in funding since 1997, the improvement in school standards has been so modest. The answer is that there has not been serious educational reform alongside the increases in funding. That is what today's debate is all about. At last, belatedly, we are seeing some school reform to match the extra funding.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Is it not significant that the areas with the deepest pits of failure are the areas that the Tories control, where grammar schools are prevalent?

Mr. Willetts: That is complete nonsense. We know, sadly, where the problems of failure are concentrated: in some of the poorest parts of our country. No one, on either side of the House, can take any pleasure from the statistics. Some 77 per cent. of children from a more prosperous household get five or more good GCSEs; 32 per cent. of children from a poor household get five or more GCSEs. That is the notorious 45 percentage point gap in pupil achievement. Sadly, that is virtually no better today that it was in 1997, when the Government took office. That is why Government Members should tell us why, after nine years in office, they have made such little progress.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I will give way to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan).

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he unambiguously welcomes clause 40?

Mr. Willetts: I had better just check. There are many clauses to which I am not able to give an unambiguous welcome. Our judgment on the Bill is based on its overall impact on schools. There are many features of the Bill, which I hope to come to in the course of my remarks, that I very much hope it will be possible for us to improve in Committee. That is why it is so important that, if at all possible, we have a long time to study the Bill carefully in Committee. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me about the importance of paying due attention to clause 40 and many other clauses that we may well wish to amend.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I see a neighbour from Portsmouth.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman explain to the young people in my constituency who have seen a massive improvement in the percentage of people getting five GCSEs, from a very low 25 per cent. in 1997 up to 46 per cent., how he can interpret that as no improvement in education?

Mr. Willetts: There has been some modest improvement. [Interruption.] Yes, I am not going to deny that. As I recall, the figures are that 37 per cent. of people were getting good GCSEs, and that is now up to 44 per cent. We recognise and welcome that, but the question for the hon. Lady is why, after nine years, when there have been 207 instructions to schools from the centre and funding has gone up, the achievement of improved standards is relatively modest. The answer is that, despite all the extra funding, schools have not been reformed as they should have been. That is the agenda behind the Bill, to which I now hope to turn.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I will do so after I have accepted an intervention from my hon. Friend.

Greg Clark: The number of people getting good GCSEs may have improved, but is my hon. Friend aware that the number of schools causing concern has increased in the past six months? The proportion has increased.

Mr. Willetts: It is indeed one of the significant problems, to which my hon. Friend rightly draws attention, that there are too many schools in special measures, failing and giving cause for concern. They drift along in those circumstances for far too long. One of the measures that I welcome is the measure to try to speed up that process so that failing schools do not drift along in that limbo state as long as they do at the moment. I am grateful for the opportunity to endorse one of the Secretary of State's proposals.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I will give way to the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) and then I will try to make some progress.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman thinks about these subjects, so I would like him to answer the following question. Which does he believe is more likely to produce an improvement in standards in a school: changing the structure of the school or ensuring that there is the necessary quality of teaching and leadership from the staff, irrespective of the structure?

Mr. Willetts: This is the sort of false distinction that we hear. If I remember rightly, what we used to hear in 1997 from the Prime Minister was "Standards, not structures." The Bill reveals that he has come to recognise that one needs to change structures to help to get standards right. Of course, there are many other things that can be done to raise standards, including, as the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) rightly says, ensuring that there is good teaching.

I was hoping to try to find some scope for agreement. I think that we agree on the need for reform to improve education standards further, and I suggest that we may even have some agreement on how to reform. Instead of the ideological debate that took place for so long about what form education reforms should take, we now have evidence coming in from other advanced western countries about how to deliver effective education reform to raise standards. The evidence from the school choice experiments in America and from Sweden clearly shows that one can raise standards by having more diversity of provision, more freedom for schools and more choice for parents. Those are the principles that we believe lie behind sensible education reform the world over that successfully raises standards.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): On the point about evidence, has the hon. Gentleman looked at charter schools in America? Has he looked at schools in Minnesota and California? He made a point about Sweden, but if he looks at Europe he will see that the best results are in Finland, where there is a comprehensive system throughout the country.

Mr. Willetts: I believe that phonics is an important part of the literacy teaching arrangements there.

There is a lot of international evidence, and I have tried to address it, but I am happy to rest my case on an excellent lecture that I heard delivered at the London School of Economics only a few days ago by the Prime Minister's former adviser on public service reform, Julian Le Grand. His lecture was entitled "Competition and Choice in Public Services" and it set out excellently the thinking behind the Bill and reviewed the international evidence. It does not all point one way, but the vast majority of it points clearly towards what Professor Le Grand, a Labour supporter and former No. 10 adviser, summarises as the three key elements for public service reform: user choice, money following the choice and new forms of provider. That is a good summary of exactly what we need to do to raise standards. I am very happy to rest my case on the professor's lecture, and I rather suspect that the Secretary of State agrees with it, but perhaps at the moment she feels a little inhibited in saying so.

Ms Angela C. Smith: I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman had to say about reform. Does he agree that one of those reforms should be that local authorities are able to require all types of school to set up special needs units to serve the needs of the most vulnerable children in our schools?

Mr. Willetts: There is a serious problem with access to special needs. In Liverpool last week I spoke to parents of children with special needs. Their concern was that their children were going to mainstream schools and they were not confident that even the special units in those schools were the right environment for them. Many of them wanted their children to go to schools specialising in special educational needs, and they were suspicious that some of the units attached to mainstream schools would leave their children vulnerable to bullying. I do not believe that such units are the full solution.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: For some strange reason, the hon. Gentleman was unable to catch the Secretary of State's eye, so I am very happy to give him an opportunity to intervene. He might even want to make the point that he was going to make to the Secretary of State.

Alan Simpson: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I was beginning to get the feeling that had I been stark naked and the only person left in the Chamber I still would not have been able to intervene.

The hon. Gentleman made a point about evidence forming his position in this debate. Rather than listen to the evidence of the Prime Minister's mates, will he look at the evidence presented by the OECD in its international comparisons, which shows that Finland, with its comprehensive system of education, driven through community schools, has the highest standards of attainment and achievement? The OECD also concluded that the fragmented systems around the world widen the gap between the achievers and the under-achievers. Why will not the hon. Gentleman base his position on that evidence, instead of on mates-based evidence?

Mr. Willetts: I would like to turn to the question of fragmentation and diversity in a moment. I hear a lot about Finland. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I should go there on a fact-finding visit. I would be very interested to see what goes on in Finland because several people have put the hon. Gentleman's point to me. However, I would be interested to look not only at the structure of education in Finland but at what goes on in the classroom—at what the teaching methods are. I would be interested to see how literacy is taught, whether synthetic phonics is used, how mathematics is taught and what kind of history lessons are taught. I rather suspect that Finland's standards are so high in the international league tables because of the pattern of education in the classroom which Conservative Members believe in and which has disappeared from far too many of our schools.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I hope to make some progress, but I must of course give way to the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): As Chairman of the Select Committee, I took the Committee to Finland to look at certain aspects of education. We found that Finland is unique: it is small and it does not have the urban problems of most advanced societies with which we tend to compare ourselves. If we make a like-with-like comparison, we see that we are doing very well educationally, and I think that the hon. Gentleman would admit that.

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. This is in danger of becoming a seminar on Finnish education, and the time has come to move on.

[Mr. Willetts]

I would like to resume my speech by quoting an excellent remark of the Prime Minister's when he launched the proposals that we are debating. He said last October, and I thought that he put it very well:

"We want every school to be able quickly and easily to become a self governing independent state school."

That was what he promised us last October. It was such a bold statement that it reminded me of another Prime Minister's view of education reform. Perhaps I can quote to Labour Members what she said:

"I want to see far more schools becoming independent state schools."

That was our agenda for education reform when we were in government, so of course we were delighted when this Prime Minister finally repeated a commitment made by the former Conservative Prime Minister when she set out her views about how to reform education. If only Labour Members had listened to her 20 years ago, we would not have had so many years wasted in appalling attempts to get rid of initiatives such as grant-maintained schools, which we introduced as part of that policy.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: In a moment.

Socialism was once described as the longest route from capitalism to capitalism, and when I see this Government's approach to education reform I am very much reminded of that observation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I give way to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones).

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): The main difference between the hon. Gentleman's Government and this one is the investment that has been made in education—that is why standards have risen. When I taught under the Conservative Government there were not enough textbooks to go around my classroom. Now there are new buildings, new computer suites and plenty of books for every child.

Mr. Willetts: Of course the extra money has gone in—I am not denying that—but surely Labour Members must realise that the question on more and more people's lips is why, when so much money has gone in, the improvement in education has been so modest. Conservative Members know the answer: it is because the extra money was not accompanied by reform. If, when the Labour party first came into government, it had put some of the reforms in this Bill before the House, instead of abolishing grant-maintained schools, the hon. Lady might be able to enjoy a rather greater improvement in school standards as a result of the money that has been spent. That is the important point that I am trying to make.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I give way to the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), who has a long-standing interest in education.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Before entering Parliament, I taught in one of the Conservative Government's independent state schools, otherwise known as grant-maintained schools. As I have said before, there is no doubt that the autonomy that we were given enabled us to achieve more, but grant-maintained schools operated within a system of inequitable admissions, which is ruled out by the Bill. Is the hon. Gentleman happy that that is ruled out, or does he want to go back to grant-maintained schools?

Mr. Willetts: We have heard a great deal about grant-maintained schools, which have been caricatured. Two points have been made about grant-maintained schools. First, we have heard from several hon. Members that funding was unfair and that new trust and other schools will be funded differently. Let us be absolutely clear and set the record straight. Grant-maintained schools received the per capita funding of current expenditure along the lines inherited from their predecessors and there was no special arrangement whatsoever.

Ruth Kelly: What about capital?

Mr. Willetts: It is true that they had access to capital on a different basis, because they did not have access to local education authority capital. If the Government think that grant-maintained schools having access to such money was wrong, why do schools receive access to £0.5 million if they decide to become specialist schools? Why do academy schools sometimes have access to more than £30 million of capital? If the arrangement was wrong for grant-maintained schools, why is it a feature of specialist schools and academies? If Government Members oppose that system, will they denounce those provisions as well? No more extra funding was provided to grant-maintained schools for capital than is provided to specialist schools or academies, so let us hear a bit less from them about that.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): Many Labour Members would object to any preferential funding for any school if we are to treat all children equally. The hon. Gentleman has made more than passing reference to his recent trip to Liverpool. Did he meet the Liverpool Association of Secondary Heads, which is another driving force behind improved standards? In a letter to the Secretary of State it said that the Government have missed a meaningful opportunity by emphasising structural change rather than the agreed drive for improved standards, which has already paid dividends, but with which we need to persist over a period of time.

Mr. Willetts: I accept that structural changes are not the whole answer to the challenge of raising standards in schools, but we need such changes. Evidence from around the world clearly suggests what works. We need more diversity of school provision and school choice, and we need to be able to give schools more freedom. That is the model that is buried in the Bill.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I should like to make some progress, and I hope that it will not be too uncomfortable for Government Members if I set out my reasons for backing the Bill.

It is the Ides of March today, and the sound of daggers being sharpened around him may make the Prime Minister uncomfortable. The Opposition, however, are here to praise the Education and Inspections Bill, not to bury it, and I should like to take the opportunity to do so. The Prime Minister described the launch of his education proposals as "a pivotal moment in the life of this Parliament and this Government."

We all know that a pivot allows something to shift to a different position. It is a great relief that, even though he does not have a reverse gear, at least the Prime Minister has a pivot. On his pivot, the Bill turns.

May I explain to Government Members which provisions we support? We support the fact that local education authorities are at last to be given a clear legal responsibility to pursue choice and diversity in the schools in their area—that is a good thing. We welcome the fact that local education authorities will now be obliged to conduct competitions for new schools, and perhaps more widely. Indeed, although the Secretary of State has not referred to it, buried in the Department's evaluation of the costs and the regulatory issues associated with the Bill is the assumption of 100 competitions a year between different providers to offer new schools. We think that such competitions to provide new schools are a very good idea. We look forward to 100 competitions a year, and welcome the fact that private providers, outside organisations—not just charities but commercial organisations—and independent schools can take part in the competitions to offer to provide new schools. It is a good thing to open up British education to far more diversity than has been the case in the past.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): On the new duty to promote diversity, do we need many more single-sex Muslim schools?

Mr. Willetts: If that is the community's position I would not oppose single-sex Muslim schools. If schools wish to offer single-sex education, they should be able to continue to do so, but there are threats to that in some parts of the country.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): As 200 schools close every year because of falling rolls, roughly how many new schools and new providers will we need? Does the hon. Gentleman still support the Bill, given the Secretary of State has expressly made it clear that it will prevent the expansion of existing selective and grammar schools?

Mr. Willetts: The Secretary of State has duplicated the provisions in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, because she was concerned that she was in danger of receiving our support. On balance, however, the Bill still increases schools' freedom.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I shall try to make some progress, as hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to speak in the debate.

I should like to talk about the provision in the Bill for trust schools. That is a strange policy—it is a policy that dare not speak its name, as the expression "trust school" does not appear in the Bill. Such schools are known as foundation schools with a foundation. Trust schools are the successors of our grant-maintained schools. It is a pity, unlike our approach of proposing grant-maintained schools clearly, honestly and openly in a manifesto for an election fought on that proposal, trust schools do not appear in the Labour manifesto. We made it clear, however, in our 1987 manifesto—[HON. MEMBERS: "1987?"] I have a copy with me. It makes clear what our grant-maintained schools could do. It is true that trust schools do not have quite as many freedoms as our grant-maintained schools, but they are a step in that direction. I would like to remind the Secretary of State of the commitment that we made on grant-maintained schools, and how we envisaged their operation. We said that they would become "independent charitable trusts". That was the proposal that we made in 1987, and I believe that it is the origin of the trust concept.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman, who leads for the Opposition on education, has indicated his support for the Bill, despite the fact that it now includes a mandatory code on admissions and the capacity for local authorities to open new community schools. Will he take the opportunity to distance himself from the lamentable minority report that was prepared by his Conservative colleagues for the Education and Skills Committee and fundamentally opposes both policies? He cannot have it both ways and retain any credibility.

Mr. Willetts: There are excellent Conservative members of the Select Committee, and I thought that their minority report made important points about the provisions. I very much hope that we will have ample time to consider them, because they suggest ways in which the Bill could be improved. I am not claiming that the Bill is perfect—it is a Bill that needs to be improved.

Gregory Barker: On my hon. Friend's point about clarity and honesty, is it not bizarre that in clause 40, on the prohibition of interviews, subsection (3) states that that "does not prevent the arrangements from requiring or authorising any audition or other oral or practical test to be carried out in relation to an applicant solely for the purpose of ascertaining the applicant's aptitude"?

What is that, if not selection?

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend is right. For specialist schools, there is selection by aptitude for 10 per cent. of pupils. It is extremely difficult for anyone to discern the difference between selection by aptitude and selection by ability. As the chief schools adjudicator put it so well,

[Mr. Willetts]

"Finding a difference between the meaning of two such words is the sort of exercise lexicographers get up to when they haven't enough to do."

The fact that the difference between aptitude and ability appears to be a fundamental distinction on which the Government's education policy rests reveals what a fragile structure it is.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend is making a superb speech. Clause 40 states that schools may not interview potential pupils and their parents. What happens if parents go to the school and want to interview the head?

Mr. Willetts: Indeed. The regulations are extraordinary. As I understand it, the purpose of such an interview is for the parents to learn about the school, but the school is not supposed to learn about the parents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I should like to make progress, as I want to consider two crucial concerns about the Bill. The first, which has been mentioned already, is what we might call the fragmentation concern—that the proposals in the Bill will lead to fragmentation and diversity, which will lead to inequity. That is a genuine concern, and I recognise that Labour Members express it with sincerity and conviction. If I honestly believed that the agenda of opening up more freedom for schools and giving them greater diversity would create even wider gaps in our society than exist at present, that would be a powerful objection to the proposals.

However, I have to ask hon. Members who believe that argument, and who believe that we should return to the classic comprehensive model with every child going to their local secondary school, whether that model is as fair and equitable in practice as it is supposed to be in theory. In today's Britain, the main route for getting one's child to a good school is to get one's local priest to sign a chit or to be willing to pay the higher price to get a good house in a catchment area close to a good school—a higher price of £50,000 on average and in some cases possibly £200,000.

I do not believe that a system of allocation of school places by the power of the local clergyman or the parents' ability to pay high house prices is any basis for a 21st century education system. In a modern, diverse, socially mobile country there is no way we can tie people down to their local catchment area and their local school. They are used to having a range of options and choosing between them. They will search the internet for information about how different schools are doing, and there is no basis on which any of us, on either side of the House, should try to pass laws and regulations to stop them exercising such choice.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: Let me make progress on this very important point, because it matters enormously to us on the Conservative Benches. We do not believe that that old model is any longer a way in which people can credibly claim to deliver social justice. That is why the system needs to be opened up, and why we need to consider a radically different alternative allowing greater diversity and choice.

However, the alternative model has powerful critics, and none more powerful than the Deputy Prime Minister, who put it so well when he said:

"If you set up a school and it becomes a good school, the great danger is that everyone wants to go there."

That is his objection to the model and his concern. I wish that that were only one of the absurdities that we are used to hearing from the mouth of the Deputy Prime Minister, but sadly, what he was describing is the thinking that lies behind far too much regulation of schools in our local areas.

As an example of such thinking, I quote from the adjudicator's report on a request to open a new voluntary aided Montessori primary school. He wrote:

"With its new facilities, it"— that is, the new maintained school—

"might prove attractive to more local families who might indeed find places to be available. If this were the case, then the anxieties expressed by the LEA, the schools local to the proposed site and other objectors would prove to be well founded".

So the chief adjudicator did not allow the new Montessori school to go ahead. That is an outrage. That is not the way that education should be conducted in our country today. We want to see conditions made easier for new schools to be created and for successful schools to be expanded.

Somewhere in No. 10, and perhaps at least with the Secretary of State and her adviser, Lord Adonis, there is a recognition that school adjudicators should no longer turn down bids to run a Montessori primary school. That is not a vision for education reform in the 21st century. The Prime Minister gets it. He is clear about that whenever he makes the case for education reform. It is a pity that, because of her fear of her own Back Benchers, the Secretary of State has been reluctant to make a case for education reform on those lines today. We know that the abolition of the school organisation committee and the new power of schools to compete to create new places are exactly what is necessary to move us in the direction that I have set out.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I owe it to the hon. Gentleman to give him a chance to take a breath. Is there not a world of difference between schools selecting parents and parents selecting schools? Does he agree that selection is the antithesis of choice?

Mr. Willetts: Does the hon. Gentleman support specialist schools? Does he agree that they should have distinctive specialisms? Should they be able to select 10 per cent. of their pupils by aptitude in those specialisms? Can he explain to me the difference between the aptitude and the ability of pupils? That is a dangerous question to ask.

Tom Levitt: I am happy to respond. All the comprehensive schools in my constituency are specialist schools, and they may or may not take up to their 10 per cent. of additional pupils. What they do not and cannot do is select against children in their catchment area, who still expect and get comprehensive education from those schools.

Mr. Willetts: The world is moving on.

I have talked about the concern of Labour Members over the possible threat to equity. I understand the concern and appreciate their sincerity. I have explained why I do not believe that the old model of the local comprehensive school can work any longer. There is a second concern—that having laboured long and hard, the Secretary of State has produced a mouse. There is concern that despite the radical talk that we have heard from the Prime Minister and in the introduction to the White Paper, the Bill does not go far enough.

We would like to see far more education reform than is in the Bill. There are too many examples in the Bill of measures that take a step towards more freedom and more choice, only to erect a Heath Robinson sort of contraption around them to stop freedom being enjoyed and choice being exercised. In Committee we will try to bring back the greatest possible freedom for schools.

We have some concerns about restrictions in the Bill. I shall give two examples—first, the power of the schools adjudicator. The Bill increases enormously the adjudicator's power to interfere in the decisions that individual schools take, including about their admissions, but about many other matters as well. The powers of the adjudicator appointed by the Secretary of State are so enormous that it would be tempting to allow the powers to go into legislation, knowing that a future Conservative Secretary of State could use the powers of the adjudicator provided for in the Bill to change the education system in the way that we wish. If we simply wanted to come to power with maximum Executive freedom by fiat to change schools, we would use the powers of the adjudicator. I am sure that Labour Members will wish to consider that point.

I do not believe in free-standing executive discretion on the scale that will now be enjoyed by the adjudicator. It is important for those of us on both sides of the House, who believe that ultimately these decisions should be taken by people who are democratically accountable, to consider whether we are content with the amount of discretion that the adjudicator will enjoy under the Bill and, in particular, whether we believe that it is right that there is no provision for any appeal by a school against a decision by the adjudicator. This is one way in which it may be possible for Members on both sides of the House to improve the Bill.

Secondly, on the important issue of interviews for admission, the Bill goes even further by explicitly banning, in primary legislation, interviews for all purposes other than the allocation of children to a state boarding school. That ban is already in force through the admissions code, but it is tightened up in the Bill. I recognise that, and I regret it. It goes to the heart of an important confusion in the Bill. The Bill contains tough, indeed draconian, powers on discipline, and, in this day and age, we need to make it clear that teachers have disciplinary powers. But the Government are only thinking of how to improve order and discipline in a school by giving teachers almost unfettered power to discipline children. There is a better way of ensuring that schools are orderly and can maintain discipline, which is by encouraging schools to have a distinctive ethos and to have parents who are committed to the school and understand its ethos. Being able to invite parents to an interview to establish whether they and their children are committed to a home-school contract is a good way of establishing a commitment to discipline without having to fall back on the severe disciplinary powers proposed in the Bill. We know that a small number of Church schools have historically used interviews in order to establish the religious conviction of parents. I rather suspect that the Prime Minister is aware of such procedures used by schools. It is a great pity that he appears to be committed to a provision that would stop schools doing what the school to which he sends his children has been doing, which seems to us to be a reasonable way for Church schools to establish a denominational commitment.

The Prime Minister said to a Labour party conference:

"I believe we're at our best when we're at our boldest".

On another occasion, he said:

"Every time I've ever introduced a reform in government, I wish in retrospect I had gone further".

When he contemplates the Bill, I am sure that he will wish that he had gone further. It will be our task in Committee to make sure that the Bill goes a lot further than it does now.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next Member, may I just remind the House that an eight-minute limit has been placed on all Back-Bench speeches? That applies from now on.

2.13 pm

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside) (Lab): I am sure that Members on both sides of the House will understand the nerves of a new Back Bencher. Even on the ides of March, I thought that the speech of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), the shadow Secretary of State, did not add up to a Mark Anthony and it is unlikely that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would wish to play Cleopatra. His speech was, first, all about apologising for past Conservative education polices and, secondly, a feeble effort to try to divide this side of the House by pretending that the Conservative party is in favour of the Bill because it believes in the measures in it.

The measures remove the kind of unfairness that the shadow Secretary of State has been talking about this afternoon when he was eulogising about grant-maintained status. Some Labour Members remember that very well: the unfair admissions, the unfair funding, the separation of one school from another and the inability to get people to realise that collaboration, not competition, helps schools to work with each other to provide a decent education. In the six and a half years during which I had the privilege of leading Labour's education policy, we undertook to overturn the unfairness we inherited in 1997.

[Mr. David Blunkett]

I commend my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister for listening and responding to the concerns that existed when the White Paper was published. It would be a great disservice to those who listened and responded if the message were to go out that Labour Members were churlish enough not to take that response and rejoice in it; in other words, if they were to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory, as we did so often in the 1980s. The message must go out that if the Government are prepared to listen and respond, then we, too, listen and respond and give our support to those measures.

The strengthening of the admissions code, placing the changes in the Bill so that the wording will be "in accordance with" the code, not merely "have regard to" it, will be a major step forward, as will be the development of the forum not merely for admissions at local level—which some progressive local authorities, such as my own, already operate—but also to plan places for the future. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) mentioned in Prime Minister's questions, this also undertakes what is covered by the agenda in the White Paper, "Every Child Matters".

We believe in equality of opportunity in a way that the Conservative party demonstrated that it never did in the 18 years that it was in power. The Bill provides for a pupil-centred curriculum, an emphasis on vocational education—I hope that that will be a link between academic and non-academic pupils, not merely those who have been struggling with an academic agenda—and an emphasis on discipline and on the ethos of the school, which often drives people, particularly in inner London, out of the state system.

In Hackney, the most deprived borough in the country, 20 per cent. of parents send their children to private school at secondary level. Those parents are making a choice by opting out. We want people to make a choice by opting in to their local school where the standard of education is such, and where the culture and ethos have been so developed, that parents are proud to say that they are sending their chid to that school. The legacy we inherited was exactly the opposite. Special needs children were forgotten and under-investment and under-achievement were simply taken for granted. I remember what it was like in my constituency. People were not worrying about 25, 35 or 45 per cent. of pupils achieving A to C grades, but 6 and 8 per cent. In the school that is now known as Firvale community school, a specialist school, the figure was 6 per cent. The school had an 80 per cent. ethnic minority intake and the children and parents were told that no better could be achieved. The figure is now 36 per cent. and rising. That did not hurt neighbouring schools. They have transformed their achievements with the same intake they always had. Children will not be bussed from my constituency to the south-west of Sheffield, not just because it is a practical impossibility to get those in the south-west to bus back to my constituency, but because places are not available.

The imperative is to transform education for those children by the sixfold increase in capital investment, the 30,000 extra teachers, the 110,000 teaching assistants and the emphasis that we place on intervening in the most disadvantaged areas. Trust status, collaborative as it must be in those areas that choose it, builds on the education action zones that we have created since 1997. Education action zones focus on disadvantage and they draw in resources from outside business and support from universities. I do not mind at all if HSBC wants to use some of its £11 billion to invest in an academy in my constituency. It will not have to because the seven schools that serve my constituency at secondary level have transformed themselves. They have also formed a new sixth form college in collaboration with the education authority in an entirely new governance model, reminiscent of the trust status that we are talking about. Each is sharing and contributing—a part of the transformation in education that every one of us on the Labour Benches wants to see.

While accepting that there will be differences between us, all of us accept that the real fervour—the passion—for education in the Labour party is because we know, as I certainly know, that it is the transforming element in people's lives. It takes people up the ladder, out of disadvantage. We want good education authorities, sharing and working through the forum, to be able to liberate people to enjoy the quality of education that so often they have been denied.

Schools control schools, not education authorities. Today, we are building on the history of what we debated in 1995 and 1996 at conference and in the Education Act 1998. Because I benefited so much from education, I know that my constituency is an area that needs educational reform more than any other part of Britain. Building on what we have done, we shall achieve even greater strides in the future to transform our system.

2.21 pm

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The Bill is an eclectic mix of proposals, some of which we broadly welcome, such as the, albeit tentative, moves towards personalised learning, the streamlining of the inspectorate and the intentions behind the provisions on school nutrition. I suspect that those proposals will be largely uncontroversial.

We also welcome the implementation of the Steer report on school discipline, especially the measure that finally clarifies the ambiguity in the law that left teachers without legal authority to impose discipline in the classroom and in other appropriate educational settings. We want to probe the proposals on pilots for school transport in more detail before offering support, but my main concerns about the Bill lie elsewhere.

The problem with the Bill as a whole is that it is timid on reform—[Interruption.] It is a timid Bill, with hidden dangers. Instead of building a radical, fresh agenda for reform for the 21st century, the Government's 11th Bill on education looks back 20 years for its ideas. Instead of addressing standards, which is the issue that most worries parents and future employers, the Bill focuses on structures. By failing to grasp real reform, it fails to tackle the most pressing problems in our education system and, worse, may actually entrench them.

The Bill is a missed opportunity. At the heart of the problem with the Government's education reforms is a conflict at the heart of the Government, and the tension is played out in the Bill: whether to adopt a competitive or a collaborative model for education. The Government's failure to think clearly about that has paralysed their thinking. From the moment that the White Paper was published, No. 10 has spun in one direction and the Secretary of State has been forced to row back the rhetoric in another. We shall end up with a Bill that is a mish-mash of both approaches, with no clear vision for the future.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah Teather: I shall give way when I have finished this section of my speech. Be patient, please.

The opportunity for radical reform lies not in trying to combine the oil of competition with the water of collaboration, but in marrying a different set of opposites: autonomy and collaboration. Autonomous schools should decide which teachers they employ and how they spend their budgets, and should have the one freedom that the Government have constantly failed to give them—matching the curriculum they can offer to the needs of the pupils they serve. Collaboration means local schools and colleges working together to share good practice to develop the expertise of staff and share facilities, delivering with other agencies, including the local authority, the five outcomes that we want for children.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): According to a Liberal Democrat press release, schools would be required to take a certain number of children who are eligible for free school meals, otherwise they would lose out financially. Is not that a focus on social engineering and structures rather than on standards?

Sarah Teather: We would like admissions to be controlled by the local authority; we do not think it appropriate for schools to control their own admissions, as that is much more likely to entrench social segregation. One of the things that we have been looking into is giving schools an incentive to take children from disadvantaged backgrounds or who are underachieving and, under the proposals that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, giving them extra money to take those children so that they can do well—[Interruption.] That is one of the proposals that we are looking at and I shall come back to that point later in my speech.

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): Given that the Bill does so much to improve discipline in classrooms, why do the hon. Lady and her party intend to vote against it?

Sarah Teather: As I explained, although we welcome those proposals, there are so many other aspects of the Bill that are timid on reform that as a whole it is not good enough to accept. The Conservatives have made a similar decision; there are things that they do not agree with, but they have decided on the whole to support the Bill. Each party must consider the Bill as a whole. We have done so and we do not feel that it is good enough.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Lady has just explained why she is not in favour of giving schools autonomy on discipline. Can she explain why she is not in favour of giving children aged between 14 and 19 the skills they need to do well in society?

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman has not listened to what I said. That is not what I said. I said that we were opposed to giving schools autonomy on admissions, not on discipline. Particularly lacking in the Bill are proposals to implement the reforms recommended by Tomlinson. There are proposals on personalised learning, but they are timid reforms that go no way towards meeting the needs of young people.

We object to the Bill because we believe that the Government have missed the point about freedom and they have missed the point about choice. The proposed new trust schools will lack the one freedom that schools really want and that pupils really need—the freedom to teach what young people want to learn. But they will gain the one freedom that is likely to make inequality and discrimination worse—the freedom to pick their pupils.

The most important predictor of educational achievement for young people growing up in Britain today is their parents' income, and the gap between the attainment of rich and poor is getting worse, not better. For many young people—more than 16,000 last year—that means they will leave school with no qualifications at all. About half of 16-year-olds leave school with fewer than five good GCSEs. Britain has one of the worst records in the developed world on 16-year-olds leaving education, yet post-16 education has a huge impact on a young person's future earnings. Almost 80 per cent. of young people who leave school at 16 go on to earn less than half the average wage, so our education system is fostering inequality rather than aspiration.

If we are serious about tackling poverty and social justice and about giving all our young people the opportunity to fulfil their potential, we must address the reason why so many are failed by the current system. Reform of our education system must begin with freedom for schools from the over-regulatory centralised curriculum, with real reform of education to give young people choice and opportunity over what they learn.

Tom Levitt: The hon. Lady is making points rather than arguments. The thrust of what she seems to be saying is that the Bill does not go far enough, but given that it is the only Bill on offer and that it takes us a long way along many of the lines that she has set out, why does not she accept half a loaf and then go further?

Sarah Teather: Because, as I was about to point out, some of the problems with the Bill will make it difficult to implement the reforms that we want.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Lady knows that the Conservatives who now run the Isle of Wight council were bequeathed a failing education system by the Liberal Democrats, who admitted as much when they left office. Can she tell me on how many occasions they asked the Secretary of State for derogations from the national curriculum such as she has described?

[Mr. Andrew Turner]

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman cannot expect me to know the detail of what has happened in his local area, but if he writes to me, I shall write back.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Due to the hon. Lady's rationing policy on interventions, I must refer back to her remarks on admissions. The Bill states that looked-after children will have priority on admissions, which already happens in my constituency. By voting against the Bill, the hon. Lady will deny that right to all the other looked-after children in the country. How will that help disadvantaged children?

Sarah Teather: The provision that the hon. Lady has mentioned will be introduced by regulation and is not part of the Bill.

If we are serious about reforming education, we must, as I have said, implement the reforms in the Tomlinson report. The entitlements to diplomas laid out in the Bill are all very well, but they will do nothing to shift the two-tier system in education. The two-tier system fails children at both ends of the academic spectrum, because the brightest children are not stretched and many others are completely disaffected. Both groups of children need the option of combining skills and study to allow them to enter the work force with knowledge and know-how.

The Labour Government claim to advocate the politics of transformation, yet they have bottled this chance to transform 14-to-19 education, leaving untouched one of the most potent sources of Britain's class divide. Why will they not implement the root and branch reforms recommended by all since the late John Smith's commission on social justice more than a decade ago.

Mr. Dismore: Is it Liberal Democrat policy to abolish A-levels?

Sarah Teather: As we have said, we want to implement the Tomlinson report, which means using building blocks in a modular form to build towards a diploma.

To implement the Tomlinson report properly and provide real pupil choice, one needs a model by which schools and colleges work together. Clause 149 includes enabling powers to support schools and colleges in working together, but there is no incentive and no requirement to adopt that approach. No school is likely to be able to offer a full range of courses for students across the whole range of vocational and academic study, let alone arrange for work-based learning, if it is appropriate.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): Will the hon. Lady acknowledge that she has only read the Bill in part? I chair the all-party group on adoption and fostering, and it states on the face of the Bill that top priority will be given to admissions for looked-after children, which is crucial. I hope that she has the decency to acknowledge that she has read the Bill only in part.

Sarah Teather: I shall certainly look at that point. [Interruption.] I have been in this job for one week, and if I am wrong, I am happy to be corrected.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Lady is confusing me, because one moment she talks about devolving power locally, while the next she talks about making changes at a higher level. The Bill gives schools choice, and I point her to the example of Hackney, where strong political leadership has resulted in freedom for local schools along with a requirement to collaborate. If she believes in decentralisation, she should believe in the power of local government to get schools to work together.

Sarah Teather: I believe in decentralisation, but I do not believe in devolving power on admissions.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Will the hon. Lady explain how it squares with Liberal philosophy to oppose giving more freedom to schools, parents and governors to form partnerships or federations of their choosing in order to raise standards in their school?

Sarah Teather: I shall come to that point later in my speech. We do not oppose that approach—in fact, we welcome it. It would be better if groups of schools and colleges in an area came together to collaborate and co-operate on timetables and teaching and were judged by their collective efforts and not by the individual exam results of each institution. I welcome the Secretary of State's support for federations, which already exist in many areas, and I also welcome the change in language on supporting collaboration, but the problem is that the Bill does not include a lot of those proposals.

As has been said, schools could collaborate through loose federations and more formal learning networks, or we could require schools and colleges to work together in a community learning trust, which would still allow external partners to participate. [Interruption.] I have no problem with the concept of a trust; my problem concerns particular details. [Interruption.] I also have a problem with giving freedom on admissions. Reducing the number of parent governors on a trust rules out community governance.

We need to reform education and focus more on students' needs. When one examines the most poorly performing secondary schools in England, one finds that they are plagued by three interrelated problems—poor discipline, truancy and young people opting out of post-16 education altogether. Pupils are currently voting with their feet. In the months of posturing leading up to today's debate, the word "choice" has been oft used and much abused, although it actually appears only three times in the Bill. The Government have not used the word "choice" in respect of young people, and we need an education system that gives young people choice and encourages them to take responsibility in their lives.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way—she is being quite generous. Will she take this opportunity to clear up the Liberal Democrat policy on discipline, because I have been confused by her remarks so far? Does she agree that bad behaviour is a key ingredient in poor performance in schools and that we need more discipline? Does she support clauses 84 to 86, which extend parenting orders and all of that?

Sarah Teather: We all agree that the Bill is complicated, and one needs copies of about four Acts and five statutory instruments to understand it. However, I cannot answer on "all of that".

We support all the recommendations in the Steer report, although we are concerned whether the proposal to take the parents of excluded children to court if their children are found in a public space in the first five days of an exclusion is practical, so we want to probe that issue further.

Mary Creagh: Before the hon. Lady entered this House, she was briefly a councillor in a north London authority—later, she became the local candidate in another part of the London. She has discussed timidity in the Bill, but she was on the committee that scrutinised the outsourcing of the Liberal Democrat council's school meal service, which resulted in the outsourcing to Scolarest of school meals, the closing and selling off of school kitchens and children being fed a different type of mechanically separated turkey every day. Does she regret her timidity when she sat on the committee that failed to provide decent school meals for children in that area?

Sarah Teather: Perhaps we should get back to dealing with the detail of the Bill.

Mr. Bailey: The hon. Lady has rightly identified bad discipline as a reason why some schools perform badly, and she has advocated radical changes. Why does she not support the radical change of giving teachers the right to discipline in school?

Sarah Teather indicated assent.

Mr. Bailey: In that case, why does the hon. Lady not vote for the Bill on Second Reading and table amendments in Committee on the items with which she does not agree?

Sarah Teather: I see that I am going to have to repeat myself several times. That was pretty much the first thing that I said, when I explained that we all have to make a choice based on the whole Bill, just as the Conservatives have. They have made a choice on the whole Bill and said that although there are things that they disagree with they feel that it is worth giving it a Second Reading. We have looked at the whole Bill, and I am afraid that we feel that there are too many problems for us to be willing to give it a Second Reading.

Let me return to the word "choice", which has come up rather a lot. The choice in the Bill, if there is any, is all about decisions at 11. I believe that choice should be a theme that should run throughout the education system. Even when choice is mentioned, I cannot help wondering whose choice it really is. If one lives in a rural area, much of the hubbub about choice in schools is irrelevant because there are not that many to choose from. For parents in urban or semi-urban areas, whether or not free transport is offered, the crisis at 11 is about surviving the stampede to get into one popular school and hoping that one's child does not end up lumbered with any of the unpopular ones.

That is not meaningful choice. The problem is that if we give schools the freedom to control their own admissions, we will take away what little choice parents have and hand it to schools that will have the power to choose their pupils. All the evidence suggests that when schools do that, they choose the well-off and bright children, leaving the others to go to other schools. That is hardly surprising given the incentive to do so because of nationally publicised league tables. If we move further down this route we could completely undermine the comprehensive system.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah Teather: I am not going to give way now as I want to make some progress.

Let us look at the evidence on admissions and social segregation. From the Sutton Trust, to Simon Burgess's work at the University of Bristol, to Rebecca Allen from the Institute of Education, the findings are similar. Schools that control their own admissions and perform highly are less likely to take poorer students than the catchment area would predict. The Government will say that they have outlawed more schools being able to select by ability, that they have forced schools to operate in accordance with the new code, and that they have legislated to prevent schools from interviewing in order to choose pupils. That is welcome, but it is not enough. Very few schools use interviews to select pupils anyway. Much more serious are the covert measures such as gerrymandering of catchment areas, name recognition and selection by aptitude, which is really just a semantic sleight of hand for selection by ability.

Is anybody really convinced that a code to be published after the Bill will be tough enough anyway? Will it be sufficiently tight? Can a beefed-up admissions forum police it adequately? Will it have the data? Will it be prepared to challenge the data provided? Will it really be prepared to grass on its high-performing local schools to the schools adjudicator? Frankly, a system that needs so many safeguards probably is not safe in the first place.

One wonders how on earth parents are supposed to navigate their way around a system with so many more schools operating their own criteria. One choice adviser per local authority is about as far as the proposed £12 million is going to go.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady has indicated that she is not going to give way at the moment.

Sarah Teather: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will give way in a moment, but I said that I wanted to make some progress.

[Sarah Teather]

Every MP and councillor will know that schools admissions are one of the most controversial aspects of education. Surely that is therefore the one issue that should have some accountability. The local authority is the right place to decide an area's admissions policies for community schools, foundation schools and city academies. Whatever other freedoms they may have, this one needs a strategic overview.

What about parent representation on the governing body of these trust schools? We know the direction of travel that the Government take on this. Look at academies, which need only one elected parent governor, with all the others appointed. That is no way in which to increase parents' influence on schools.

Mr. Andrew Turner: If 100 pupils are admitted to a school and 365 are turned down under one admissions policy, and the admissions policy is changed, will not that still lead to 100 pupils being admitted and 365, perhaps different, pupils being turned down?

Sarah Teather: It will not change how many are turned down. The key problem is the criteria that are used for turning them down and whether those criteria are accountable. Will the brightest children or those with the most well-off and articulate parents be taken? If so, we will have two-tier schooling.

Ms Angela C. Smith: The hon. Lady's comments about city academies are surprising given that when the Liberal Democrats were in charge of Sheffield city council they opened up negotiations with the Vardy Foundation for a city academy. I would appreciate her comments on that.

Sarah Teather: One of the problems with the way in which the Government run education is that they do not give councils an awful lot of freedom about the kinds of schools that they want to offer in a particular area, so that they are forced down a route, either through bribery or financial incentive, and often through the building schools for the future programme.

If the Government really want to turn round underachievement and social segregation in schools, they need to look again at the way in which schools are funded. If a means could be devised to target specific funding at young people who are underachieving or disadvantaged, schools would have an incentive to take those young people and they would get the extra resources that they need to thrive. By that I mean not just targeting a local authority or a school but following the pupil. We are looking at how such a system could be implemented in practice. A similar model has been used in the Netherlands and in Finland with considerable success, and I hope that the Government will look in more detail at such methods.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Is the hon. Lady aware that Stockport council, which is Liberal-controlled, constantly argues that more money should go to the wealthy areas of the borough such as Cheadle and Bramhall rather than to the poorer parts of the borough such as Reddish?

Sarah Teather: The hon. Gentleman underlines the point that I am trying to make. Wealthy areas often have young people, children and families who are very deprived. That is part of the problem of targeting money at a particular area instead of at particular deprived families. The index of deprivation is very wide, particularly in Stockport.

Mr. Khan: The hon. Lady expressed concern about poorly performing schools and said that local authorities should be given a greater role. The National Audit Office report on improving poorly performing schools in England recommended that local authorities should intervene in them earlier. Why is she not supporting that provision in the Bill?

Sarah Teather: I will come to that later.

I want to move on to the roles of central and local government. For all the spin on freeing up schools, it is notable that in the first 70 pages of the Bill the Secretary of State is mentioned in action or possible action more than 60 times, regulations prescribing this and that are mentioned more than 50 times, and the guidance of the Secretary of State is made available 20 times. She is going to be an extremely busy girl. It is hardly localist. We broadly support the idea of local authorities moving to a more commissioner-based role to support increased diversity in the system, but we do not see why they should not also compete to run community schools. That is a local decision that should not be subject to the Secretary of State's veto or interference.

If we want local authorities to commission, we need to decide exactly what we mean by that. First, we need to give them the power to decide how much money to put into education, and where to target it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Private conversations are breaking out. The House must listen to the hon. Lady who is addressing us.

Sarah Teather: Hon. Members are still trying to decide how to vote.

How can anyone believe that the Government are serious about any real substance to this commissioning role when at the same time as they announced it, they also announced the first dedicated schools grants, which bypass local authorities and for the first time ever take education funding decisions out of their hands?

Secondly, when local authorities commission other services they follow a standard model of good practice whereby they carry out a needs assessment, then commission services to meet those needs and hold service providers to account. The model in the Bill has been spun as little more than giving local authorities the power to book the newspaper space to advertise the competition. There is a key strategic role for local government here, which has not been adequately acknowledged. This Bill, like the Conservative legislation in the late 1980s, has been driven by 10 years of rising school rolls and increasing levels of distress and anxiety on the part of parents, particularly in the capital, who have found they cannot get their children into a school they that they are happy with. However, we are about to face 10 years of falling school rolls, and we will lose an estimated 500,000 teenagers from our schools in the next 10 years.

Do the Government expect the market to manage school allocation and resources efficiently? What will happen when a school faces closure and opts out to become a trust school? Unless councils are given a more explicit role in managing resources, they will find that they have two conflicting duties: efficiency and good management of public finances, and providing choice in the system. The Government have simply not tackled that.

The improved role of local authorities to step in when schools are coasting or failing academically is to be welcomed greatly. However, local authorities also have other duties, including fulfilling the requirements of "Every Child Matters". They have no powers to step in when trust schools fail to achieve those criteria. Indeed, the spin on the model is unlikely to encourage the cross-departmental approach to children and young people's services that is required. We are therefore back where we started.

Do we need a model for education that encourages competition and places choices in the hands of schools and their trustees, or do we want one that champions choice for pupils and parents, and promotes autonomy and collaboration? I know which model I believe will deliver for children, especially the most disadvantaged, who already miss out so much under the current system. The Bill fails to do that. The Government should go away and think again.

2.51 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather). It is her first time on the Front Bench. [Interruption.] Let us be generous—it is a stressful occasion. We hoped that she would be briefer than her predecessor, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), but we were disappointed.

In the short time that Back Benchers get, I should like to concentrate on two matters, the first of which is the background to the Bill. Many words are bandied around about different parties' achievements in comprehensive education. We should all remember with some humility that comprehensive education was a grass-roots movement. It was a passion of people from many parts of our country who hated the 11-plus, and the social division on which it was based, so much that they and local authorities throughout the country—some of them not Labour—changed the situation. National politicians joined in a bit later. Let us be honest about that.

However, once we had got rid of the inequity of the 11-plus in much of our country, we did not think hard enough about its replacement. Too much of the debate for the past 50 years has been superficial. Let us consider the history of comprehensive education. Last year, I went to Kidbrooke school for its 50th anniversary. It was the first purpose-built—in 1955—comprehensive school in the country. In 1964, Harold Wilson said that now we had comprehensive education, we would all have a grammar school education. That was wrong. We wanted comprehensive education to mean the right education for all the talents—practical, vocational, academic or a combination of all three. Some of us have been slow to tackle that.

What goes on under a school roof? In the time that I have had the privilege of chairing the Select Committee on Education and Skills, I have learned that one picks up, usually through school visits, what is happening on the ground and one can compare it with some of the great speeches that are made in this place. I believe that, until 1997, we did not get far.

In the run-up to the 1997 election, Labour Members started to think about what genuine comprehensive education should mean. We started discussing diversity and choice well before 1997 because we did not want comprehensive education to mean—we are not supposed to mention "bog standard" any more—the same sort of school in every part of the country. We wanted schools that were of their community and responded to skills needs, parents' aspirations and so on, and a fantastic change has occurred since 1997.

We have not achieved everything we wanted but we have got away from some of the "isms". I went to the London School of Economics, where I was taught by Michael Oakeshott, the famous Conservative philosopher. He said that one should put more faith in the pursuit of intimations—steady progress based on evidence—than in any "ism", be it socialism, fascism, communism, nationalism or Conservatism.

Let us be honest with each other. In the past 10 years, Labour Members have seriously considered the sort of comprehensive model that we want. We have set a course. Of course, we have not arrived—education is not like that. The shadow Secretary of State was a little pompous in some of his comments about that. [Interruption.] He is not always pompous. Sometimes he makes not superb, but pretty good speeches.

We have not only had 10 years of newly defined commitment to comprehensive education in the communities that they serve, but we have moved to a new position whereby we put resources behind our aspirations. No one, not even Conservative Members, can deny the money that has gone into education at every level—pre-school, throughout mainstream school, to higher education—about which I often ask for more assurances. We have genuinely changed the commitment. I shall make one party political comment. I sat in the House for 18 years listening to Secretaries of State who would never send their child to a state school tell me, who sent all my children to state school, how well they had done for the state sector. The Government have therefore made a great change.

My second point is about the progress of the Bill. It was initially published as a White Paper, which the Select Committee had the privilege of considering. It was not perfect. No measure has ever been perfect. However, we should be proud as parliamentarians that we turned the measure into a good Bill. We made it a rigorous, better and radical measure. I believe in its principles: fair admissions and diversity and choice. What is wrong with that for the communities that we represent? Nothing. However, we must support it with resources and leadership.

The measure is diverse. Fair admissions must be at its heart. The Secretary of State asked us to judge her and the Bill on whether it delivered for the underprivileged child who does not get the sort of education that we would like for our children and those of every constituent whom we represent.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): Is not the problem that we have to judge the Bill without knowing what the code of practice will contain?

Mr. Sheerman: When we took evidence on that, we were happy that the code of admissions would be tougher. It had already been accepted that there would be no interviews. The Secretary of State assured us that the admissions code would be stronger, more robust and fit for purpose. Our suggestion that the admissions forum, local authorities and schools could call in the schools adjudicator toughens up the number of times that the adjudicator can be brought in if something that should not go on is happening.

The Select Committee also made a genuine breakthrough in getting the concession on what the school commissioner could do to assess the intake of schools throughout the country. Although I would prefer an annual assessment of schools' social mix, I am most proud of the biennial assessment, which the Select Committee's report recommended.

The White Paper and the Bill received more consultation than any other measure that I can remember in my 26 years in the House, and not only in the Select Committee, although I think that we did a darned good job. Okay, we did not get unanimity, but we produced a very good report. However, we also saw Labour Back Benchers and people from other parties making positive suggestions that were listened to by the Secretary of State and the Government, and we got change. Not only that, we got change in the School Transport Bill that came in last year. The Transport Committee looked at it, and it was obvious that it needed changing and improving. Why cannot we be proud of ourselves sometimes, not just because of our parliamentary responsibilities but because we have changed a Bill and improved it, and because we are now on course to make our country's education better than it was before?

3 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): I am confidently expecting, at the end of this debate, to take part in Divisions that will give the Bill a bigger majority on its Second Reading than almost any Government Bill of recent times. That would give me particular pleasure because it is on the subject of education.

This also marks a considerable shift in the agenda of political debate. A large bloc of the Labour party is moving towards consensus with members of my own Conservative party, at least on the agenda of political reform, and it is important that we should do that. The poor performance of the British state education system, compared with that of most major industrialised countries, is one of the weakest features of British society. I rejoice that we are moving so close to a consensus; I only regret that it has taken us almost 20 years to get there, during which key figures who are now advocating the reforms from the Labour Benches have spent some of their time bitterly opposing the very principles on which they now base their legislation. However, that is behind us now, and I understand their difficulty. The Secretary of State made a speech in favour of a Bill of which I am broadly in favour, during which I had to listen to her stressing—for reasons I entirely understand—all the parts of the Bill that she never wanted to put in, and with which she hopes I disagree. I do disagree with some of them and I hope that we can amend them in Committee. However, we all know the direction in which we are going.

Some peculiar versions of the history of education reform have been given recently, but they have glossed over Kenneth Baker's reforms of the mid-1980s. The parenthood of the Bill is only too plain to see. I shall not labour that point because we are looking forward to what needs to be tackled and how we can make the best of what we are now doing. However, I shall just remind the House of the old adage: if it looks like a dog and barks like a dog, it probably is a dog. Labour Members are never more ridiculous than when they go blue in the face trying to convince us that the supposed trust schools are not grant-maintained schools, or that the city academies are not city technology colleges, renamed. Indeed, the same legislation was used to introduce the academies that we used to introduce the city technology colleges. Labour Members also talk about diversity of supply, parental choice and the opportunity to compete in terms that would have resonated with everyone who was Secretary of State during the third term of Mrs. Thatcher's Government.

I get worried when the Secretary of State tries to tell the likes of me that I am about to vote against principles that I hold dear. She plucked out as an example some feature of the Bill that she had thrown to old Labour. However, I am reassured when I go back to the White Paper, because there is absolutely no doubt about the direction the Government were setting out when they produced these measures. The Prime Minister's foreword states that "the local authority must move from being a provider of education to being its local commissioner and the champion of parent choice."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] So say all my right hon. and hon. Friends. The Prime Minister's foreword continues:

"Our aim is the creation of a system of independent non-fee paying state schools."

That is perfectly clear, and it explains why the Secretary of State's veto over local authority proposals to carry on opening new community schools has been insisted on by the Government and remains part of the Bill. I am warmed by the fact that they have stuck to their guns on that, at least. I hope that any future Secretary of State in a Conservative Government will make ample use of that veto when local authorities try to challenge the structure for which this Secretary of State is paving the way.

If I may, I shall embarrass the right hon. Lady further by quoting her own White Paper. Paragraph 1.30 on page 20, describing the new system, states:

"This can only be achieved in a system that is dynamic, with weak schools replaced quickly by new ones, coasting schools pushed to improve and opportunities for the best schools to expand and spread their ethos and success".

That involves competition. It also involves enabling the best schools to expand and moving quickly to close irredeemably failing schools. That has been slightly obscured in the wording of the Bill, but let there be no mistake among Members below the Gangway on the Labour Benches: I know how a Conservative Secretary of State—and new Labour Secretaries of State over the next year or two, if they can get away with it—will implement that policy and use those powers.

Paragraph 1.35 on page 21 of the White Paper states:

"And if parents want to open a school, then it should be the job of the local authority to help them make this happen."

That follows a long, clear description of how parents should be in the driving seat when deciding what kind of school provision they want. They should be the best arbiters of the arguments about unsuitable people coming in and trying to run trusts or unscrupulous people misusing their powers. We must trust parents more; they want the best for their children. I agree with the Government that creating more parent power in this way within this kind of structure will finally move our education system further forward at a much more satisfactory speed.

Lynne Jones rose—

Mr. Willis rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a moment.

The problem is obvious. Before we get to our resounding majority in this debate, the main problem is that the Labour Government are not being allowed openly to express the courage of their new convictions by their own Back Benchers. We are engaged in a curious political exercise this afternoon, but I hope that it will lead the way not to total agreement—there are plenty of details still to argue about—but to a new agenda, a new footing for the education debate. That is certainly what Margaret Thatcher, Kenneth Baker and I, when I was Secretary of State, would have wanted to see 15 or 20 years ago.

Mr. Willis: I was a head teacher when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was Secretary of State, and I know just how effective those Conservative policies were at dumbing down standards—[Interruption.] I had to get out. He has made some serious points in trying to drive more Labour rebels into the Opposition Lobby, but will he tell me where the evidence comes from that more parents want the powers that are now outlined in the Bill and which Baroness Thatcher and others wanted from 1983 to 1987?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I am conscious of the fact that the Labour Front Bench, my Front Bench and Members like myself have not yet managed to get the public to catch up with us. It is only too easy for the Liberal Democrats, every time reform is proposed, to get on a platform and oppose all reform and structural change. The easiest way to get a cheap round of applause is to say, "We don't need to change anything. All we need to do is make our own local school better." We have spent years doing that, and the present Secretary of State and every Conservative Secretary of State have been driven to the conclusion that that will not just spontaneously happen. We need resources and reform, and we need the system to be shaken out of its complacency about its performance. People do not realise, if they live in a decent area and their school is doing rather better than those in the run-down downtown areas, that this is not good enough. As the Government rightly say, too many schools are coasting along. Some are doing quite well, but they are not doing as well as they should. Diversity, choice and competition will enable us to challenge that complacency, bring a new dynamic to the system, and introduce some new providers who will do better.

I want to make one more point, very briefly.

Lynne Jones: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I literally have no time.

We must tackle the question of selection. It is bizarre that, in order to secure as many supporters as possible, the Secretary of State should pretend today that we are arguing about the 11-plus, and about selection. She needs to address a key question: if education is to be personalised and tailored to each pupil, what is to be done about the gifted children in poorer areas? The old shibboleths do not answer that question, but it is a question that the Government must answer and we must answer—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's time is up.

3.10 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), although on this occasion he confined his remarks to generality and rhetoric. We heard very little about the outcomes of his own tenures as Secretary of State for Education and as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Those of us who have followed developments in education over many years know that those were years in which teachers and others involved in education, including parents, were desperate because of the underfunding of education and this country's relatively poor attainment levels in comparison with those elsewhere in Europe, to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred. Those levels are improving significantly, and I would have expected him to acknowledge that the Government's increase in resources for education has been a major factor in that improvement.

I am one of the Members who criticised the White Paper when it was published. I considered it a poor piece of work. It was incoherent in many respects, it lacked an evidence base, and it contained claims and statements that were difficult to credit. It was difficult to understand how local authorities could act as strategic champions for their areas, working to raise standards and to ensure an adequate supply of places to meet parental aspirations, if they were the subject of vilification in some of the background briefing and if their role was being written off as though they were being sidelined. I do not think that that was at all helpful.

I pay tribute to the Secretary of State and her team for the way in which they have worked with Back Benchers like me over the past few months, and to the Select Committee and others who have voiced significant criticisms of the original White Paper and have worked to improve it. We now have a Bill that I shall be happy to support tonight, although I still feel that changes are needed.

My main reason for supporting the Bill is that it continues the good work already done by the Government to raise educational attainment levels. It recognises the importance of a coherent approach that links what is being done for teaching with the wider "Every Child Matters" agenda—something that appears to be entirely unfamiliar to Conservative Members, whose approach seems to involve ignoring the importance of coherence and interdependence. I think that in future years they will rue their failure to understand the position.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

I also support the changes that have been made to ensure fairness in selection, a proper role for local authorities and a significant reduction in the bloated and rather bureaucratic role envisaged for the office of the schools commissioner in the White Paper. Nevertheless, one or two fundamental changes are still needed. One involves the Secretary of State's power to veto a local authority's proposal for a new community school. I am glad she has accepted that if there is to be a competition for new schools, it must be a fair competition, and that if parents want a community school they should have that option. However, I do not buy the argument that the Secretary of State needs the power to prevent a local authority from proposing an inappropriate scheme.

Clause 7 provides for that veto, but only in respect of a local authority submitting a plan for a community school. If an authority submits a plan for a foundation or trust school, there will be no veto. If the aim is to restrain poorly performing local authorities, the provision should apply to all types of school. The fact that it applies only to community schools implies that a degree of bias remains, and I think that it should be removed in Committee.

I also hope that more thought will be given to the difficult balance that must be achieved between promoting choice and diversity, which I support, and ensuring that we maintain the highest standards of quality. It is not always possible to combine the two. Measures to improve one school may well be compromised and undermined by measures to expand another. In my area, a clear and co-ordinated approach has enabled a hugely successful post-16 campus to be created alongside the sixth forms of a number of existing schools. That co-ordination has ensured the widest possible choice of curriculums and courses, and the maintenance of quality. If there were a proliferation of small sixth forms, all constrained by a lack of resources and unable to provide such a wide opportunity, quality and choice would be undermined.

The issues are complex. I felt that the speech of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), in which he promoted diversity and choice, was a little superficial. He did not recognise that there are difficult challenges to be addressed. Addressing those challenges will depend on local authorities' having an understanding of the issues, an ability to engage with all the parties and the power to ensure a co-ordinated approach not just to education, but to the wider "Every Child Matters" agenda. That is why the crucial role of local education authorities must be maintained, as—I am glad to say—my right hon. Friend and her colleagues now recognise.

I am a little nervous about the fact that there is still a tendency to try to write the local authority out of the scene and I hope that it will be countered. The Conservatives need only talk to their own representatives in local government to realise that it is recognised on a cross-party basis that local authorities have an important role to play, and that rhetorical attacks on them and attempts to wipe them off the scene are counter-productive.

I hope that there will be further changes to the Bill in Committee, and that the Committee stage will be constructive but not excessively prolonged. With those reservations, I shall be happy to vote for Second Reading.

3.17 pm

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): I share the lukewarm support expressed by the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford). I shall support the Bill. I am sorry that the Secretary of State is leaving the Chamber: I was going to say some nice things about the intelligence and eloquence of her speech being a walking argument for the highly selective education that she enjoyed.

Our time is very restricted, and I shall deal with just one very specific issue—what I believe is the failure of the state system to deal with very talented and intelligent children. In my view, that failure has become abundantly clear. I can cite two studies, one of which was conducted recently by a professor of education at York university. He took a sample of 5 per cent. of the most able pupils at key stage 2, aged 11. Of those pupils—37,500—30,000 went into the state sector and 7,500 went into the independent sector. At the age of 16, almost every pupil who had entered the independent sector achieved five A or A* grades at GCSE, but only two thirds of those in the state sector did. At the age of 18, almost every pupil in the private sector achieved three As at A-level, while only 40 per cent. of those in the state sector achieved the same result. It is not surprising that when we look at the entry to really good universities, we see that it is skewed even further. The state sector is letting down bright pupils.

Anyone who wishes to dispute that evidence should look at the Department's own statistics. They show a happy improvement in the percentage of young adults attaining three As at A-level in all sectors. However, in the independent sector it has risen from 17 per cent. to 26 per cent., an increase of just over 50 per cent.; in the selective state sector it has risen from 12.5 per cent. to 20.5 per cent., an increase of slightly more—nearly 60 per cent.; and in comprehensive schools it has risen only from 4.7 per cent. to 5.7 per cent., an increase of 20 per cent. Not only is that group of children being let down by the state sector, and particularly by the comprehensives; the gap is becoming wider. Those in selective schools in the state sector, or in independent schools, are doing better and better as time goes by in comparison with those in the state comprehensive sector.

That is obviously palpably unfair to the children involved. They are bright kids, who are not receiving the education that they need and deserve to develop their talents for the purpose of their own lives. It is also bad for the country, however. Our economy relies heavily on the development of high technology, and if we are to have judges, doctors and professors of medicine, we need the brightest people we can get. Whatever their background, those people must have the education that is appropriate to them.

What should we do? Lip service is paid to this issue, and my party talks a lot about streaming, which has its [illegible] to play. To judge by schools in my constituency, [illegible] much more streaming than there used to be, but [illegible] schools with a lot of teachers can stream in more [illegible] a few subjects, because it is resource-demanding. The Government have a gifted children programme, but it does not do what is called for. People do not want a national academy for gifted schoolchildren; what they want is for the school that their child attends to be able to teach them and to enable them to fulfil their potential.

Having represented two different constituencies, my view is that a school's ethos is absolutely crucial. If most of a given school's parents value education, the children do their homework, they learn from other pupils and there is a competitive academic environment, very bright kids will flourish. Some comprehensive schools have that ethos and almost all independent and grammar schools do, by definition, but it needs a critical mass. The constituency that I used to represent was an inner-city area, and my current constituency is a largely rural, very prosperous middle class area. I wish that there had not been a gap between my two periods of service in this House, but that gap has given me a perspective on both situations.

We have grammar schools in Stratford, but in fact the high schools and the comprehensives are also pretty good, and I suspect that they are able to deal with bright kids. However, in the main comprehensive school in the part of inner-city London that I used to represent, only 10 per cent. of children used to get five GCSE grades at A to C—frankly, for most purposes, a C is a fail—so what chance did bright kids have there? On examining the percentage of children with special educational needs and the number of unauthorised absences from school—a euphemism for truancy—it is clear that there is not much difference between the two types of school. The problem is the critical mass and the expectations.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that, compared with the factors that he is describing, there is a greater correlation between class and poverty and education and attainment? Does the Bill not begin to address such inequalities, which are creating the divides that he mentions?

Mr. Maples: I wish that I thought that that was true; however, the hon. Lady is absolutely right to mention this issue. Very bright children in constituencies such as mine whose parents can afford to send them to independent schools will be all right; it is the bright working class kids whom the hon. Lady is concerned about who are getting left behind. This Bill goes nowhere near far enough; indeed, it is not designed to address that issue. Diversity might produce better results in some cases, but it is unlikely to do so.

We have got to accept that different children need slightly different forms of education. I am open to persuasion on whether such a division should be made at 11, 14 or 16, or whether it can be made within the same school. I would love to believe that bog-standard comprehensives, or the new ones in which the Bill will result, can deal with this problem, but I suspect that they cannot. We cannot pretend that we can give everyone the same education, because that simply will not work. In the school to which I referred earlier—it is in Lewisham—where 10 per cent. of children get 5 GCSEs at grades A to C, the child who does their homework, is interested in work and listens during lessons is a freak. The whole culture of the school is against such children, and it is they who are suffering.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maples: No. I am not particularly arguing for the creation of new grammar schools, because there may be other solutions, but if I were I would not locate them in constituencies such as mine; I would put them in constituencies such as the inner-city one that I used to represent.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maples: No, I am in the middle of making a point. That way, bright children from poor backgrounds who are currently being let down would have a school with the critical mass to enable them to aspire to achieve their potential. It is not constituencies such as mine that have this problem; it is those that many Labour Members represent.

I do not understand why "no selection" has become such an ideological sacred cow. Life is full of selection. We believe in selection for musical aptitude at school, and in ruthless selection for school sports teams. At age 18, we have one of the most ruthless education cut-offs and transitions that one could dream of, so I do not buy the idea that there should be no differentiation between pupils and their educational needs.

I am not sure what the solution is, but perhaps the Minister will address this point when she winds up. What about the very bright kids, whom I worry are being let down by the current system? At some point, the sacred cow of "no selection" will come into contact with the altar of progress, and we will have to accept that bright kids need a different kind of education from most others if they are to achieve their potential, if the economy is to benefit from their skills and abilities, and if our society as a whole is to get the most able people into the jobs that we need them to do.

3.25 pm

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley South) (Lab): Like other speakers, when I read the White Paper I was profoundly depressed. The expression that came to mind then was one that I had often used when I witnessed in opposition the attempts of the Conservative Government to divide and dismantle our education system. I used to say that they were creating an educational archipelago. We all know what can happen in archipelagos. People can lose their way, and those who find a better island in their travels can be sure that it has already been occupied. Of course, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn's "The Gulag Archipelago" showed us, people can lose their life opportunities if they lose their way and are stranded in an archipelago. I need not develop the image further, which can apply to a divided education system.

However, I am much encouraged by the Bill before us. I am encouraged by the tightening of the provisions on admissions, by the proposals for 14 to 19-year-olds in part 5, and particularly by clause 149, which we could call the "Knowsley model". That model was pioneered in Knowsley and we are proud to have made that contribution to the development of education policy. I am also encouraged by clause 17, which looks promising and deals with another area in which Knowsley has been in the vanguard of delivering the Government's policies. It is certainly in tune with "Every Child Matters".

[Mr. Edward O'Hara]

On co-operation between schools and the sharing and dissemination of good practice, we in Knowsley have a philosophy and policy of corporate entrepreneurship. It works well, and there is a commonality between politicians, administrators, head teachers and teachers. All are concerned that this philosophy should not be undermined by the intrusion of the individual entrepreneurship of school trusts—a danger intrinsic in this Bill but, I hope, one that can be avoided. Rather than a rigid model based on individual schools, we want trusts to be developed in a local context, not spanning local authority boundaries, but perhaps including several schools being federated in trusts. Such co-operation is the spirit, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) said, of the "Every Child Matters" agenda—a spirit that consciously aligns with other Bills before the House on child care and vulnerable children.

The agenda that we in Knowsley espouse is an holistic one. It is no accident that the title of "director of education" in Knowsley has been replaced by "director of children's services", thereby indicating this systemic, inclusive, corporate and holistic agenda. I seek assurance from the Government that that agenda will be allowed to prosper once the Bill is enacted. I am encouraged by earlier remarks by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, both in the House and outside, that that might be the case and that there is the possibility of a strengthened role for the local authority—certainly more strengthened than I feared after reading the White Paper. I am also encouraged by my right hon. Friend's assurances that there will be close discussion in Committee in an effort to improve the Bill, including the criteria to enable successful local authorities to perform that appropriately strengthened role. I agree that one size should not necessarily fit all, and that applies to local authorities as well as to schools. I am optimistic that the Government now recognise that.

Clauses 7 and 9 will allow local authorities to propose new community or community special schools, subject to the consent of the Secretary of State. As the clauses stand, it appears that my right hon. Friend still feels unable to trust local authorities to run schools, even if they have a track record of success. Knowsley has established its credentials, demonstrated by its early selection for funding support for the building schools for the future programme, a system-wide reform in a local authority context. At the end of this month, all Knowsley secondary schools will be closed and replaced with eight learning centres—the name reflects the holistic, inclusive ethos that I have already mentioned. The Bill, if appropriately framed, will provide a perfect opportunity for us in Knowsley to maximise the implementation of federated trusts—indeed, in a local authority the size of Knowsley, possibly one federated Knowsley trust.

I make no apology for putting my remarks in the context of my home borough, which I am proud to represent. I have devoted more than half of my adult life to the education service in Knowsley and I want to see it improved, not damaged. I am optimistic that we can work with the Government to achieve that.

Other local authorities are thinking along similar lines to Knowsley. In some cases, they are even taking leads from Knowsley. I put it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that when the detail of the Bill is considered in Committee she should not lose sight of the guiding principles, which I have mentioned several times, of inclusion, holism—I do not mind "isms"—and corporate enterprise. In Knowsley, we believe in sharing our problems and our opportunities. I usually manage to quote one of the Latin poets in my speeches, so I shall finish with a quotation from Horace, who said:

"Nam tua res agitur paries cum proximus ardet".

If the person next door's party wall is on fire, it is your problem too.

3.33 pm

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Knowsley South (Mr. O'Hara). On balance, I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends are doing the right thing in giving the Bill a Second Reading. It contains principles that Conservatives can support, although the Government have clearly gone to some trouble to try to disguise them. There are other elements about which I am less enthusiastic, and I hope that plenty of time for debate will be available in Committee. That seems to be the will of Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Gentleman argued for more time in Committee, as did the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford). Indeed, the Secretary of State conceded that we needed to spend more time in Committee on the criteria according to which local education authorities can promote new community schools.

This is not only a Labour debate and it is not only the Labour party that is having an internal debate to try to perfect the Bill. We want to have our say, as do other parties. We all care very much about making the Bill as good as possible. It would be difficult for us to oppose a Bill that sets out to promote Conservative themes, which we have supported for such a long time, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) so ably pointed out in his opening speech, as did my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), drawing on his experience as Secretary of State. Indeed, when he described how the White Paper chimes with previous Conservative thinking, the Secretary of State did not look as comfortable as she might have done. At one point, when my right hon. and learned Friend was quoting from the Government's White Paper, she had the sort of expression one would have when some dreadful family secret was about to be unearthed.

How could we oppose a White Paper and a Bill that set out Conservative themes such as diversity and choice in schools? Clause 2 is entitled:

"Duties in relation to diversity and choice".

It will place local education authorities under a duty to promote diversity and choice in the provision of schools. In 1992, the Conservative Government produced a White Paper entitled "Choice and Diversity". The Government speak of diversity and choice, but the underlying themes are the same.

The 1992 White Paper identified five great themes in Conservative education policy—quality, diversity, parental choice, greater school autonomy and greater accountability. Those five themes ran through the Secretary of State's speech today. Labour Members may not have been comfortable with that, but I felt comfortable when I heard her talk about those themes—if not some of her other themes. [Interruption.] If the Minister demurs from any one of these five themes, I would be interested to hear from him.

The problem is that I am not yet convinced that the Bill will make the difference that I would like to see it make to the education of our children, especially those who live in the most difficult areas and attend the most testing schools. Will we see the broad, across the board progress that parents are crying out for, especially in secondary education in the difficult areas? Ministers tell us that progress is being made in secondary education. Every week, they pray in aid—the Prime Minister did so today—the increasing number of good grades at GCSE and A-level. Grades have been improving, as they were before 1997. However, the conclusion that because grades have been improving over a long time standards are rising depends on the heroic assumption that standards are as high at GCSE and A-level as they were in the past. That is not an assumption that everybody finds it easy to make. It may not be comfortable for any of us to say that, but it is not a unanimous assumption—[Interruption.] Well, I shall ask the Minister directly. Does he believe that standards, in the curriculum and the results, are as high today as they were 20 or 30 years ago?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): Of course they are.

Mr. Clappison: We can debate that in the context of the Bill's provisions on curricula and entitlements. However, one piece of worrying evidence is the drift from the study of subjects that some would say demand a high degree of academic rigour, such as science and modern foreign languages, and a move toward subjects that many would regard as less rigorous.

For example, since 1997 there has been a collapse in the number of students studying modern foreign languages at A-level, although Spanish has more or less held its own. That has happened under a Government who say that they want this country to play its full part in Europe.

Every bit as worrying is the decline in science. The number of students entering for science A-levels has been in steady decline since 1997. Last year, significantly fewer students began A-level studies in biology, physics and chemistry than in 1997, and the decline is especially marked in physics and chemistry. That has happened under a Government who have said that they want the work force of the future to be better and more technologically equipped, with more children going into higher education to study scientific and technical subjects.

Last weekend, we heard of the closure of the chemistry department at Sussex university, which followed hard on the heels of the loss of the chemistry departments at Exeter, King's college, London, Queen Mary's college, London, Dundee and Surrey. That is not a trend that is good for the future of our country, and it needs to be reversed. We hope that the Bill, and other measures to be introduced, will go some way towards changing that trend, but we must wait to see what happens. Will the Bill make a difference? Does the Minister believe that it will lead to a revival in school science? Such a revival would be evidenced by more children choosing to study science subjects through to A-level.

Phil Hope: Yes.

Mr. Clappison: The Minister says yes, but we shall find out in due course. We shall also debate the matter in Committee.

My next question deals more generally with trust schools—or foundation schools, or double foundation schools, however they may be camouflaged by the Government. Will the Minister say how many brand new additional schools of that type will be established as a result of the Bill? How many existing schools will choose to go down that route?

Many questions will have to be examined in great detail in Committee. We want the Bill to make a real difference. At present, it will not do enough in that respect, but we will take every opportunity to make as much difference as we can, for the sake of the futures of the children about whom we have been speaking.

I do not believe that the Bill as it stands will make a difference on the scale that is needed. For that, parents will have to wait a little longer.

3.41 pm

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): Labour Members have argued long and passionately over the past few weeks about how to transform the White Paper into this Bill, and those who belong to the Select Committee have done so in a way that I consider to be both constructive and positive. Our passion stems from something deep in our psyche, history and personal experience, as we all have people in our families who have failed the 11-plus or been the first to go to university. We know that knowledge is power, and that the ability to rise out of adverse circumstances can be delivered only by education, principally in school.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) made so clear, those factors are the rocks and stones on which our party is built. Of all this Government's achievements since 1997, we are most proud of the achievements in education. We must continue to get this issue right, and it is crucial that we go on talking about education, education, education.

Structures are important, but so are individuals—individual teachers, and individual schools and initiatives. The Bill contains important provisions in respect of personalised learning that deserve support, but we must also look at its community context. It is crucial to get the educational environment right, and that is why the proposals on transport and discipline are so important. The revolution that the Bill will promote in respect of school meals is also very significant, as is getting the curriculum right, with parental support. The proposals in respect of children aged 14 to 19 may not go far enough, but they are important as well. The Bill covers a big agenda, and we must get it right.

[Mr. Gordon Marsden]

The Bill should be radical, as it is about taking us forward to the next generation. Its framework must be robust enough to be worth arguing about and not simply rejected. I have not found myself in agreement with Roy Hattersley very often in recent times, but he was right to say in his article in The Guardian that MPs who want to vote for the perfect Bill will wait forever.

The Second Reading of the Bill should be a debate about broad principles and aspiration, but it would be wrong if we did not look also at some of the specific concerns that I hope that Ministers are beginning to address. The devil is always in the detail, but we should look to replace that with a few angels in the architecture. The Select Committee report tried to achieve that, and the common theme of all its recommendations was that there should be co-operation and collaboration.

Labour Members have consistently advocated an approach based on co-operation and collaboration. In my constituency, that will provide a crucial test of whether the proposals usher in a progressive future or leave us in a dead end.

In Blackpool, we are proud of our specialist schools, but without them spreading their best practice to other schools in the area that have not been so fortunate, and converting those schools, the reforms would have been stillborn. Therefore, there needs to be far more leverage to achieve the sort of thing that the Secretary of State and others have talked about today.

The philosopher Thomas Hobbes said that "covenants, without the sword, are but words".

If hon. Members want that translated into 21st century language, it means that if the Government will the ends that they talk about for collaboration and co-operation, they must also will the means. In order to do that, there are a number of specific things that they must look at, such as making the model of trust schools a collaborative one, as so many have said today and as the Select Committee recommended in paragraphs 57 and 68 of the report. We need federations that will act alongside local authorities, which must be the overall commissioners of education and we must ensure that the Bill impacts positively on all children in a local area. If the Government are not prepared to place the statutory obligation on schools to collaborate, they must provide stronger incentives for collaboration and partnership.

Schools must all face the same rules, and that is particularly true of children with special educational needs. Parents of children with a statement should have the same right of access to trust schools as they should have to an academy or to any other school. I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State touch on this issue. We need action on this matter urgently because there is already anecdotal evidence that academies are not practising fair admissions for children with special educational needs. If we have trust schools, we must make sure that they do not go down the same route. It is important that schools should be subject to the same scrutiny under local authorities. Admission forums must be encouraged to work together. If they do not, the system will not work.

The role of the schools commissioner was referred to and we touched on this point in the Select Committee. Frankly, I do not believe that a schools commissioner who is purely and simply a civil servant within the Department will deliver the expanded egalitarian role that we have heard about. We need to look at that in Committee and the Government need to look for someone with a fresh viewpoint and a fresh mind.

That is particularly true in terms of ensuring that the needs of disadvantaged children are properly maintained and represented by the commissioner. It is instructive that the briefings that many of us have received from organisations such as the Children's Society, the National Autistic Society, Barnardo's and the Campaign for Racial Equality have all touched on this point. It comes back to leverage again; we need to make sure that local authorities focus on securing fair access for all pupils.

I want to say something about the Select Committee's comments on benchmarks. A lot of nonsense has been spoken about them, as if they were some form of Stalinist quota. That was never the intention of the Select Committee. The analogy should be with what happens in higher education and the Higher Education Funding Council for England; we should promote, encourage and, from time to time, name and shame. The idea that this is a Stalinist process of quotas should be thrown out of the window. If that is an issue of concern to the Government, they should revisit it.

Children with special educational needs need to given explicit priority in admissions criteria because two thirds of the exclusions at the moment are of children with special educational needs.

The Bill is all about providing a platform to progress our life demands. The Bill will be judged by the way in which nothing is done to chip away at that platform. We need to make sure that the direction of travel is one of collaboration, and not division. That is the responsibility of the Government team, and I expect to see it delivered in Committee and on Report.

3.49 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): May I say—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I thank hon. Members very much indeed, but they are taking up my time.

We certainly welcome some elements of the Bill. Clause 1 emphasises the role that local authorities should play in improving standards for all children. Quite frankly, I take that as a given—indeed, it was stated for the first time in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998—and it is good see it re-emphasised. The point made by the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) about looked-after children is absolutely right. We very much welcome the Government's recognition that we must have a strong disciplinary framework in our schools to which people can relate and in which teachers in particular feel safer.

The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) and the hon. Member for Knowsley South (Mr. O'Hara) both made very telling speeches in their own ways. They both emphasised that their constituencies have dynamic local authorities. Sheffield was Liberal Democrat-led and is now Labour-led, and it has taken on our great ideas. [Interruption.] I shall carry on while I am winning. Those local authorities have been doing exactly what they should be doing: providing dynamic leadership in the schools in their communities and delivering results.

The schools in Sheffield, Brightside—they were mentioned by the right hon. Member for Sheffield Brightside—achieved those results and improvements despite the Bill. They did not need the threat of trust schools coming along. They did not need wealthy individuals to put in £2 million to get £25 million of Government capital to improve. They improved because the local authorities believed that such things were important. The work going on in Knowsley South is, quite frankly, inspirational.

Ms Angela C. Smith: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that schools in Sheffield, Brightside have enjoyed relationships with external partners via the education action zone and, in addition, that the chair of the local sixth-form college was Sir Hugh Sykes—a local benefactor of Sheffield schools?

Mr. Willis: The hon. Lady makes my point exactly—the Bill is not needed to do all that is claimed—and I am grateful to her for emphasising that fact.

This is a Conservative Bill, but Labour Members will support it in the Lobby tonight. We heard the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) make it absolutely clear that these are Tory proposals. Labour Members can dance on the head of a pin about whether or not the Bill will create grant-maintained schools mark 2, but the reality is that that is exactly what they will be. That is why the Bill has so excited Tory Members under their new leadership.

We have only to go back to what Lady Thatcher said at the Tory party conference in 1987:

"Give parents and governors the right to take their children's schools out of the hands of the local authority".

Little did she know that a Labour Prime Minister would do exactly that, but the question that we as a party—my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) made an outstanding contribution in her first speech in her new role—and, indeed, those Labour Back Benchers who have the courage to stick to their Labour principles have to answer is, in fact, whether these are the right proposals.

First, where is the evidence? I asked the right hon. and learned Member for Rusciffe, who is a former Secretary of State for Education and Science, and the current Secretary of State to produce any evidence to support the proposals. The White Paper said:

"the expanded involvement of the private sector will improve education".

Where is the evidence that that will occur? It said that, under the Bill,

"all will benefit from an education service based on choice and diversity".

Where is the evidence for that? Not a single bit have the Government been able to produce in support of that claim. It also said that "parents want to attend Parent Councils and establish new schools."

Where did that come from? There is no evidence at all that that is what parents want. The vast majority of parents want good local schools, and when they have had the opportunity to take up some of those advantages, they have not taken them.

Let us consider the grant-maintained system. Despite the fact that schools were bribed to become grant-maintained and extra resources were involved, how many did it? Just fewer than 1,000 primary and secondary schools took up that offer. Let us take the Education Act 2002—

Lynne Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willis: Not now, as I am in full flow.

Let us take the Education Act 2002. We again argued whether all schools should have the power to innovate and have earned autonomy unless they were under special measures. The Government refused that, but exactly the powers that could underpin most of what is in the Bill are in place. What have we had from schools, parents and governors since 2002? Three schools have asked for permission to change the school day. That is how excited parents and governors are about actually changing things. There is no evidence. I wish there was more time, but I shall give way to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones)

Lynne Jones: Of course, the Government will argue that no school would have to opt for trust status; it is purely voluntary. However, does the hon. Gentleman share my concerns that there are all sorts of ways in which the Government coerce schools to do what they perceive the Government want? In Birmingham, there are proposals for seven academies. There is no demand for that, but the Tory-Lib Dem controlled LEA is forced to go down that route, because that is the only way that it knows that it will get the desperately needed funding for the schools.

Mr. Willis: The hon. Lady is absolutely right, and the Minister knows that she is right. The point applies wherever one goes in the country. For example, to get money from the building schools for the future programme, Newcastle had to include an academy in its proposals. I do not believe that that gives choice. It is back to the nonsense that we heard the other night when the Home Secretary told us that having a passport was voluntary. It is just semantics at the end of the day.

One of the great myths in the Bill is that the creation of choice and diversity means that the good schools will suddenly, because of trust status, say, "Ah, we want to take the most disadvantaged, unruly, disruptive kids from the estate down the road so that we can expand." That is absolute and utter nonsense. There is not a single piece of evidence for that. Successful schools are successful because of their size, catchment area and parental involvement. The idea that we will deal with disadvantage simply by creating trusts is absolute nonsense.

[Mr. Willis]

Before the last general election, the Government betrayed most of our schools and most of our youngsters by their betrayal of the Tomlinson report and its proposals. There is a sop to vocational education in the Bill—a sop that continues the myth that academic education is for the best and vocational education is for the rest. Lady Lumley's school is in North Yorkshire where it is sometimes 30 miles to the nearest school let alone the nearest college. One cannot have there the sort of diversity that is prayed in aid by the Secretary of State and Ministers. In reality, the Secretary of State will decide the vocational curriculum; it will not be individual schools. There will not be that flexibility.

Wherever I go—I am sure that this applies to every Member of the House—I am constantly bombarded by companies that say that they cannot get people with the right skills. They are talking about the right skills from levels 2 and 3 and right up to graduate and postgraduate levels. The Bill does absolutely nothing to create a 21st century curriculum. All it does, yet again, is show that this is a controlling Government who have now reformed themselves in the image of Mrs. Thatcher. They should be ashamed.

3.58 pm

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): What a horrible image.

When Dr. Philip Cowley updates his next pamphlet on Back-Bench rebellions, he might like to consider the following subtitle: "The Education White Paper: How to lose friends and fail to influence people". I give credit to the Government for eventually and grudgingly—at times, it felt like pulling teeth—making important concessions in response to the concerns raised both in the alternative White Paper and by the Education and Skills Committee, teachers, schools governors and many others. However, there have been spectacular gaffes along the way, most notably when hon. Members were told that their concerns were misplaced and would all disappear once we truly understood the nature of the White Paper. I have to say, spinning a set of proposals to curry favour with the Daily Mail and patronising the hell out of Labour MPs is an interesting, but inadvisable political tactic and I trust that Ministers have learned from it.

I was in the Department for Education and Skills for a very short time as the White Paper was being prepared. It became clear to me that my role as Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister for Schools would be to promote the White Paper proposals among my colleagues—something that I was simply not prepared to do. It is not that everything in the White Paper is necessarily objectionable or runs contrary to Labour values. In fact, the points of contention about trusts, admissions and the role of local education authorities are contained in a comparatively short section of the White Paper: some 28 pages in a 116-page document.

Perhaps most objectionable of all, however, was the contention put forward without a single shred of evidence that good local education authorities are an inevitable drag anchor on progress and innovation. That was pure dogma, inserted into the middle of an otherwise reasonably acceptable White Paper. We know where it came from, and I have to say that it was not from the Department for Education and Skills. Poor LEAs have to be dealt with, but good LEAs offer support and encouragement and play a vital co-ordinating role in helping schools to improve and in driving up standards. They did not deserve to be trashed as they were in the White Paper and I trust that they will not be again.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): A good LEA is the one in the county of Leicestershire, which has never been controlled by the Labour party, so this is not a partisan point. Does my hon. Friend agree that the analysis of the White Paper and the Bill is still very much a metropolitan one? It has little to offer in many areas of the country. Would it not have been better to pilot some of the ideas, such as trust schools, to see whether they work in some contexts?

Martin Salter: I seem to recall that in the alternative White Paper, which I think that Ministers truly understand now, we suggested piloting trusts. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: that is not a party political point.

It became clear to me that, without significant reform, an education Bill based on the White Paper would not command wide support on the Labour Benches and elsewhere. In his introduction to the White Paper, the Prime Minister quite rightly emphasises the real improvements in education since 1997. Teachers' pay is 20 per cent. higher in real terms. There are an extra 32,000 teachers and 130,000 support staff. There is improved literacy and numeracy. Ofsted reports that the proportion of good and excellent teaching in primary schools has risen from 45 per cent. to 74 per cent. There have been big improvements in GCSE results and more children are gaining university places. All of that has been achieved within existing structures.

Recently, however, we appear to be in danger of talking down our own achievements and implying that further progress cannot be achieved or sustained. That is in marked contrast to our earlier education mantra: standards, not structures. Labour MPs and Labour councillors were entitled to ask what had changed, where the evidence was and where the proposals came from. At the last election, in the Labour document "Schools forward not back", we attacked Tory education policy. The document stated:

> "The current catchment areas used by schools would be abolished and schools would be forced to introduce their own admissions system. This policy would see the end of community based schools and lead to a massive increase in bureaucracy for headteachers, with each school having to design their own admissions process."

The fundamental concerns of many colleagues centred around the potential for pupils from poorer areas to be disadvantaged as popular schools expanded and wealthier and better informed parents were able to set up their own schools, operating their own admissions policy. There was also concern that local education policy should remain democratically accountable—something lamentably missing from the tenor of the debate.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Martin Salter: I have given way once, so I will not.

Sir Jeremy Beecham, leader of the Local Government Association labour group, said of the White Paper:

"The proposals around admissions, the planning of new schools and the expansion of popular schools give insufficient leverage to councils to maximise fairness or the efficient use of resources".

Small wonder that there was such a hostile reaction to the publication of the original White Paper. In fact, 95 Labour MPs eventually backed our alternative White Paper, which was fairly entitled "Shaping the Education Bill—Reaching for Consensus". It challenged the absence of a mandatory code; the ban on local authorities promoting new community schools; and any attempts to force trusts on communities by financial inducement or ministerial diktat. The Government have listened, and conceded those substantive points with assurances of more movement and clarification in Committee.

All seven of us who were proud to co-author the alternative White Paper have come to the conclusion that it is worth consolidating the gains that have been made. We have spent three months of our lives on the issue, and none of us wants to throw away what has been achieved or to disengage from the process. Colleagues who are thinking of voting down the Bill on Second Reading should realise that disengaging from the process at this point is subcontracting education policy from the Labour party and the Labour Government to the Opposition. That is not something that any of us came to Parliament to do. My message to colleagues still concerned about aspects of the Bill is to stick with it: continue to engage with the process by supporting the Government on Second Reading but reassess the situation when the Bill returns to the House on Report. That is what parliamentary democracy is supposed to be about. We can all make grand gestures on Second Reading but, quite frankly, some of the issues have become conflated. I have a view about how long our Prime Minister should carry on, but I do not think it should be confused with the issue of how we vote on the future of our kids' education.

4.7 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): What an interesting speech. Remembering Michael Foot's words about ratting and reratting, I believe that it generally helps to stay in one corner.

The Prime Minister knows that I am a great admirer of his, and I very much welcome what he said in the White Paper. It is unpopular to hold such a position in the Conservative party nowadays, but he and I are born-again Thatcherites. We both believe that state schools should be fundamentally independent. I hope that he will forgive me, but I am an impoverished middle-class refugee who has fallen on hard times and travels across several boroughs to send his children to the London Oratory.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Surely not all six of them.

Mr. Leigh: No, not all six—I mix and match like all the other middle-class parents.

Mr. Willis: How did the hon. Gentleman get his children in on parental interview?

Mr. Leigh: We got on very well in parental interview. John McIntosh, the headmaster, has asked me how one can achieve choice and diversity in a school—and he does so—unless one interviews parents. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and other hon. Members have made an important point. There is not a problem in my rural, prosperous constituency, which has a mix of grammar and comprehensive schools. We have two excellent grammar schools that regularly appear among the top 20 state schools in league tables, and comprehensive schools, such as William Farr, whose headmaster told me only a few weeks ago that he already has a foundation school. The Bill will not make a scrap of difference to him, as it is now so hedged around with caveats on admissions and the code of conduct that in many parts of the country it will make very little difference.

I wish to talk about inner London, as I feel strongly about the problem that we face in metropolitan areas—an issue rightly raised by my hon. Friend. The London borough of Hammersmith has the fastest growing population of parents who send their children to private schools. Unless they can get their children into free schools, which are Lady Margaret school, the London Oratory or the Sacred Heart school, they will not stay in the state sector. That is the problem. Surely middle class parents—people in the Labour party who want diversity—should be worried about that. Why are people fleeing from state schools in inner London and the metropolitan areas?

Mr. Kilfoyle: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware of it, but there are middle class parents all over the country. Why should they have to suffer the downside of the Bill, which is markedly London-centric? Surely the problems that he is adumbrating and the problems addressed in the Bill revolve around the situation in London, more than anywhere else in the country.

Mr. Leigh: That may arise from the situation where both the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister send their children to state schools in inner London. That is not my problem, is it? The hon. Gentleman must put that question to his own colleagues. I can speak only from my personal experience of my constituency and of London. I do not know a lot about Liverpool. I apologise. I cannot speak about it. It is much better in the House to speak from one's own experience.

To those who knock the London Oratory, all I can say is that it is a school that gets a huge, diverse social mix. It is a school that works. It draws pupils from 40 boroughs.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman understand that those of us who represent inner London constituencies have seen enormous improvements in the past five years in our local secondary schools? Our concern about the Bill is that it will take away the most able children, who will be able to get out to the suburban schools, which have the space and the money to expand, and we will return to a situation where the inner London comprehensives are seen as second best and school of last resort for too many parents. We want a continuation of the excellent levels of funding that we are getting, which have so dramatically improved our inner-city comprehensives. We want comprehensive schools.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

Mr. Leigh: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from. I know the philosophy that he agrees with. I apologise to him; I do not agree. The evidence from all over the world—from Sweden, Denmark, Chile, America and many other countries—

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): What about Finland?

Mr. Leigh: —apart from Finland, which is a small country of 5 million people with no large urban areas. From all over the world, the message is that competition and choice work.

The particular problem that I have with the Bill, as my colleagues know, is with regard to faith schools, particularly the ban on interviews. I know that many Labour Members in particular do not like the idea that schools have the right to interview parents. I know that it is said that that is just a small problem now.

Helen Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leigh: No, I cannot give way again. I apologise.

I know that only a small number of schools interview, but up to the imposition of the code of practice, 80 per cent. of Catholic schools in London used to interview. There is a very good reason for that. Surely it is not fair on Catholic priests, Anglican priests or anybody else that they should become spiritual policemen. We all know what happens in some of the oversubscribed schools. People turn up to churches and try to make themselves known to the parish priest. The parish priest has to sign the chit, having no idea who they are. Is it right that the onus should be put on the priest? Much better that it should be on the school.

I am rather sad that the Secretary of State, who understands Catholic education and involves herself in it, should have been party to a mean little device to ban the small number of schools that interview from interviewing. It is said, I know, that those schools interview because they want to cherry-pick middle class parents.

Paul Holmes: They are just trying to select.

Mr. Leigh: Maybe those schools want to protect their ethos. Up to a few years ago, they could interview on the basis of the general ethos of the school. What is wrong with a school wanting to protect its ethos? What is wrong with giving a Catholic school or a Jewish, Muslim or Anglican school a chance to protect its ethos?

I heard a sotto voce intervention suggesting that the schools were just trying to select. That is not true.

Paul Holmes: It is true.

Mr. Leigh: It is not true. I speak from personal experience. The London Oratory, the Cardinal Vaughan—

Paul Holmes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leigh: I cannot give way again because of the time limit, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. He should look carefully at the schools, as I do. The fact is that they band: 30 per cent. the most able, 30 per cent. the middle, and 30 per cent. the least able. They are genuine comprehensives. People may not like them for other reasons, but they are trying to protect their ethos, whether Catholic or Anglican. Why should they not be allowed to do so? Why should the Secretary of State take this great sledgehammer to crack this tiny nut, especially when there are schools in inner London that, unlike many schools, are attracting parents from every social stratum? The Labour party should be in favour of that. It should want state schools to attract middle-class parents. It should not want ghetto neighbourhood comprehensives that middle-class people do not want to go to. Why are the Government trying to change the ethos of the very schools that are successful in difficult areas and are achieving what the Government want; that is, a social mix? I feel strongly about that.

I also feel strongly about the role of the adjudicator. I talked to the Catholic Education Service about this last night. It is extremely worried because the adjudicator will be given untrammelled new powers. I have talked widely about this to headmasters and other people. At the moment, the adjudicator can step in and interfere in the admission criteria for that year only. Under the Bill, the adjudicator can step in and make indefinite changes. It is a huge extension of the power of the adjudicator and the Secretary of State. We should be worried about that.

Some of us are also worried about the role of school improvement partners—SIPs—appointed by local authorities. They will be able to range widely over schools and interfere. They will be a sort of commissar from the LEA. Why are they in the Bill? The ban on interviews, the role of the school adjudicator and school improvement partners are all something to be worried about.

What would I hope for from a Bill such as this? What would I hope that the next Conservative Government would produce? I believe in a Government creating independent state schools. That is the way forward. There is no reason why we should not achieve that.

Why do we have so little trust in head teachers? Why do we assume that if we give them power over selection, hiring and firing or excluding we will somehow create a load of new grammar schools, God forbid? There are only 165 grammar schools in the country, but 3,500 schools. If we gave powers to head teachers to do as they know best and to run their schools in the way that they believe in, there would not be radical change. Of course, there would be incremental change, and gradually some schools might become more selective, but maybe not. In the independent sector, there are schools that are selective and schools that are not. There are schools that cater for every whim. I cannot understand why, when we have this great opportunity, at the same time that we are creating new trust schools we are loading more control over them. There used to be a cry, "Trust the people." I say, "Trust the schools." I say to my hon. Friends that when they vote for the Bill tonight, they should amend it to ensure that we get the real freedom that the Conservative party believes in.

4.18 pm

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): I welcome the changes that have been made between the White Paper and the Bill, particularly those to the admissions code.

In Wandsworth, there are a lot of partially selective schools, so I am thankful for the ban on the expansion of such schools. There was an anomaly in the Education Act 1998 that allowed adjudicators to increase as well as decrease the level of selection where it has been decreased since 1998. I see Committee stage as an opportunity to close that loophole.

Trust schools seem to be the most controversial part of the Bill. I take them very seriously. Last month, some colleagues and I went to Sweden to look at one of the models for trust schools used by the White Paper team, to see for ourselves and reach our own conclusions. No doubt, we have reached different conclusions, but we have done so on the evidence of our own eyes. Sweden has schools that are fully funded by local authorities. They get the same funding per pupil as local authority schools and are not allowed to charge fees. They are not allowed to select in any shape or form, but they are independently owned. Some are parents' co-ops, some are Montessori-type schools, some are Church schools, but about half of them are owned by businesses. That would be precluded by this legislation.

When those schools were set up 15 years ago, they had three aims: to widen choice, to raise standards and to reduce costs. I shall briefly set out their experience. They have widened choice, mainly by introducing new teaching methods in their curriculum—not only Montessori but many others—which have spread out to local authority schools, too. Some of the schools introduced new specialisms that are also spreading to the local authority sector. Some use personalised timetables and personalised level groups, whereby children are taught not in year groups but according to the level they have reached in a subject; for example, a student could be in year 3 for English and year 6 for mathematics. Those new methods are spreading throughout the system, so there has been some widening of choice.

Raising standards is a key aim. The schools obtain higher grades than local authority schools, but that is not surprising as, on average, they are more likely to be in higher income areas. They also have higher added value, which research has shown fairly conclusively. The key question is whether they have had any effect on the rest of the school sector. It was said earlier that there was no evidence, but in Sweden there certainly is evidence that the existence of those free schools—only 8 per cent. of the total—has raised standards in local authority schools. The evidence is not wholly conclusive; there have been four studies, not all of which reached a statistically significant conclusion, but those that did so show that the rest of the system has improved. That is mainly because the free schools are more likely to be innovative, which acts as a spur to innovation change in the local authority sector, where schools are changing in directions pioneered by the independent schools.

In terms of reducing costs, the schools have been a complete failure. At first, in some areas, they succeeded in reducing costs, but the costs have now increased. Local authority schools have had to raise their game to compete with the nearest independent school and have had to carry a fair amount of overcapacity to make choice a reality. What some people considered a way of reducing costs has turned out to be more expensive, which causes planning difficulties for local authorities. They do not know how many children will be enrolled in their schools in August or September because the independent schools are in the market, too. Overcapacity may be the price we have to pay for real choice.

The independent schools make up 8 per cent. of the total and only 4 per cent. of them are business-owned, so it would not be right to make grand claims on their behalf. However, we have to face the possibility that the existence of even a small independent sector may be a spur to improvement throughout the system. I have no brief for private providers in public services. In my ideal world, the public sector would provide all public services, but we have to be prepared to look at the evidence.

Until 1999, only 4 per cent. of students at a school in my constituency were gaining A to C grades at GCSE—the sixth lowest in the country. No school in Liverpool, Manchester or Sheffield had such bad results. The school has now been turned around and the number is up to 30 per cent., which is a great achievement, but 70 per cent. of students still fail to achieve the basic A to C grades. If we are failing 70 per cent. of our children, and there is any chance that an innovation could raise the quality and standard of education for low income people, there is nothing I would not do to achieve it.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the interesting findings on our trip to Sweden was that politicians who had previously been against the independent or trust schools now support them? Because the schools had raised standards overall and brought about innovation, those politicians do not want to go back to the previous system.

Martin Linton: That is right. There is no doubt that those schools are still controversial within the Social Democratic party, where many people are against them but more are in favour. We asked many Social Democratic MPs whether they would oppose free schools if they had their time again, and every one of them said that they would still support them. Although the research is not conclusive and everyone is not of the same mind, the evidence indicates that those schools are doing a good job.

We should all search our consciences before we vote against anything that might improve education for working-class children in this country. The middle classes always get choice—if they are not given a choice of schools, they can choose where to live, which means the same thing. We must accept that low-income people are the only group who are denied the benefits of choice and diversity, which is one of the reasons why I welcome the extension of free transport in the Bill. Many people in my constituency are trapped in a situation in which their children qualify for only low-performing schools, but that provision may enable them to spread their nets more widely. I also welcome the introduction of choice advisers, who will help people in inner cities, where it almost impossible to choose a high-performing school.

I am not certain whether trust schools will improve things, but I hope that they do, and I therefore welcome their introduction, which is at least a positive attempt to improve the situation. I cannot prove whether the Bill will extend to low-income families the benefits that middle-class families already enjoy, but it is clearly an honest attempt to achieve that objective, and I am confident that it is a move in that direction.

[Martin Linton]

4.26 pm

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): I have found the debate a bit bewildering: the Secretary of State has taunted Conservative Members with the reasons why Conservative Members should not vote for the Bill; Labour Back Benchers have tormented Liberal Democrat Members on why Liberal Democrat Members will not vote for it; and the local paper in Northern Ireland reports that Labour Whips are "irritated" that we might vote for it.

We will vote for the Bill, even if Labour Whips stand at the Door of the Lobby and try to shoo us away, because we believe that the Bill is an important building block in improving educational provision for people in England. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has pointed out that on a Bill such as this, where it is possible to achieve consensus, we should seek consensus across the party-political divide. It is disappointing that the Labour party has adopted a Sinn Fein approach—ourselves alone, with no one else supporting the changes. [HON. MEMBERS: "No surrender!"] Absolutely.

We will support the Bill despite some of the concessions, which were unnecessary and are probably detrimental. When the Secretary of State introduced the White Paper, she made it clear that it was "the next essential step" in changing the education system for the better. Over the past weeks and months, however, we have seen her toss changes out of the front door, the back door, down the trap door and through the green door in the face of the baying old Labour rebels. Despite those concessions, the Bill contains enough to warrant our support.

The Government are seeking to remove from schools in Northern Ireland what they are proposing for schools in England. In Northern Ireland, against the wishes not of a few party rebels, but of two thirds of the population and an overwhelming proportion of parents and teachers, the Government are seeking to impose a one-size-fits-all comprehensive system. Despite the fact that the Government are denying to the people of Northern Ireland what we want for them, we are prepared to support a Bill that will at least move towards it in England.

The Bill is important because children deserve better than what they are getting at present. I recognise that the Government have spent considerably more money on education over the past few years. A 45 per cent. real increase in the budget is to be welcomed. However, it is not funding alone that creates change. I do not want to repeat the statistics that we hear bandied backwards and forwards between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition at Question Time about what is happening to schools. We all know the statistics about the number of children who are being taught in failing schools and so on. Funding is not the only answer—there must be structural change. I believe that the structural changes in the Bill go towards tackling the mental block among the UK public that one cannot have a good education system unless it is solely provided by the state. We need diversity and we sometimes need to lift the deadening hand of local authorities from education provision.

Several of the measures in the Bill are welcome. Giving children greater freedom to travel will help to improve social mobility. Allowing bad schools to shrink and good schools to expand will improve efficiency and provide incentives for change. Permitting schools to apply for trust status will bring greater expertise and resources—not just money, but other resources—into the system. Encouraging schools to have that autonomy will give good leaders the opportunity to make the changes that they know are needed to improve the situation in their own local area. The enhanced disciplinary powers for teachers are welcome, given that 41 per cent. of parents indicated in a recent survey that they are concerned about school discipline.

I regret that the Minister still has a blind prejudice against academic selection, which is a cornerstone of matching pupils to the appropriate education experience. I find that incomprehensible. In Northern Ireland, selection has worked in terms of improving social mobility, improving standards, and getting more people from working class backgrounds into university. However, I take some joy from clause 40, which allows for auditions or oral or practical tests. That, to me, is selection of a sort; the Minister can call it what she likes.

We will go through the Lobby to support the Bill. We hope that no more concessions will be made in Committee, that some of the weaknesses that have been identified will be addressed, and that some provisions will be strengthened to give youngsters a better chance of using the educational ladder to improve themselves.

4.34 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): The Government have a great deal of which to be proud in their educational record. We should not allow the Opposition to get away with their dismissive claims of, "Yes, there's more money and far more teachers and exam results are better, but what did you ever do for schools?" We have a good record of achievement and we need to build on it.

We cannot yet claim that the Government have decisively broken the link between social class and educational performance. The row about that and how to achieve it is at the heart of the debate, and I am glad. When the White Paper was published, it was spun in many quarters as a measure that was solely for aspirational, middle-class parents. Through the work of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the debate has become about the group of pupils who have not benefited as much as others from what we have done so far. The analysis supports that interpretation of the debate, and that is good.

The White Paper was controversial because it rested on two propositions about how to improve our schools: school autonomy and parental choice. I am not against either of those—there are merits in both—but the problem is that neither is sufficiently powerful to produce the improvements that we need throughout our school system. Both can produce good results in individual schools and improvements in individual areas. However, we need improvement across the board.

Our actions so far in government have told us what makes a good school: strong leadership, well-supported staff, a balanced intake and parental support. Too many schools do not have all those elements, but autonomy and parental choice alone are not likely to deliver them. There is simply no evidence to show that the exercise of choice drives up standards. It is possible for choice, diversity and good schools to co-exist, as happens in Sweden. However, there is little evidence to show that parents choosing between different schools or schools competing for pupils drives up standards.

There is evidence to show that choice increases social segregation. Some people respond to that by saying that we should stop choice. I must say to my colleagues who feel like that that it is a non-starter. Although many parents do not especially want to exercise choice, they undoubtedly wish to feel that they have a choice. It is a political dead end to believe that we can solve our school problems by removing choice from the equation.

The challenge for us is to deliver a genuine choice of good schools. Choice itself does not ensure that schools are good. Successful schools will have a balanced intake. They are what we used to call "comprehensives" before that went out of fashion. The evidence suggests that comprehensives work. It is interesting that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), when speaking about The Oratory—a school of which I had not heard previously—tried to defend it on the basis that it sought a comprehensive intake.

One of the most distinctive things that has happened with academies is that schools that used to have an entirely disadvantaged intake now have a balanced one, and the Government say that they produce better results. I wish that we had been more prepared to argue that schools with balanced intakes were more successful for more pupils than any other model of education, and then set about finding the best strategies to achieve balanced intakes. As I said, I do not believe that one can do that by removing choice and saying, "You've got to go to that school—end of story." That will not work. We must win the argument parent by parent and school by school throughout the country.

In the Bill and the campaign since the White Paper was launched, we have made sufficient change to make the original market model, which some Conservative Members desperately want, pretty difficult to achieve. We have done enough so that in the areas where local authorities and others wish to do so, we can begin to devise local strategies for developing schools with balanced intakes. We will have information, monitoring and the admissions forums to take forward the campaign for a better sort of education. All of us, working together, have helped to achieve that in the past few months.

Michael Connarty: May I take my right hon. Friend back to his first comment about the worry that the White Paper would be a charter for the middle classes to take over independent trust schools? Nothing that he has said up to now has convinced me that that will not happen, and the local authorities will not have the power to prevent it.

Mr. Denham: We have ensured in the Bill that local authorities will have the leading role in objecting to the kind of expansion of a school that would damage other schools. The Secretary of State has given us assurances that will provide some constraints, although not all the ones that I would have put in if I had been asked to write the Bill. However, I was not asked to write the Bill, so I am working with the one that we have got. We have made a lot of progress since the White Paper was published in ensuring that there are local strategies and local admissions forums that will be able to determine whether a development will be damaging to pupils in the wider area.

Many of us fought for certain safeguards, not to prevent a popular school from expanding, but to enable us to say to a school, "If you act like that, if you cheat like that, if you develop like that, or if you change in this way, it will damage the education of other children." The Bill is not perfect in regard to the safeguards that it contains, but it is a lot better than what we had when the White Paper was first published.

Clive Efford: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Denham: No, I must make some progress.

When building on the Bill, we need to go beyond the idea of having a statutory admissions code. That is a building block for making the argument about a balanced intake. We then have to determine at local level how we should develop an approach that genuinely persuades parents that schools with a balanced intake are better for their children's education. There are elements in the Bill that will be important in enabling us to do that. I would almost throw the whole Bill away if I could keep the powers that will enable us to intervene quickly on schools that are beginning to fail, but have not yet been condemned by Ofsted. Too many children have suffered in schools that have drifted for two, three, four or five years before anything was done about them. The ability to get in there quickly is important.

There is not a lot about personalised education in the Bill, although the flavour of the concept is there. It involves the ability to give a guarantee to parents that their child will not disappear into the morass of a school that offers a lowest-common-denominator education. That is a key part of the strategy to develop schools with a balanced intake. For that reason as well, I believe that there is enough in the Bill to illustrate that we have made progress since the publication of the White Paper and that we should support it.

I wish, however, that the Bill had gone further. It is not enough to aspire to co-operation between schools. One of the big dividing lines between Labour Members, certainly on the Back Benches, and the Conservatives is that the Conservatives celebrate the independence and irresponsible autonomy of individual schools. We, however, believe that it is essential that schools collaborate across an area and take responsibility for the achievements of all children. I wish that the Bill had gone further in regard to the powers to require schools to form federations and to take responsibility for working together. I hope that, in the course of the Bill's passage through Parliament, we can diminish those deficiencies.

4.43 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Leader of the Opposition, on recognising that this is a special Bill that deserves our support for all the right reasons, as well as some very good reasons that are more political. I also congratulate the Secretary of State and her Ministers on producing a Bill that has depth and vision and which deserves support right across the House.

When I decided to become a teacher, the first class that I faced before I did my postgraduate certificate was in a secondary modern school. I was horrified at the poverty of aspiration in the people in that school, from the teachers and parents to the children. That experience motivated me strongly to believe that we had to do something about the problem. During the course of that year, I passed a term at Leeds grammar school, and a more traditional and excellent school one could not find anywhere in the 1960s.

I am glad to say that, because my first full-time job in education was in Scotland, I am a Scottish-registered teacher. I recognised within about five minutes an enormous difference between the approach to education in Scotland and, in particular, the approach in England in the 1960s. During my 16-year education career, I also learned an enormous amount—as a governor of schools in the old Inner London Education Authority—about education at all levels and for those of all ages. I realised how privileged I had been in my own education; I also realised what I wanted for my children and for other people's children.

When I look at the Bill, I recognise something a little bit special: it has vision. When I think back to Kenneth Baker's great Education Act 1988—I sat for many hours on the Standing Committee of what was known as the Gerbil—I also recognise that that was a landmark education Bill, and I suspect that this will be one too.

I regret that there is still such animosity towards grammar schools. We heard a moving speech from my hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) on the subject.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Robert Key: I certainly will not give way at this stage.

I also recognise, however, that in constituencies such as mine—we have excellent grammar schools, which both my daughters attended—there is not the animosity that there was 20 years ago. The grammar schools have changed, and all the other schools have changed. There is a mythology among Labour Members about hatred of grammar schools, which I think is wrong. I have a great admiration for the grammar school system throughout the country. Grammar schools make an enormous contribution and I hope that we shall see no diminution of support for them, although I do not believe that there will be any particular call for their re-establishment.

I looked carefully at clause 36 in case it was doing something of which I was not aware. I certainly would not support the Bill if it was going to abolish grammar schools, but I do not think that it will. I do not think that it says much more than was said in legislation a little earlier.

What I particularly like about the Bill is that it will do things for my rural constituency as well as other constituencies. I do not agree that it is a London-centric Bill, although I know that that worries many people. For instance, clause 7, entitled "Invitation for proposals for establishment of new schools", is right on for the problem that we face in rural constituencies such as mine. Following the Government's building schools for the future initiative and the one-school pathfinder project, my local education authority was told, "Here is £20 million: build us a new secondary school." There was then a frantic competition. The LEA had to choose one secondary school among dozens that needed rebuilding. Last week, my constituency lost out—for all the wrong reasons. It was not that we do not need new secondary schools; we need at least two rebuilt secondary schools, or completely new schools. Good luck to Melksham: it won and we lost. It should not be like that, however, and I think that the Bill will enable us to overcome such failures in the system.

I am also delighted that school transport is being tackled in a more constructive way for the first time. I particularly like clause 11, "Establishment of school as a federated school". We have huge problems in rural schools, especially primary schools. We simply cannot go on having little village schools with 40, 50 or 60 children when more than 50 per cent. of children are brought in, unsustainably, in 4X4s from the surrounding market towns because their parents happen to like a particular school with a particular head teacher at a particular time, and it is a brilliant school. I do not want us to experience the traumas that we experienced in the village of Farley last year, or those that we are experiencing in the village of Redlynch this year. I want to see an approach like that in the village of Broadchalke, where there is to be one big school that will look after the needs of a large number of villages in the Chalke valley west of Salisbury.

Clauses 14 and 15 deal with the discontinuance of schools maintained by LEAs and with consultation. I am delighted at the recognition that the LEAs must consult the district council, the parish council and

"such persons as appear to them to be appropriate".

That is constructive, although there are some omissions. There are issues that I should like to see tackled. I shall be told that that is not possible, but I do not think we are taking enough account of the needs of service schools. Thousands of the children of our service men and women are served very well by the service schools education authority. The Education Select Committee is not allowed to investigate service schools because they are a matter for the Ministry of Defence, and I am glad to say, as a member of the Defence Select Committee, that we are going to investigate service education. However, I would have been more comfortable with a joined-up government approach.

I turn to a fundamental issue, to which a number of Members have referred: the crying need for education in science and technology from year one of our children's school careers. I shudder when I hear about any more involvement with creationism—as if it can be taken seriously. We are told that this is only a comparative study and that it will never happen; nevertheless, I remain worried.

Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Robert Key: Forgive me, but I will not give way; I want to keep absolutely to the time limit.

I worry about the teaching of creationism and I am strong believer in the need for more science and technology education. One of the great strengths of the school system in my constituency, which has everything from grammar schools to large and thriving comprehensives, is that it recognises the education and careers needs of the local community and, above all, the value of education for its own sake in terms of the quality of life of our young people and the good of our country in the long run. I shall happily support this Bill tonight.

4.51 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West and Royton) (Lab): I listened with interest to the speeches from the Government and Opposition Front Benchers, and noted in particular the supportive tone of the latter and of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who waxed eloquently about consensus. I should point out that I speak today more in a spirit of sorrow than of anger. Labour has, as many colleagues have said, a very good record on education. Huge extra resources have been pumped into improving buildings, classrooms and equipment, and into providing many more teachers, smaller classes and steadily rising educational standards. There are certainly aspects of the Bill that build on that foundation. For example, it contains a welcome emphasis on personalised learning, makes clear the Government's impatience with coasting and failing schools, and demands proper rules of discipline. It is also concerned with improved nutritional standards and the restoration of vocational education.

All that is clearly excellent and should be supported, but the Bill's central thrust is based on a rather different philosophy: a competitive market model opened up to external sponsors and driven by parental choice. That model, which will give popular and successful schools their head as the engines of innovation and change in the locality, has clear and distinctive drawbacks and disadvantages that have been widely publicised ever since the far-reaching nature of these proposals was first divulged in the White Paper. It was not divulged beforehand, and certainly not in Labour's election manifesto.

However, it is fair to say that since objections to that model were extensively voiced in the Labour party and outside it, the Government have engaged in discussions to try to deal with some of them. In my view, they have done so. On admissions, they have now agreed to a ban on selection not only by ability but by interviews, which is clearly important. Schools will now be required to act in accordance with the admissions code, and not merely to have regard to it; however, we have not seen the content of the code to which they are obliged to have regard.

The sheer length of the last admissions code—at the time of its withdrawal it was more than 70 pages long—illustrates some of the difficulties involved in trying to close all the loopholes that undermine a fair and balanced admissions policy within an open market system. In such a system, will the admissions forums be sufficiently robust and effective to counter pressure from high-performing schools against including a fair share of children from poorer and more difficult backgrounds? I, for one, have my doubts about that.

On expansion, the White Paper envisaged popular schools being free to expand with little or no regulation, and with few if any limits on their size. It is now proposed that local authorities should be responsible for lifting standards in weak or failing schools—which is much better—and that they can take consideration, as they should, of the overall educational performance of all schools in the area. However, in an open-market system, it is all too likely that the capacity of local authorities to do so effectively will be undermined unless we write into the Bill criteria such as no damage to surrounding schools and no impairment of the local authority's efficient use of resources. At the moment, the Bill does not include such criteria. When local authority intervention fails, a school that has been made unviable can be closed and replaced, but only at the expense of struggling with increasingly inadequate education over several years. I, for one, regard that as too high a price, both for teachers and for children.

On governance, the founding of independent trust schools would represent an irreversible transfer of public assets to external sponsors, be they businesses, charities or faith groups, for which there would be little or no public accountability whatever policies they might pursue. The important point has been made that if there was evidence that coasting or failing schools, which are a major concern, would routinely and reliably be transformed by taking on trust status and, crucially, that the overall educational performance of all the schools in the surrounding area would also be lifted, the case for the change would be strong. However, there is no such evidence. The Education and Skills Committee, in a very good report, considered all the evidence and concluded:

> "No causal link has been demonstrated between external partners and the success of a school".

The example of charter schools in the US seems to underlie many of the proposals in the White Paper and the Bill, but they have been shown to fail especially poorer and more vulnerable families.

The problem is not that the Government have not listened. They have listened, but the amendments have been relatively marginal and the core proposals in the Bill remain untouched. I expect that all hon. Members want a fair, equitable and accountable education system that will drive up standards across the range of provision in all schools, but the reform model in the Bill is the wrong one to achieve that. As has been said—and it is relevant because the OECD evidence is widespread—Finland and other Scandinavian countries have the highest literacy and education standards in the world. Finland has a fully comprehensive system, based entirely on community schools. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) pointed to differences between this country and Finland, but that does not undermine the force of my point.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

We need a wholly different model, not one that tinkers with structures and private markets—and then has to be tinkered with again to ameliorate some of the worst effects—but a modernised public services model, with a relentless focus on high quality school leadership; the recruitment and professional development of highly qualified, highly valued and well paid teachers; high expectations of all pupils; close monitoring of each pupil's progress with smaller classes, more effective communication between parents and schools; and a targeting of resources and time on pupils from the most challenging home backgrounds. With great sorrow, I have to say that I cannot support the Bill as it stands.

4.59 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), I think that the Bill is, on balance, a good thing. It is a small step in the right direction. I have several reservations about it, but in some ways the saddest aspect of the Bill is the extent to which it now falls short of what was promised in the White Paper. In particular, having seen how charter schools in some of the most deprived areas of the US work incredibly well, I was excited to read what the Prime Minister wrote in his foreword to the White Paper. He pointed to the successes of charter schools, and to the success of school choice in Florida, so I was sorry to find that the Bill did not contain any of that radical edge. I hope that we will try to restore it as the Bill goes through the House.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): We will.

Mr. Brady: I am delighted that my hon. Friend on the Front Bench confirms that we will try to do so.

The other matter about which I want to speak is academic selection. Sadly, the Bill is even more timid in its approach to that than it is about school choice. Selection is a facet of education policy and debate that is more bogged down with outdated ideological baggage than any other. In raising educational standards, we should not let ideology determine policy. What matters is what works, and I want to talk about what works.

In his excellent foreword to the White Paper, the Prime Minister made no criticism of grammar schools, but correctly identified low-achieving secondary moderns as the cause of the pressure that led to the spread of comprehensive education in many areas. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) made the same point.

I shall quote briefly from a book written in 1998 by Stephen Pollard and someone called Andrew Adonis. It stated:

"In 1965, the Labour-controlled House of Commons resolved that moving to a comprehensive system would preserve all that is valuable in grammar school education . . . and make it available to more children. Few would maintain that this has in fact been the case."

Later in the book, the authors state:

"The comprehensive revolution tragically destroyed much of the excellent without improving the rest. Comprehensive schools have largely replaced selection by ability with selection by class and house price. Middle class children now go to middle class comprehensives. Far from bringing classes together, England's schools—private and state—are now a force for rigorous segregation."

Such thinking has clearly informed the White Paper, and I welcome it very much, although it is sadly lacking from the Bill.

Mr. Jamie Reed: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he is opposed to selection by ability?

Mr. Brady: I am sorry, I did not catch that.

Mr. Reed: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House what his position is on selection by ability?

Mr. Brady: I propose to do that at the length that I am allowed by the time limit on speeches. The hon. Gentleman will not be disappointed.

Some areas, such as my own borough of Trafford in Greater Manchester, took another route in respect of education at that time. Instead of scrapping our excellent grammar schools, we set about raising the standard of our secondary moderns. That is a model that hon. Members with open minds who genuinely care about educational outcomes will want to take seriously, as the system in Trafford works better than any comprehensive system in England.

Here are the facts. Last year, 70.2 per cent. of children in Trafford gained five or more A* to C grades at GCSE. That compares with 51 per cent. in Bolton, which is represented by the Secretary of State, or 56 per cent. in Worcestershire, where the constituency of the Minister for Schools is situated. In Bury—and I see that the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) is in the Chamber—where the social profile is broadly similar, the figure is 58 per cent. In Trafford, a wholly selective area, more than 70 per cent. of children get five or more good GCSEs. That compares with 60 per cent. in leafier Cheshire next door, 54 per cent. in Oxfordshire, 61 per cent. in Hampshire, and 56 per cent. in West Sussex.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and he will know that I was responsible for education in Trafford from 2000 until 2004. The statistics that he has read out are very impressive, but I have to tell him that we encountered many difficulties. We had problems with admissions, as some schools were oversubscribed and it was very difficult to get looked-after children or those with special needs into them. That was one of the most difficult jobs in the country. Moreover, in the period when I was responsible for education in Trafford, there was always one school that was failing or subject to special measures. The hon. Gentleman must be careful when he quotes those statistics, as there is a danger that they are partial and do not take account of the problems that the Trafford system caused.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Lady is absolutely right; there are problems and difficulties with any system of education. The point is that, in Trafford, we managed to overcome those problems and get the best results in the country. The hon. Lady should be pleased about that.

The rigour and transparency of selection helped to ensure high standards of primary education long before the publication of performance data. Equally striking is the extent to which these high standards are maintained throughout a pupil's school career. Richmond-upon-Thames tops the league table for primary schools; Trafford is second. Yet at GCSE level, Richmond slides down the rankings to 69th place, with only 55 per cent of children getting five good GCSEs. Trafford maintains the momentum; we continue to top the table at GCSE and at A-level.

None of this, of course, is new. We heard an excellent speech earlier about the Northern Ireland selective system, which gets the best results in the whole of the United Kingdom. Last year, even the DFES admitted that "between the ages of 11 and 15, pupils in wholly selective local education authorities make more progress than pupils in partially selective or non-selective authorities and that extra progress equates to pupils in wholly selective LEAs achieving approximately two grades higher in one GCSE than in non-selective LEAs."

The fact is that selective LEAs do better for all children across the board. If seven out of ten children in Trafford can get five good GCSEs, why not in Oxfordshire, where only half of children reach that level? If seven out of ten children in Redbridge, with selection, can get five decent GCSEs, why not in Hampshire, Westminster or Manchester—or why not in Bristol, where only half as many children get five good GCSEs as those living in Trafford or in Redbridge?

We all know that the same few LEAs dominate the top of the table for GCSE achievement: Trafford, Redbridge, Sutton, Buckinghamshire and Kingston upon Thames, all of which are selective. The case for selection has been made as eloquently by the Government's own value-added tables as by anything else. The value-added tables had been expected to knock the grammar schools off their perch. But between the ages of 11 and 14, of the 21 schools adding most value, 18 were grammar schools and the other three were independent. If value-added tables were a wheeze to show the effectiveness of comprehensives, it did not work.

Of course some comprehensives do work well—usually ones where pupils are taught in classes set by ability, because pupils learn better when they are engaged at the right level of ability. That is the way grammar schools operate; if grouping pupils according to ability within schools is effective and desirable, it should be acceptable also to group pupils according to ability between schools. What matters is what works. Perhaps that is why today's ICM poll shows that 70 per cent. of the public would like more grammar schools, while only 21 per cent. oppose them.

Trafford's outstanding results are achieved not just because of the grammar schools, but because of the quality of the high schools that stand in the place of the failed secondary moderns of the 1960s—proud, high achieving schools with a rich pattern of specialisms, from sport to technology. We can judge the effectiveness of the high schools by the results that they produce. Do not forget: the most academically inclined children have gone elsewhere.

The national average for children achieving five good GCSEs in 2005 was 57 per cent. Ashton on Mersey high school in my constituency, also a specialist sports college, easily beat the national average: 62 per cent. of pupils got five good GCSEs. Down the road at Wellington, 73 per cent.—16 percentage points above the national average for children of all abilities—got five good GCSEs. Children at Trafford's high schools are receiving a better education and getting better results than at most comprehensives.

Indeed, if you exclude the performance of Trafford's grammar schools, with roughly the top 40 per cent. of the ability range, the high schools on their own would come 65th out of 148 LEAs in England, ahead of Richmond-upon-Thames and many others. Trafford is perhaps the perfect example of the successful, diverse state education system that the Prime Minister and Lord Adonis so rightly want to achieve—a system that, in the words of the White Paper, takes full account of "how different young people acquire knowledge and skills".

All of us here today want higher standards in schools. I am not claiming that what we do in Trafford can work everywhere, and I certainly would not seek to impose it on other parts of the country. But I am asking all hon. Members to look at the facts that I have put before the House. If they do so with an open mind, they will find it impossible to rule out the use of selection as a part of the modern, diverse provision of schools that our children need.

5.10 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): We have moved on a long way from the rhetoric of the White Paper six months ago. Some of the White Paper's language could have been lifted directly from the speeches of Sir Keith Joseph in about 1981, shortly before he made his terrible speech in Preston and argued that all women in social classes D and E should be sterilised, as the solution to the problems of the welfare state. Nevertheless, we have moved on since that early rhetoric. I commend the Secretary of State and her ministerial team for the way that they have listened to the criticisms from a wide range of sources to try to convert the White Paper into a Bill that is practical and workable.

Perhaps the key moment during the past six months, when we saw that we were moving in the right direction, was when the Secretary of State came to the Select Committee on Education and Skills and made the very simple and straightforward point that, regardless of the rhetoric about trust schools and the brave new world promised in the White Paper, in reality a trust school would be no different from the existing category of foundation schools that already have their own foundations.

In fact, trust schools will be simply a subset of foundation schools. Given that we have recently legislated to allow schools to become foundation schools far more easily—a process that can be achieved in four weeks following the simple vote of the governing body—why on earth do we need a new Bill to launch trust schools?

[Mr. David Chaytor]

I shall support the Bill this evening. It has many merits, some of which were spelt out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher): the emphasis on curriculum reform, particularly at key stage 4, and on the personalisation of the curriculum and the measures on school discipline. However, there are controversial issues about the governance of schools, the role of local authorities and the admissions policies.

Although we had genuine concerns about those issues six months ago, the Government have responded to them. Local authorities will be able to run new community schools, subject to the veto, and it is extremely important that the criteria by which that veto will be exercised are spelt out in the Bill. There are also concerns about the eligible bodies that could become involved in the new trust schools, and it is important that there are measures in the Bill to determine what external partners can become involved. The key criterion is that an external partner should be a charity or a corporate body that already has a good track record in delivering education, not someone who just happens to have a couple of million pounds to spend and wants to inflate his ego.

As the corollary of the tightened admissions procedures already included, it is important that the code of practice appears in the Bill, albeit not necessarily in full. I am not convinced about whether such a long document could be included as a schedule to the Bill. Although it already has 18 schedules, I should have thought that a 19th schedule with the full text of the code of practice would not be unreasonable. The Bill should certainly state the key admissions criteria that are deemed acceptable and those that are not. Of course, the precedent has been established for inserting some criteria in the Bill, such as in the clauses that relate to banding and interviewing.

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman share my disappointment that the Government have not yet given way to the suggestion in the Select Committee report that a move towards the anonymisation of the admissions procedure could guarantee that it would not be used for selection through the backdoor?

Mr. Chaytor: That was the hon. Gentleman's contribution to the Select Committee report, and it was an important one. I agree that the issue has not been properly debated and that it needs to have a wider debate. It is an excellent way forward, but we are not yet at the stage where the Government will adopt the suggestion. However, these ideas must be pursued.

Those who feel the need to vote against the Bill have to decide what the educational reasons for doing so are. The process that we have gone through over the past six months involved the Government publishing their White Paper, with some of its critics publishing alternative proposals. The Government listened carefully, took on board many of the proposals and made assurances and promises that other issues would be considered in Committee. Once one has made one's contribution to the debate and the Government have listened and taken on board much of what one has said, one cannot then suddenly shift ground and say that there are other reasons for not voting for the Bill.

I know that some people will say that the Bill opens the doors to a market in state education. Where have they been since the Education Act 1980? Since open enrolment was introduced—it was the first Act of the Thatcher Government—we have been steadily moving towards a more market-based system. To those who are concerned about more private sector revenue or capital coming into the state system, I say that it is very difficult for a Member of Parliament cheerfully to issue a press release welcoming the close links between the schools and local businesses in his or her constituency, welcoming the designation of specialist status for schools in their constituency with the £50,000 that comes from the private sector and welcoming the launch of an academy in the constituency with the £2 million that comes from the private sector and then suddenly say, "No, we cannot have trust schools because that will lead to more private sector involvement."

Michael Connarty: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Chaytor: I have given way once and I do not accrue another minute if I give way again. I must carry on.

We need to explore in more detail—I hope that we will do so in Committee—some of the concepts that seem to go unchallenged. I pick out the issues of diversity, choice and independence as three of the most important concepts that go unchallenged. I am quite relaxed about schools being slightly different; I am not really bothered what the name on the front door of the school says. I recognise that there is a public demand for a wider range of products and services in all spheres of our public life, but what matters at the end of the day is not the name of the school. In fact, I am not sure that what matters is the school's ethos, because I get slightly nervous about the term "ethos". It really is a euphemism for selecting those who are similar to us. However, I am bothered about diversity within the school. If the Government are going to fulfil our absolute commitment to raising standards of education and achieving the potential of all children, we have to recognise the differences among all children, and we have to be able to provide diversity of curriculum and diversity of pastoral care arrangements within each school.

Some people take it as read that choice is a good thing. I do not think that we can have a system of totally free choice without paying attention to the practical consequences of implementing that. In any system of education, health care or of any other aspect of the welfare state, choice has to operate within a series of constraints. The key issue for Government is to decide what constraints there are going to be and in whose interests they operate. There could and should be such a thing as managed choice that works in the greatest interest of the greatest number rather than a naïve view of totally free choice, which will inevitably advantage those who are most confident and articulate.

I am fairly relaxed, and have been for 20 years, about the commissioner-provider split. I am fairly relaxed about more innovation in the system, but if the system is going to be freed up, two things are of paramount importance. First, we need to have the powers for local authorities to manage at the strategic level and to co-ordinate in the interests of all children. Secondly, we have to have a tight admissions policy that works in the interests of all children. If we do not have a set of rules—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his time.

5.19 pm

Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): Throughout the Select Committee's work, it was clear that the education professionals who appeared before the Committee were in a mood to have reform; they were pro-reform, rather than anti-reform. The Liberal Democrats are not anti-reform either, despite some of the things that have been said during the debate. However, the Select Committee found that the reform that the professionals sought related to improving standards, enhancing quality and ensuring fair access for all. That is why it is a source of great sadness to me that, although there is much in the Bill to be welcomed, it is flawed by its concentration on structural change, as has been said. Much of that appears to be unnecessary and some of it is downright unhelpful and perhaps counter-productive, at least if we assume that the Government want to improve fair access to the best quality of education for all, as I believe they do.

Much attention is paid to the language of diversity and choice. Diversity and choice are good words—they are "hooray" words. Who is going to be opposed to such things? Not the former chief inspector of schools, Chris Woodhead, who has been on the airwaves this week, acting as Government apologist for the Bill and saying that diversity of provision is a precursor to increasing standards—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may have heard him. Of course, he presented no evidence for the claim, but he explained that the Bill was a welcome step towards "marketising" education. He did not give any explanation of why the marketising of education was to be welcomed. Given the problems that we are experiencing in the NHS, specifically with regard to dentistry, we can see the consequences of dogmatic and inappropriate marketisation. One would have thought that such language would be seen as reactionary and backward thinking—hardly the stuff of a legacy-setting reform agenda.

A successful school system provides the best opportunities for all its young people and ensures that every child meets their potential, irrespective of their background. On that basis, substantial parts of the Bill fail the test because they make it less likely that young people from disadvantaged backgrounds will succeed. Allowing independent admissions under current arrangements will undoubtedly lead to children from poorer families being left further behind. We have already heard about the Sutton Trust's paper, which states:

> "Schools which are responsible for their own admissions take a low proportion of pupils on free school meals, which is an indicator of a school's overall social mix."

The Institute of Education, in its report in January, stated:

> "There is clearer evidence that own-admissions authority schools are associated with greater levels of social segregation."

Furthermore, Baroness Warnock, in her evidence to the Select Committee last autumn, stated that greater independence over admissions inevitably led to children with special educational needs receiving a poorer deal.

As the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and I mentioned earlier, the Selection Committee raised the point that that anonymisation of the admissions procedure could have given the Government a way out of the accusation that independent admissions procedures are selection by the back door.

Meg Hillier: The hon. Gentleman talks about the admissions code as though there have been no changes since the White Paper. Perhaps the Liberal Democrats have got that a bit confused. There is currently a postcode lottery in many areas. As people move to live nearer schools of their choice, the reality is that we have postcode performance in many areas. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill will go some way towards addressing that inequity?

Tim Farron: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention and I acknowledge that there have been changes to the admissions code. That was the work of the Select Committee. I signed up to the report, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams), but we do not think that it goes far enough. We believe that one of the ways to ensure that we do not get discreet and sometimes unseen selection through the back door would be to remove the possibility of seen admissions, which would lead to that. I will deal with her other point later.

There are some positives in the Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) pointed them out. We welcome attempts to strengthen discipline in schools and to tackle underachievement, poor behaviour and truancy, which makes it all the more disappointing that the Government have again passed up the opportunity to make a real difference in this area. I wonder whether it has occurred to the Secretary of State that young people who are succeeding at school rarely play truant. Those who are achieving their potential, or on the way to doing so, rarely play truant. Almost exclusively it is the case that young people who play truant, who go on to get into trouble and whose contribution to society may end up being limited are those who do not succeed at school.

Why is the Government's focus on a mirage of choice between schools when it should be on the desperate need for real choice in curriculum? Why have the Government again, as has been mentioned this afternoon, ducked the challenge of taking on the Tomlinson report, which would provide young people with a spectrum of choices from which they could take a blend of traditional academic courses alongside professional and vocational ones, in a format that does not pander to academic snobbery and therefore reinforce social segregation and failure at school? The Government could truly make progress with their respect agenda, and win the respect of parents and teachers, if they only had the inclination to provide options at school that ensure that young people are enabled to succeed at what they are good at and reach their potential, rather than being relegated as failures.

This Bill has been characterised as one for urban Britain, more specifically for London. Nowhere is that characterisation more appropriate than in the language about choice that is being used to sell the Bill. Choice in education is important, but choice between different schools is a laughable nonsense to those of us living in rural communities. John Ruskin school in Coniston in my constituency is an excellent high school, and it is good that it is because the second choice school, or the second nearest, is a 10-mile drive along country lanes and two ferry rides away. The Government should not be surprised that so many teachers and parents in my constituency and others like it stand perplexed in response to the Government's celebration of choices that simply do not exist.

[Tim Farron]

Even for those less rural parts of my constituency where it is physically possible to get to more than one school without resorting to ferries, choice will in essence be meaningless. The Select Committee discovered that the Government have no serious practical plans to expand the most popular schools, so once they are full, they are full. Given that most of the most popular schools are by definition already full, even in this respect choice between institutions is a mirage.

Perhaps, however, despite all the watering down of the Bill, the reality is not that important to the Government. Perhaps what matters are the messages. Perhaps the message of the controversial part of the Bill is intended to be a dog whistle to those who consider themselves aspirational and ambitious for their children. That includes me, by the way, so I am listening. The message is, "Whatever we say, this will lead to the opportunity for your child to do better, to take advantage of your aspirations and those of your aspirational school. It's a desperate shame, of course, for the other dozen schools in your city or town that are non-aspirational and also that the parents of the kids there aren't as aspirational as you, but that's not your fault and it can't be helped."

The Conservatives like that sort of thing, and I would like to think that that is why they are preparing to back the Bill, but it is nothing as sophisticated or intelligent as that. This is low politics. The Conservatives will back the Prime Minister simply to embarrass him, but they could back us and defeat him, and at the same time protect our children from a dangerous slide back to opportunities for a few at the expense of the many.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a significant number of Members are still seeking to catch my eye in this debate, in accordance with the Order of the House of 26 October 2004 on shorter speeches, the Deputy Speaker has decided that between half-past Five o'clock and half-past Six o'clock a time limit of three minutes will apply. Obviously, whether or not Members take interventions is entirely a matter for them, but no time will be added if they do. I call Helen Jones.

5.28 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): There is much in this Bill that is sensible and well thought out and builds on the Government's excellent progress in education. But I deeply regret that I cannot support the Government's proposals for trust schools because I believe them to be wrong in principle and flawed in practice. Moreover, I believe that far from improving education for the most disadvantaged children, they will in fact disadvantage them further.

There are two things that we try to do in education. One is to pass on the skills that we need to the next generation, but the other is to transmit values to them. One cannot contract out that process—it is one of the basic responsibilities of civil society. Yet that is what we propose to do here. We propose to allow foundations, businesses and charitable organisations not simply to be partners in schools but to own and control them.

The proposal stems from two propositions—first, the belief that the current system has failed and, secondly, the belief that the measure will fix it. It is difficult for the Government to argue the first proposition when they keep announcing educational successes. They are right to do so, because the latest Ofsted report makes it clear that the proportion of good or excellent teaching has increased enormously since 1997. The number of schools causing concern or in special measures has fallen, and results have improved. The Opposition hate that fact, as they would rather that kids did not achieve many good results, but the numbers attaining five good GCSEs and better A-levels, as well as the proportion of children staying on at school, are increasing all the time.

It is therefore difficult to argue the first proposition. There are still problems in the education system that need to be reformed, and I hope to come on to that later. The question is whether the measure offers the right reform—will it fix the problem? Quite simply, there is zero evidence that people who have made a great deal of money are good at running schools. When the Select Committee examined the White Paper that preceded the Bill it said:

> "No causal link has been demonstrated between external partners and the success of a school, or the independence of a school from local authority control and its success."

The Government have cited the example of specialist schools and academies. Our predecessor Committee said in 2003 that research on specialist schools could not separate the effect of an external partner from the large injection of cash that such schools receive. The data on academies are such that the case for them is still unproven. Most academies accept a smaller proportion of deprived children than their predecessor schools, but while some have improved results, others have stalled and some have produced worse results.

We are therefore being asked to make a leap of faith. In a form of educational creationism we are asked to proclaim "All the evidence is against it, but I believe it anyway." Doing so, however, would result in the creation of a system that is unfair, does not meet parents' aspirations, and fails to address many of the problems that remain. Despite the work that the Government have done on admissions—I acknowledge that work and give them full credit for it—the key question is who monitors admissions procedure. The Select Committee recommended that it should be local authorities working with school admissions forums that set benchmarks and produce annual reports. The whole process would be accompanied by an annual report to the House. Admissions forums, which are largely ad hoc bodies, are not capable of doing that by themselves, and they cannot administer an extremely complex system used by different admissions authorities.

It is assumed that diversity in itself promotes choice, but the evidence does not stack up. Diversity and choice are two different things. In the London borough of Barnet, which has a large number of different schools and admissions authorities, 52 per cent. secure their first-choice school. In my local authority, the figure is 97 per cent. In other parts of the north-west, it is 99 per cent. The evidence for that assumption is simply not there. A great deal of evidence was given to the Select Committee showing that a wide variety of schools increases social segregation and clusters the poorest children in a small number of schools. I am worried about that, and I fear, too, the people who are waiting in the wings to take advantage of the proposal. Make no mistake—creationists and fundamentalists of all colours and creeds are waiting to use the proposal to take over schools. At a time when we ought to bring our young people together and allow them to learn to live together, I fear that we will push them further apart, which would be disastrous for this country.

There are contradictions in what is proposed. A Government who want to restore community cohesion want to move away from community schools. A Government whose whole agenda for 14 to 19 education, extended schools and even the youth service depends on co-operation between institutions have not accepted the recommendation of the Select Committee to put in the Bill a duty of co-operation between trust schools.

There is much that we need to do to reform education. We must get our best teachers into the most challenging schools. We must find out why some schools in very difficult circumstances produce excellent results and others do not. We need to manage the transition from primary to secondary school and make the personalised learning agenda a reality through proper training. The Bill is not the right reform to achieve that. It is not a reform for this century, but a return to the notion of philanthropism that applied in the 19th century. When my hon. Friends look at charities, I hope that they will remember that famous Labour saying—yes, it is an old Labour saying, and I am proud of it—that private charity is no substitute for organised justice.

5.36 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones), with whom I shared membership of the Select Committee in the previous Parliament, and with whom I had many disagreements then and no fewer today. She says there is no evidence of benefit, but that does not mean that there is evidence of disbenefit. She speaks about the percentage of parents in her constituency who are fortunate enough to get the school of their choice compared with those in Barnet, but there is not much choice in some constituencies. I cannot speak for hers. There is a big choice in Barnet, so it is not surprising that so many are disappointed when there is a wide range of choice available.

What we want, as I pointed out to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), is not that 100 pupils should get the school of their choice and that 365 should be rejected, but that 465 pupils should get the school of their choice. In other words, we need more good schools. When he was sent down from Oxford, the hero of "Decline and Fall" was told when seeking a teaching job that there are leading schools, good schools and schools, and that schools are pretty awful. That, sadly, is the case for many parents, aspiring or otherwise, and pupils, capable or otherwise, not only in our inner cities, but in other parts of the country.

The only thing that makes me feel ashamed about representing the Isle of Wight is that we inherited a poor system of schooling, where no choice is available at high school level. My Conservative-controlled council inherited that from the Liberal Democrats, who had controlled the council for 20 years. There is no choice and no competition among high schools.

I have two points to make about the Bill. First, I am concerned that charities will not take part in the trust schools enterprise if they are over-regulated. There are regulation-making powers in clauses 7, 8, 12, 17, 19, 22, 24 and 25. If Ministers do not display a light touch—I suspect they may want to treat the regulation-making power with a light touch, although I am not sure that their hon. Friends on the Back Benches want to see such a light touch—the Bill will not achieve the objectives that Ministers seek.

The second point relates to school transport. I hope that the defence will be removed from section 444 of the Education Act 1996, which permits parents whose children are excluded from school transport because of misbehaviour to allow them to truant from school. There should be no obligation, as my youth council says, on those who misbehave to be carried to school at public expense.

5.39 pm

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): I would probably have joined all my colleagues at the last election in proudly campaigning at every school gate that I could get at to hail the progress made in my local schools. The investment has gone in, and many of the reforms that needed to be made have been made. However, if we think that we have reached a point where we can relax, we are kidding ourselves. I say to my hon. Friends and to the Opposition that if they have any doubt about where we are and the road that we still need to travel, they should go to the Department for Education and Skills website, click on "school performance tables" and have a look, first at every school in their local area and its performance—the website allows that to be done very easily and shows a five-year period—and then have a little roam around the country. Members will see that there is a story to be told that is even more shocking than the 40 per cent. headroom that we still have to make as an average. There are schools that are bumping along, barely getting to 30 per cent, and they have done that for years. Derbyshire is a three-star authority and has done very well in supporting many of the schools in my constituency. Ten out of the 12 poorest schools fit into that category. If one looks more closely, there are schools that are achieving higher than that, but they are coasting. They are still going nowhere. One will also see some schools that are doing phenomenally well, reaching high levels of attainment and making that change very rapidly.

The Bill is based on what we know works. We may not have all the evidence, but we have a lot of evidence about what works. We know that good leadership, good discipline, individualised learning packages, specialisms, partnerships, federations, high-performing local education authorities, sound governance and engaged communities work. The central part of the Bill, the most powerful change agent, is the role that we are giving to local education authorities to get in early, make the diagnosis, broker the changes that are needed to shift those schools that are failing so many of our children and to make the difference. The Bill is not just about children in poorly achieving schools and poor areas. It is also about high achieving children who are not being stretched. I say, look at the website.

[Liz Blackman]

5.42 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I welcome the Bill. It is symbolic of the change in this Government's attitude to education. By freeing the provision of education, putting more emphasis on parental choice and giving schools the opportunity for greater freedoms, it marks a comprehensive departure from Labour's past. It is a recognition by the Government that to make the next step change in improving standards, we need to free the education system in this country. We need to harness the accountability that increased parental choice and increased diversity of provision can bring to the education system.

For far too long we have relied on centralised control and direction to raise standards in our schools. The measures in the Bill will lay the foundations for a change in emphasis in our education system. The Bill will introduce more choice and more diversity. That will benefit parents and pupils, not just in leafy suburbs, but in urban areas and cities as well. For too long we have allowed education in our inner city areas to be neglected. Too often, education has not been seen as a route out of deprivation and social problems.

I am concerned that the Government have already made too many concessions since the White Paper and the vision that the Prime Minister set out in its foreword. The concession that the Secretary of State made to allow LEAs to set up new community schools will be used by the weakest local authorities to hide their performance. Local authorities that are strong, confident and proud of the schools in their area will have no fear of new providers. The hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) pointed out from his experience of a visit to Sweden that competition from new providers can raise standards, improve diversity in the system and lead to better results, not just in the new schools but also in the schools already in the area. We need to learn that important lesson from experience in Sweden.

We also need to say to those people who do not believe that autonomy and freedom can contribute to an improvement in standards that they should look at the value added tables for schools published earlier this year. What type of school was at the top of those tables in raising attainment beyond the expectation of children at the end of key stage 2? The answer is city technology colleges—the Conservative forerunners of academies. Schools with the least freedom—community schools—actually experienced a reduction in standards at key stage 4 compared to their results at key stage 2.

It is vital that the Government hold firm to the reforms and recognise that parental choice, diversity and freedom lead to higher educational standards. That was the basis on which I fought the last general election. I am pleased that the Government were thinking what we were thinking, and I am delighted to be able to support the Bill.

5.45 pm

Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): The Government have a good story to tell about their education programme; about investment, which has never been matched by any other Government, the new building programmes, the record number of teachers and teaching assistants and rising standards across the board. But if we are honest, there is one thing we have not delivered: a rise in standards in areas of social deprivation. The question we face is how to address that issue.

The areas of greatest deprivation can easily be identified. We should be building schools there for the pupils who live there. A pay structure for head teachers and classroom teachers should reflect the difficult and different nature of the job in those areas. We should have something that our public school comrades have always had—class sizes of about 1:12. If it is good enough for them, it must be good enough for us. The important point is that those changes should be carried out in the community itself, rather than bussing kids to other schools. Two communities suffer from that; bussing children out of one area deprives it of a school, while school sizes balloon in the other.

The Bill is primarily about governance. I was a teacher for 17 fairly tumultuous years; it was a tough school, not a finishing school for the sons and daughters of gentlemen, and I rarely, if ever, thought about the nature of its governance or about its relationship with the local authority. We have to understand that the key determinant of education is not governance but the ability and class of the kids walking through the school gate and the ability of teachers to engage with them in education.

I shall be voting against the Bill because it is about the primacy of the private over the public; it is about marketisation, competition and fragmentation. We have heard much about the direction of travel. I urge my hon. Friends to recall what the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) said, because he brilliantly spelled out the direction of travel. It will be a disastrous direction both for education and for us as a Labour Government.

5.48 pm

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): My Front-Bench colleagues believe that the Bill is timid—it certainly would be for a Conservative Government, but it is as radical as we will get from a Labour Government. Indeed, when the legislation is passed into the right hands it could be every bit as radical as the Prime Minister originally intended. It will certainly mean an end to the pretence that we have a comprehensive education system and it will mean a significant decline in the power of local education authorities.

I understand why some Labour Members are concerned about the direction of travel of the legislation.

It will not be everybody's cup of tea. The quality of education has become so poor in many areas, with thousands of schools failing, that the middle classes are gradually withdrawing from the public sector, especially in the cities. As one Downing street adviser put it,

"we have to persuade the critical mass of people to switch from the private to the public sector".

Otherwise, he argued, they would demand tax cuts rather than supporting public sector investment.

The Conservative party has already been down the independent road. We tried to use grant-maintained schools to raise standards and choice in education, in an attempt to break away from the dead hand of LEAs. Grant-maintained schools made a small but important contribution. Their impact could have been more significant, but unfortunately there was not a broad political consensus on the issue at that time. This time, we have a wider political consensus on trust schools and extra freedoms, so, if we can get the Bill through Parliament largely unaltered, one roadblock has been removed.

The Bill provides an excellent foundation on which a Conservative Government can and should build. A number of specialist schools are currently permitted to select 10 per cent. of pupils on aptitude, which is to be applauded, by why only 10 per cent. and why include only certain specialisms such as PE and information technology? If the principle is sound, why not extend the practice to a wider range of specialisms and increase the percentages?

I have not had time to say everything that I want—this is the abridged version of my speech—but the Bill is a great platform on which the Conservative party can build further educational reforms. A party that has dismantled the comprehensive education system can hardly complain when we kick dust on that system's grave.

5.50 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): I want to explore two issues—the value of independence in dealing with poor performance and choice. Information is available on demonstrable demand for independence. An experiment took place in the 1990s, when grant-maintained status was offered with significant financial inducements. We are not repeating that experiment this time, and one must therefore assume that that offer was unattractive to many schools.

In the 1990s, roughly 3 per cent. of primaries and 25 per cent. of secondaries went down the grant-maintained route, and almost all those schools are now foundation schools. In the past seven years, about 20 schools have converted to foundation status, so the offer has been there, but it has not been taken. In August last year, greater freedom was given to apply for foundation status, but I believe that the Department for Education and Skills is currently considering only a further six applications, which does not suggest that people are battering at the gate.

Why are Labour Members so concerned about the value of independence? The evidence on outcomes is far from clear. The performance of foundation schools at the primary level compared with Ofsted outcomes for failing schools that are in special measures or that have been warned about the need to improve indicates that the performance of foundation schools and community schools is identical. The Government's model suggests that community or foundation status makes no difference to avoiding such sanctions, but there is evidence that there may be a gain at secondary level.

I will support the Bill tonight. As hon. Members who have listened to me know, I generally endorse the involvement of the private and voluntary sectors in the provision of state services. I therefore sympathise with some of the principles behind the Bill, but I am concerned about some of the practical thinking. Given what I have seen, small primaries need to be protected from some of the risks of going down that path—in my constituency, one primary reverted to community status after an appalling experience dealing with the freedoms that some hon. Members have commended.

On choice, there is no way round the fact that if one grants greater choice, one needs extra resources to pay for extra capacity, and I have heard no assurance to date that that will be offered.

5.54 pm

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I welcome the Bill, which will improve the quality of education, and I want briefly to focus on three issues. First, the introduction of specialist diplomas is radical, innovative and welcome. The Government deserve congratulation on taking forward the 14-to-19 agenda, but I have two concerns—timing and funding. I understand that the Government intend to introduce no fewer than five of those diplomas by 2008, 10 by 2009 and the full 14 by 2010, which is an ambitious time scale. I simply say to the Minister, in the most positive and courteous spirit, that in view of the need for extensive training for new personnel and for people with workplace experience to translate the aspiration of the vocational specialisms into effective practice, I hope that people will not have their expectations raised only to be disappointed.

In addition, there must be a commitment on funding. I know that the Government's implementation plan for the 14-to-19 agenda says that Ministers will provide the resources that are necessary to make it effective, and I dare say that that is what they intend. However, I hope that the Minister will accept that we need more specifics for this bold educational and social reform. It would be to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory were we to end up with a threadbare, insubstantial and underfunded programme. Please let us avoid that in the interests of all our young people.

Secondly, I want to say something about setting. I recollect that the White Paper referred to setting no fewer than 19 times. In 1997, the Government said that it should become the norm in secondary schools. I appeal to the Minister to abandon the religion of localism, which seems to have infected all the political parties. If they think that setting is a good thing, let them issue guidance, make it the norm, and invest some political muscle and capital in ensuring that it happens.

Finally, there were, last time I looked, no fewer than 61,000 looked-after children in this country, only 6 per cent. of whom secure five decent GCSEs and only 1 per cent. of whom go to university. Access matters, but they need tailored teaching, personalised learning and effective assistance. If the Government believe that they, and children in detention, are to be helped, and they want to practise the philosophy and principle of social inclusion in which they believe, they must give that the resources that it requires.

[John Bercow]

5.56 pm

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): In Plymouth, there is real enthusiasm for collaborative work, but the current performance measurement gives people little credit for doing important work that can achieve as much—arguably more—in driving up standards than any single trust or foundation school. All 17 secondary schools, including the three grammar schools and two further education colleges, are part of collaboratives that extend the curriculum pathways for 14 to 19-year-old students. The quality and extent of those opportunities has been complimented by Ofsted. Schools also collaborate on staff training and development, including the training of new teachers. We want to take that work forward in radical new ways that include all our schools, not only the high-performing ones. We are concerned that some of that will be limited by the Bill's focus on the individual school as a unit of change and improvement.

Personalisation and collaboration extend choice in the curriculum for parents and students, as well as driving improvement. Such work already addresses the postcode selection by mortgage issue, and has the potential to do more—probably more than the White Paper proposals. It breaks down rigidities between grammar schools and the rest of the education community, up to a point, and could do much more in that direction to ensure that no child is ever made to feel that an 11-plus examination is a barrier to their progress. The significant personalisation money—£0.5 billion over the next two years—could work very well with the grain of that and help us to go as far and as fast as any education community in the country. I am among those who accept that we have much more to do.

In response to my earlier intervention, the Secretary of State said that she would actively encourage such an approach, but I seek her assurance that she will ensure that the money for personalisation and other specific funds is allocated in a way that complements collaboration and ensures that the money can follow the pupil from primary to secondary school. Most importantly, will she quickly find a way of measuring and acknowledging—indeed, rewarding—success across collaborating education communities, perhaps in relation to clause 114(2) to (4)?

My city is an ambitious city. We are ambitious for our children's education and very forward-looking. We want every child to matter and every school to be an excellent school. If the further debate in Standing Committee could make it clear that what I have described is not only possible, but something that the Government will actively encourage and create a framework in which it can thrive, not just survive, then perhaps I, and probably others, could be a lot more confident that we can deliver what we all want for young people as thoroughly and as quickly as possible.

5.59 pm

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): I wrote to head teachers, talked to parents and parent groups and met local education authority officers. I must now try to summarise in three minutes the mass of information that they gave me. I shall do my best to do them justice.

Most people to whom I spoke believed the Bill to be about structures and they hoped that it would be about rising standards. They said that they wanted help with standards and that they needed some action on several matters. I hope that we can amend the measure in Committee to help them achieve their objective. They want us to stop messing about with structures. They fear that education is a political football and say that it is time that it stopped being so. Although the Bill goes some way in that direction, it could have gone much further. Sadly, the Government withdrew from that position and that disappoints many of the people to whom I spoke.

Those people told me that we need more setting in schools and that they need more help to set properly. They believe that one of the major ways in which to improve standards is to understand that children learn best in groups with others of similar ability. We need to direct proper resources to those groups to get the best out of everybody who attends our schools.

The people to whom I spoke said that we should leave decision making to the professionals in our schools and they fear that we interfere too much. Two people told us that if we simply backed off, shut up and allowed teachers to get on with it, we would have better standards of education in all our schools. I believe that—we should trust professionals. We, as politicians, do not do that enough.

The people to whom I spoke believed that there should be a limited LEA model but that it should be mostly concerned with stepping in quickly when schools begin to fail. They also said that national league tables should be abolished. Everyone who talked to me told me that they were corrupt and open to manipulation. It is time we listened to that. Equivalence is a disgrace and I hope that the Minister for Schools tackles that point.

In a short time, I have tried to sum up some of the things that the people to whom I spoke told me. They want us to help them raise standards and to get off their backs so that they can do that. I hope that the Bill can be amended and we can give them what they want so that children can benefit.

6.2 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): When one reflects on the number of days that were rightly given to consideration of Welsh devolution and compares that with the six hours for this debate, it underlines the need for all right-thinking Members to vote against the programme motion. We are not here necessarily to help or hinder the Government but to hold them to account, and we are considering an important Bill.

I endorse the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) and some of those that my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley South (Mr. O'Hara) made about the many good things that have been done locally and nationally in our schools. My constituency, like everyone else's, has benefited.

I want to underline that aspects of the Bill will be advantageous to people in constituencies such as mine, and they are welcome. However, let us make no mistake:

at the heart of the Bill lies a structural issue about trust schools. That outweighs everything else in it. I agree with the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who said that we were considering something that was roughly analogous to grant-maintained schools.

Looking around the Chamber, I see no more than a handful of hon. Members who were here in the winter of 1996–97. You will remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that one measure that came before us towards the fag-end of the Major years was the Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Bill. I had the honour of speaking about schools for the then Labour Opposition. We defeated the Bill by one vote, mainly thanks to a hapless Whip on the Government's side, I hasten to add. Nevertheless, we defeated it, and we were committed to removing what we saw as a travesty of educational policy that went under the banner of grant-maintained schools.

This is the first time since 1997 that I have spoken in the House on education. I have no doubt that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) and the hon. Members for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) and for Havant (Mr. Willetts) were absolutely sincere, even if they were making mischief with the Government, when they said that they applauded these policies. If these trust schools are introduced, they will atomise comprehensive, co-operative and cohesive local educational communities. I can put this no better than the head teacher of the Notre Dame specialist arts school, a girls' faith school in my constituency, who wrote to the Secretary of State to tell her that she had missed the point completely, and that trust schools and foundation schools were of no consequence whatever in meeting the demand for raised standards.

6.6 pm

Mr. Douglas Carswell (Harwich) (Con): I broadly welcome the Bill. It is perhaps one of the most heartening Bills on which I have spoken since becoming a Member of Parliament, and I hope that it will begin a radical transformation in our education system of the kind that I would like to see. At the centre of the Bill are the proposals to devolve to schools new powers and responsibilities, to empower schools to acquire self-governing trust status, and to devolve power and responsibility away from remote educational experts.

The Bill will begin the fragmentation of monolithic state provision, and that is a fragmentation in which we should welcome and rejoice. For more than a generation, we have seen the steady advance of an invidious leftist orthodoxy through our state educational institutions. State-enforced, one-size-fits-all education has held down a generation of young people, and it is time to overturn it. The Bill does not mark the end of one-size-fits-all, state-enforced education, but it marks the beginning of the end. That is why I have no difficulty in supporting it.

I served on the Education and Skills Committee, but I was unable to support its rearguard action to fight against the measures outlined in the White Paper. The Committee's critique of the White Paper conflicts with its decentralist rationale. If anything, the Government should be prepared to go much further than they have done in the Bill, but that can wait until another day. However, the Bill brings closer that other day, when we shall see a radical change to the status quo in our education system.

The significance of the Bill is that even those on the centre left of British politics have lost faith in the state-enforced, one-size-fits-all system of education. They have lost faith in the notion that education can, or should, be run entirely from the centre. Having listened to the ideologues and the dinosaurs who oppose these measures, I believe that the only compelling critique of the Bill comes from those who say that it does not go far enough.

Not all in the Bill is perfect—the poisoned pills placed in it by the Government on admissions, the unelected and unaccountable adjudicator, and the banning in clause 40 of interviews, for example—but I suspect that those measures will be less important than is supposed. One day, we will iron out those flaws and then we will go much further. In the meantime, the Bill warms the cockles of my localist heart. I will go through the Lobby tonight with many Labour Members, and with a spring in my step.

6.8 pm

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I rise to speak as the proud product of comprehensive education, as both a pupil and a teacher. I want to follow on from where my fellow Derbyshire Member, my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman), left off, by asking, who suffers when the system fails? With only a 56 per cent. GCSE pass rate, we are not delivering for enough children. Who suffers? It is the children from the deprived wards where expectations are lowest, the children whose parents are not well motivated to support them through education, and the children who leave school at 16 to go into low-paid jobs with low skills and to continue the cycle of deprivation. Those are the people whose needs we have to address.

It would be a tragedy if the Bill failed tonight, and I welcome any support that it is being given, from wherever it comes. I particularly welcome the statement by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) that the 18 years of Tory Government had failed to deliver for children in education. I agree with him entirely. I know that it failed. I was a teacher under a Tory Government, and I was a Labour member of an education authority under a Tory Government. I sat there while Derbyshire budgets were cut by 7 per cent. in real terms, and when we had larger primary class sizes, more outdoor toilets and more leaky roofs than anywhere else in the country. That was education under the Tories, and we must not return to it.

The Bill is not a panacea. It does not say, "We know best". It acknowledges that when schools have made major strides, they have done so by thinking out of the box and by finding new partners—partners with a vested interest in skills, education or children. They have worked in harmony with good LEAs, or despite the lackadaisical LEAs, and they have said "Every Child Matters."

The Bill tells us, "Here are some things that others have found to work. With the right local leadership in our schools, with supportive communities taking an active interest in their schools and with the right partners chosen by schools and encouraged by LEAs, we can create a framework to give better support to schools, children and learning. We can make a difference to the children who most need that difference to be made."

[Tom Levitt]

The Bill opens doors rather than closing them. It does not guarantee higher standards, but it is the toolbox from which schools can select to ensure that they deliver for the children in their catchment areas.

6.11 pm

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): My girls are being educated at a state comprehensive, but I cannot allow the comments of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) to go unanswered. The hon. Gentleman, who has chaired the Education and Skills Committee, was educated at a selective grammar school, while I, a junior conservative Member, was educated at an inner-city secondary modern.

My girls have not always been at a comprehensive school. They have also been educated at private schools, and I have never seen anything in a private school that could not be replicated in a state school. I was particularly impressed by Ampleforth, a Roman Catholic boarding school that follows the rule of St Benedict and has an ethos based on realising the potential of every child, regardless of ability. It takes an holistic approach to children and is not obsessed with league tables. Father Gabriel, the head, does nothing that could not be replicated in any other school. It is not necessary to have grand buildings to achieve culture, ethos and identity. What is necessary is parental preference and involvement. A school must be responsive to its community or, dare I say, market, and it definitely needs freedom.

The Bill takes the first wimpish steps towards liberation of state schools from the asphyxiating control of local education authorities, and removes the remote governance of this place. By giving schools freedom, it will enable our children who are educated in the state system to benefit from the kind of education from which those in private schools benefit.

We are all different. If that were not the case, we would all be sitting on this side of the House. Why, then, do Labour Members want to homogenise education? They want to keep it all at the same level, and ensure that everyone is taught in the same schools. We do not want that. We want parent power, and believe me, if a parent talks to the head of an independent school, the independent school jumps. Parents need and want that kind of power in the state system.

Surely we should welcome the emphasis on personalised learning. After all, it is another thing from which children in fee-paying schools benefit while children in state schools do not.

I speak very much with a mother's hat on. I wholeheartedly welcome the emphasis on nutrition in school and the work done in that connection by the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh).

I have an interest in special needs. I hope that trust schools will have the ability and the power to "velcro" the funds provided by the statementing system to children's special needs, and that some trust schools will specialise in that and will really benefit.

I wholeheartedly support the Bill.

6.14 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I am concerned about the direction in which we are travelling. The reforms that we have introduced since 1997 are a recipe for success, and success is beginning to come through: 2005 was the best year ever for results. The recipe is based on strong leadership from head teachers, substantial funding for schools and better, more highly trained teachers, working with children who are now motivated because they are in an environment that is more conducive to learning and teaching. The reforms have brought success, so it is standards that we should concentrate on, not structures.

My fear is that altering the structures, and particularly turning foundation schools into trust schools, will lead to unintended consequences. I honestly believe that there is no evidence to support the argument that competition in education can drive up standards. The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) referred to the USA and in particular to California, but he missed out Minnesota. According to research done for the alternative White Paper, the charter school system in Minnesota did not work. Seventeen of its 88 charter schools have closed in the past decade, and the ones that remain open are providing education for better-off people.

We need to move away from the argument that by altering the structure of education, we can drive up standards. Altering the structure will not help kids in my constituency, many of whom live in deprived areas. We are already starting to see the benefits of universal nursery education and of Sure Start, which is engaging not just the kids but the parents with education. It is the best thing that this Government have done, and by concentrating on standards we can make improvements.

In conclusion, I support the National Union of Teachers' stance, which is that we should focus on comprehensive education and ensure that better standards lead to the results that we want to see.

6.17 pm

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): A generation ago, there was a great debate in this country on how we should run the economy. On one side were those who argued in favour of big government, planning and protecting failed industries and institutions; on the other were those who advocated competition, allowing successful institutions to expand and letting industries that were no longer fit for purpose fail. The latter view prevailed because some of the brighter elements in the Labour party recognised that the debate was no longer worth having, and that they needed to adapt. The same is happening now, in that those brighter elements recognise that the values of choice and diversity are also vital to our public services. Fundamentally, that is what this Bill is about.

Clause 2, which deals with choice and diversity, makes it clear that local education authorities must have regard to

"securing diversity in the provision of schools, and . . . increasing opportunities for parental choice."

Clause 3 states that they must take into account parental representations on these matters, and that they "must have regard to" guidance provided by the Secretary of State. That provides a huge opportunity. The Secretary of State could say that if a majority of parents petition for a school to become a foundation school, it must become one. That is an excellent step.

There will be many more foundation schools than community schools. The Government, of course, have a vested interest in encouraging more foundation schools; it is, after all, a flagship policy. A few weeks ago, there was a power of veto preventing the creation of any new community schools, but the Government have bowed to pressure from their Back Benchers. Who is to say that they will not reverse their position once the pressure is off? I hope that they do, that the veto will be used to prevent the creation of such schools, and that we will see more foundation schools. The Bill includes powers for the Secretary of State to close failing schools in the interests of the welfare of children.

If we have more foundation schools, what powers will they have? They will have powers under the power to innovate programme and they can seek further derogations from regulations. For example, the Department is in discussion with some schools about varying local teachers' pay and conditions. That could be devolved to a local level under the Bill.

The buzz phrase—everybody is using it in all sorts of situations—is direction of travel. There is no doubt about the direction of travel of the Bill. It is in the right direction, at least from my perspective, and I welcome it.

6.20 pm

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): I will support the Government tonight in the Lobby. The reforms that have been introduced, in terms of diversity and structure, increased powers for local authorities, and parental choice, will all in their different ways drive up standards. The research is clear and outlines the problems. As the proportion of children from low income backgrounds goes up, average results go down. The research explains that children from different backgrounds have very different chances of achieving good results. Those facts must be acknowledged and, when they are, we will have a chance of putting reforms together that will improve standards.

In my constituency in low income wards, only 24 per cent. of children achieve five good GCSEs. In average and high income wards, 80 per cent. of children achieve five good GCSEs. Over the past seven years, we have seen a 10 per cent. improvement in low income wards, but at that rate of improvement it will take 32 years for the children from low income families to match the achievement in average and high income wards. That is not acceptable. Reform is not an option: it is an absolute obligation.

The issue is not investment. We have put that in and we are still struggling to deliver effective improvements in standards for children from low waged families. It is therefore crucial that we improve the structure of delivery. I say that while acknowledging the research based on academies. It is not popular, but I will say it because it is factually correct. In Middlesbrough we have three academies and two of them are seriously delivering. Over three years, we have seen a significant increase in the number of children achieving five good GCSEs. We have also seen parents becoming very involved in the schooling of their children, and that is to be commended. They are showing enthusiasm and commitment and once parents show that, we have serious support for increasing standards. Structure is important and I implore my colleagues to look at the evidence.

If there was one reason for me to support the Bill, it would be the admissions framework assurance that will give top priority to admissions for looked-after children. That is such an important part of the whole. In addition, local authorities will have an explicit commitment to narrow the gap in attainment between pupils from different backgrounds.

6.23 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): There are some good things in the Bill and it is a great improvement on the White Paper, but we would have had those aspects that are good anyway. I have to concentrate on what the Bill will do for Grimsby, and in my view the answer is very little.

First, the gutless failure to abolish selective education in Lincolnshire means that every day more than 100 kids are transported from Grimsby by bus and Range Rover to selective schools. That represents a loss of ability and parent power to schools in Grimsby. With more choice, that number might increase. People in the villages on the border might be eligible for the six-mile free travel for poorer children to attend selective schools in Lincolnshire.

Secondly, secondary education is improving fairly rapidly in Grimsby. We will probably have three academies, which means that there will be much more competition. How will schools improve their competitiveness and secure a higher place in the league tables? They will do so by attracting more kids of greater ability, and they can do that only by draining ability from the remaining schools in the area. Therefore, what measures will be put in place to help and sustain those schools suffering the drift away of able children to the better schools? How will those schools be protected, and how will they get the extra teachers, money and resources that they need to combat such competition?

Thirdly, how will the schools commissioner ensure that we do not have what might be called postcode trust-school syndrome, by which I mean that trust schools will be in the better areas, and not the poor or deprived areas that really need them? Trust schools are a very good idea, as long as power in the school is proportionate to contribution. Governors will have to make a massive contribution to their schools: otherwise, there will be no point to the changes, and we will have what amounts to merely an academy-lite system.

Fourthly, governors will have too many duties. Their duties will be enormous, and will prove to be much too hard for ordinary working people and families, and especially single-parent families, to perform. They also need to be paid—not out of school funds, but by the local authority or the state—if they are too to do the job properly, and if working people are to be represented among their ranks.

Finally, the power of local authorities needs to be strengthened, not reduced. Only they can ensure fair play for the whole area, with a fair distribution of SEN kids and other children with problems, and expulsions.

6.26 pm

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): I resent some of the comments that have been made to me in this debate about the White Paper and the Bill, as they have suggested that I am somehow in favour of the status quo. I do not support the status quo: I accept that this Government have improved education across the board, in every school in my area. However, I am sure that those schools still occupy almost exactly the same places in the secondary education league tables as they did when those tables were first published.

Much has been said about choice in regard to this Bill, but for whose benefit are we introducing that choice? Who are we empowering to make choices in the education process? Fiona Millar and Melissa Benn produced an alternative paper entitled "Quality and Equality for all Children", in which they proposed a bounty for children attending schools that attract those who have not achieved higher results in primary education. In support of their argument, they quoted Tim Brighouse, who suggested that there should be a flat rate for pupils, with additional sums for those who had achieved only levels 3 or 2 at primary school.

Similarly, Peter Hyman wrote an article for The Guardian on 24 October, in which he suggested that resources should be targeted at schools with the most challenging pupils. We need to ensure that the system drives up standards in those schools, but the Bill does not say how resources will be targeted on those areas, with the specific aim of raising standards.

The Bill wants to promote diversity, and places an onus on local authorities to do that in their areas. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) said earlier, it is a question not of using the Bill to end selection in one sweep, but of challenging discrimination in our education service and removing the circumstances that cause people to opt out. However, the creation of a marketplace in our local education service requires winners and losers and, sadly, the people who will be the losers will be the same ones who have always lost in our education system. The challenge for all of us is to empower those parents so that they can ensure that their children's education improves.

Who are we legislating for? Many parents do not engage in their children's education in the way that we would like them to. Recently, I visited a primary school in my constituency, where only five parents had bothered to visit any of the secondary schools that their children might attend. We must make sure that we improve standards in such schools, and that we legislate in such a way that they get the resources that they need.

6.30 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): This has been a fascinating and enjoyable debate, with pro-Bill speeches from Labour and Conservative Members and some passionate anti-Bill speeches from Labour Members. The number of people wanting to participate in the debate reflects the importance that many Members attach to education.

This is a necessary, if rather modest, Bill. It is necessary because although we happily acknowledge that there has been a degree of improvement in standards since 1997, there is still a huge amount to do. It cannot be right that nearly half of 11-year-olds leave primary schools without the necessary skills in reading, writing and maths combined. These children rarely catch up when they go on to secondary school.

It cannot be right that despite improvements in GCSE figures, still only 44 per cent. are achieving five or more good GCSEs when English and maths are included, or that the proportion gaining five or more good GCSEs is falling when the core subjects of English, maths, science and a foreign language are included.

Nia Griffith: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that GCSEs were set up as an amalgamation of O-levels—available to only about 25 per cent. of the population—and the CSE, and that a D is actually the average grade of GCSE expected of a pupil? We must stop labelling as failures the pupils who struggle to get D and E. A child may equally be under-achieving if he or she gets a B when capable of an A. We should be looking at the reasons behind that. Does he agree that we should stop labelling these children, as that is half the problem?

Mr. Gibb: I accept the hon. Lady's point, but no one is blaming the children. Too many schools in this country are underperforming and letting down the very children she is talking about. For example, it cannot be right that employers complain that new graduate employees are writing what they describe as illiterate memos and letters. The National Audit Office has reported that 23 per cent. of secondary schools are underperforming. It is clear that education reform is still crucial.

We support the Bill because:

> "The system will finally be opened up to real parent power. All schools will be able to have Academy style freedoms . . . No one will be able to veto parents starting new schools or new providers coming in, simply on the basis that there are surplus places."

How could anyone disagree with the Prime Minister when he said that? Even after the unnecessary concessions made to Labour rebels in the Secretary of State's letter, these essential principles of reform remain as she described them. She said:

> "I remain committed to all the freedoms for foundation and trust schools that we set out in the White Paper—schools owning their own buildings, employing their own staff and setting their own admission arrangements . . . the ability of good schools to expand, as set out in the White Paper, will remain."

Tom Levitt: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether Conservative members of the Local Government Association regard the changes that are being made to the Bill as unnecessary? I do not think that they do.

Mr. Gibb: We have a diverse set of opinions in the Conservative party, but we all believe in more good schools. It is important that good schools—schools that are over-subscribed by 10 applications for every place—are allowed to expand if they wish. It is important that committees made up of people with a vested interest to maintain the status quo are not allowed to veto such expansion. That is why we welcome the abolition of the school organisation committees in clause 27 and the abolition, in effect, of the surplus places rule.

It is important that underperforming and failing schools are reformed or closed over a much shorter time scale, rather than allowing them to languish year after year, providing a poor education to thousands of youngsters. That is why we welcome the Bill's provisions to make it easier to close bad schools.

School discipline remains a major concern of parents and is a key reason why many teachers are leaving the profession.

The Steer committee has made some important recommendations about giving teachers statutory powers over discipline, and we welcome the fact that the Bill contains those new powers. Good behaviour is crucial to raise standards in our schools. However, we have some serious concerns about parts of the Bill. It is over-prescriptive on admissions, reflecting a world view that the quality of a school is driven by its intake, rather than by the quality of its teaching and leadership. The school adjudicator's powers, which are increased in the Bill, need to be tempered by a right of appeal. We will table amendments on those issues and amendments to undo the unnecessary concessions in the Secretary of State's letter.

Despite all the measures in the Bill that make it easier to establish foundation schools, trust schools and academies, the Conservative party could have taken the view that, because the Bill did not go far enough, we would oppose it. With a looming Labour rebellion, that approach would have ended up with the Bill being defeated. We could have formed an unholy alliance with Labour's rebels in the No Lobby. The public loathe that kind of politics. Such an approach brings politics into disrepute and is deeply cynical, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has set his leadership against it. He has made it clear that, when the Government do the right thing, we will support them.

Clive Efford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gibb: I will not give way.

Our view is that the Bill's net effect, taking the good with the bad, will make it easier to establish trust schools and therefore increase the freedoms available to our schools.

The Secretary of State has written to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) to ask why, if we support the Bill, we oppose the programme motion. We oppose the programme motion, because we almost always oppose programme motions, as they are an affront to the procedures of the House. It would be wrong therefore if we failed to oppose this programme motion simply because we happen to support the Bill. Some of the concessions made to Labour rebels that were agreed behind closed doors should be debated more fully on the Floor of the House—issues such as the powers of the unelected schools adjudicator; the outlawing of interviews by schools, even interviews that help to enforce home-school contracts, which are particularly important in raising standards in inner city schools; and, of course, the concessions on community schools.

Those concessions were negotiated by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, on which I had the pleasure to serve. I was struck by his impressive speech, in which he said that we did not think hard enough—all of us, collectively—about what we replaced grammar schools with and that some of us have been slow in realising that vision. He is right: we need to take ideology out of education and to replace it with what works.

A similar point was made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—a former Secretary of State for Education and Science—in an excellent speech. He said that we may now be moving towards a consensus, perhaps one that is 20 years too late, and that we should try to build a consensus on how we tackle low expectations and poor leadership and standards in schools, such as those referred to by the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), where only 8 per cent. of pupils achieved five or more good GCSEs in the 1990s.

Consensus was also sought by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson), in a very powerful and passionate speech, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), whose speech was very different from that of the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter). I was surprised by the speech of the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), who leads on the issue for the Liberal Democrats. She agrees with the provisions on discipline and vocational education, yet she is pledged to vote against the Bill. She also agrees with not serving mechanically recovered turkey, yet she is pledged to vote against those provisions in the Bill. Perhaps her predecessor and fellow Liberal, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), hit the nail on the head when he said, in the shortest speech that I have ever heard him give, that this was a Tory Bill. In a very thoughtful and candid speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) made a similar point when he asked how Conservative Members could vote against a Bill that promotes diversity and choice. He, indeed, is right.

I understand the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) about the ban on interviews, particularly for faith schools such as the London Oratory. We will table amendments to try to redress that in Committee.

My hon. Friends the Members for Salisbury (Robert Key) and for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) are passionate about the grammar schools in their constituencies. I have been to both the secondary moderns that my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West referred to—Wellington school and Ashton on Mersey school. Despite 40 per cent. of the children in Trafford going on to grammar schools and Wellington school taking some of the other 60 per cent., 73 per cent. of its pupils achieve five or more grades of A to C at GCSE. It can be done.

In a highly effective three-minute speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) made the key point that we need more good schools. My hon. Friends the Members for Buckingham (John Bercow) and for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) sought more setting in schools. I believe that that is the way forward.

This is a modest Bill, but it is significant in one important respect. It probably marks the last education Bill that we will see from this Administration and the last serious education reform that we are likely to see over the next few years. Education remains one of the most crucial issues facing this country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon

[Mr. Gibb]

(Mr. Maples) said in his speech, in today's increasingly competitive world in which knowledge and intellect are the source of new wealth creation, the only way that we can compete with India and China and the millions of highly educated graduates these countries are producing is if we can deliver a significantly improved quality of education.

Leaving aside the economic importance of the issue, we should also want all our children to be highly educated for its own sake, so that they can enjoy and enrich our culture. That means ensuring that children are taught to read properly and effectively at primary school with methods that work—with synthetic phonics rather than whole language teaching—that maths is taught properly and that children learn their multiplication tables. We need to ensure that the curriculum is rigorous and that pupils are set by ability so that the less able have the time and space to learn and the most able are stretched to their full potential.

What the Bill, the White Paper and the row and debates in the Labour party over the past few months reveal is that Labour can no longer deliver any future serious reform to our education system. What Lord Kinnock and Lady Morris have established, together with all the Labour Members who signed up to the alternative White Paper, is that only a Conservative Administration can now deliver the changes we still need in our education system if we are to provide for a prosperous and fulfilled future for the next generation.

We support the Bill this evening, modest though it is, because we believe that it will increase the freedoms that are available to schools and that it will make it easier to close bad schools, easier to expand good schools and easier to establish new schools. All this is a small step to ensuring that children from whatever background get a better education. That is why I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends and right hon. and hon. Members from all wings of the Labour party to join us in the Lobby in support of the Bill.

6.43 pm

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): I start by thanking all the Members who contributed to this very lively debate. I am not surprised. As the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) suggested, education is the passion that brought many of us into politics. This debate has built on the important debate that we had since we published the White Paper and up to the publication of the Bill, a debate that involved parliamentary colleagues. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and the work of the Education and Skills Committee in taking forward that debate.

I pay tribute to other hon. Friends and parliamentary colleagues, as well—even to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) for his contribution to the debate that we have had since the White Paper. The debate has also included local government, head teachers and school staff, including through their professional associations. The Bill is better for having gone through that process.

We want to continue the scrutiny and discussions in Committee, which is why I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) is frankly wrong to ask people to vote against the programme motion, as is the Conservative party. The programme motion sets an end date for consideration of the Bill in Committee. I know that some colleagues are worried that that might limit the time available for scrutiny, but I can assure them that the number of Committee sittings and how long they last is not in the motion. We have already said to Opposition parties that we are prepared to be flexible about this matter to ensure that the Bill has all the scrutiny necessary in Committee and two days for Report stage and Third Reading on the Floor of the House. I ask my hon. Friends and others to support the programme motion.

During the debate, many colleagues have contributed their experience as teachers, governors, local councillors and parents. I taught for 11 years before coming into this place. I taught in the lean years, when funding per pupil was falling in real terms, when we used to run around putting buckets under leaky roofs, and when the four in 10 11-year-olds who came into secondary schools without the necessary levels of English and Maths sank or swam—and usually sank—on their own. So, although I welcome support from wherever it comes in the House, quite frankly I would not depend on Tories to deliver our shared ambition to provide the best education for every child, wherever they live, whatever their background.

We have been taken back in time by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)—back to 1987, back to Margaret Thatcher. Well, there is one thing that can be said about those years: at least then Tories used to vote with the courage of their convictions. Tonight, they will be voting with the courage of our convictions, because the Bill builds on the hard work of staff, governors, school leaders and local authorities throughout the country, backed by Labour Government investment and reform, which has led to the best ever results, more young people staying on and getting on, and fewer failing schools.

For this Government, however, good enough has never been good enough. While there are still seven out of 10 young people on free school meals who do not get five good GCSEs, while too many leave education and training at 16, and while where someone comes from still determines where they will get to, there is more to be done, and only a Labour Government can do it. That is why clause 1 spells out what is at the heart of our reform: ensuring that every child fulfils their educational potential.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) is right to focus the Government on disadvantage, but that is what the Bill does and what our funding has been doing. The Bill is about more one-to-one and small group tuition, more targeted support for disadvantaged families and more full-time provision for excluded pupils—the sorts of things argued for by my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) as well.

John Bercow: Given that children in young offender institutions receive, on average, only eight hours of education a week, but that the Minister says that the Bill is intended to help all children, will she be good enough to tell me and the House where in the 167 clauses, 18 schedules and 228 pages better provision is made for those children, because I cannot see it?

Jacqui Smith: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have looked in detail at the Green Paper that we have already published about offender education.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) made the important point about special educational needs and, of course, ensuring the potential of every pupil covers that. I can assure him that all maintained schools, including trust schools, have a duty to admit pupils who have that school named on a statement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) rightly argues that the extra funding that we are making available for personalised learning should be used to develop collaborative initiatives in Plymouth. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) identified the progress being made for looked-after children in the Bill.

This is a Bill that gives every child an entitlement to a choice of new vocational diplomas, rightly highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley South (Mr. O'Hara), whose authority is a pathfinder in taking forward that work. It is a Bill that makes healthy food and drink available throughout the school day. It opens up access to a range of exciting activities after school and in spare time.

Remaining on those issues, I welcome to the Front Bench the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather). I hope that when she has been in her job a bit longer she will bring a bit more coherence to the Liberal Democrat position. As it is, I have to say that I am quite looking forward to the next "Focus" leaflet. Alongside the headline, "There's a hole in the road. The Lib Dems are looking into it," will be one saying, "And by the way, we've just voted against support for school discipline, more vocational choice, better school food and youth facilities and a tougher admissions code."

Furthermore, this is a Bill that ensures that teachers can teach and children can learn, free from bullying and the persistent low-level disruption that blights too many classrooms.

Turning to trust schools, I have great respect for the experience, particularly the teaching experience, of my hon. Friends the Members for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) and for Elmet (Colin Burgon), but I think that they are wrong in arguing that there is not a link between what happens in the classroom and the potential of the trust school model. What happens in the classroom fundamentally depends on the leadership of the school, and we can find more ways to support that.

That is why this is a Bill that empowers schools, not to go it alone, but to work with other schools, colleges and external partners to meet the particular needs of their school community. That was the point made so brilliantly by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), when he talked about the experience of education action zones and I was reminded why he was such a fantastic Secretary of State for Education and Employment. It was the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), who argued that higher standards in schools are not a zero sum game. Innovation in the system helps to achieve higher standards.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) suggested that trust schools would mean an irreversible transfer of assets. Let me reassure him that that is not the case. When a trust school wishes to dispose of non-playing field land, it will have to inform the local authority, which will be able to object or claim a share of the proceeds. If a trust is removed, the assets will revert to the governing body or, in the case of school closure, to the local authority.

I turn now to the issues raised by several hon. Members about the role of local authorities. This is a Bill that enshrines the role of local authorities as the champion of parents and pupils, and as the guarantor of standards—my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) rightly challenged hon. Members to look to improving standards in their constituencies. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) that the tougher powers for local authorities to intervene earlier and more strongly where schools are failing will apply to all schools whatever their status. There is also a key role for local authorities as the strategic leader of local services.

In very thoughtful speeches, my right hon. Friends the Members for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) and for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) rightly argued for the important role that local authorities can play, first, of course, in planning places and particularly in relation to expansion. It has been possible for all categories of school to publish expansion proposals since June 2003, but that is not an unfettered right. What is new is that the Bill provides for the local authority, in its new role as a champion of parents and pupils, to take responsibility for school organisation decisions, rather than the school organisation committee. In reaching any decision, the local authority and the school adjudicator will take into account the impact on overall standards in an area.

My right hon. Friends also argued strongly for local authorities to bring together the elements of their responsibility for children's services and for delivering on our belief that every child matters, alongside their role in commissioning schools. That is a key area of the new strategic role for local authorities, which is why every school will have a duty to pay regard to the children and young people's plan produced by the local authority.

Several of my hon. Friends raised the issue of community schools and local authorities' ability to propose the establishment of such schools. May I reiterate what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said this morning? We are content to explore in Committee whether we should set out in legislation—and, if so, how—the factors that the Secretary of State must consider in reaching a decision about whether to allow a community school proposal to proceed. Finally, the Bill guarantees fair access to the system of higher standards that we believe that we can build through its provisions and our reform programme. It will do so not just for people who can afford to move house for it or who can afford to pay for it but for everybody.

[Jacqui Smith]

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), throughout the debate and in a very thoughtful speech this evening, has emphasised the need for fair admissions, and we have included that in our objective. I assure my hon. Friends that we can consider in Committee the detail of the admissions code and the criteria that will apply to it, as my right hon. Friend spelt out. Some hon. Members expressed concern about the way in which the admissions forums will work in their new strengthened role, but we can look at regulations on reforming admissions forums so that they can play that role not only by referring schools to the adjudicator and producing an annual report but by establishing a collective commitment to fair access across a local authority area. Those are all important questions, and I give the House a commitment that we can consider them in Committee.

The Bill is about delivering equity alongside excellence. It is about delivering less selection and more opportunity. Ironically, if Members vote against it this evening they will vote for weaker admissions arrangements. It is a decisive move away from the policies previously embraced by the Opposition—a grammar school in every town; a few grant-maintained schools opting out of the local family schools and receiving the differential capital funding available at the time; and a passport out for a few children, rather than the drafting in of support for the many.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): We support the Government.

Jacqui Smith: I have already welcomed the Opposition's support. While I am glad that they are trying to put their past behind them—[Interruption.] There was some uncertainty among Opposition Members about the issue, and some of them have been brought kicking and screaming and flipping and flopping to our door. We should not be in any doubt: this is a Labour Bill. A vote for the Bill today is a vote to build on the work of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside, my noble Friend Baroness Morris and my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke). The next stage of reform is built on the foundations created by the Labour Government. A vote for the Bill is a vote for the belief that every child's potential and achievement matters; that every school must be empowered to deliver the transformation of children's lives; and that a job this big needs to draft in all the support that it can to our schools to make the difference. It is a vote for the aspirations of parents and children throughout the country; it is a vote for Labour values; and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 458, Noes 115.

Division No. 192] [6.59 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Amess, Mr. David
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Baldry, Tony
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barker, Gregory
Barlow, Ms Celia
Baron, Mr. John
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Berry, Roger
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blair, rh Mr. Tony
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brennan, Kevin
Brokenshire, James
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Browning, Angela
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burt, Alistair
Butler, Ms Dawn
Butterfill, Sir John
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cairns, David
Cameron, rh Mr. David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Conway, Derek
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Creagh, Mary
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curry, rh Mr. David
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Dowd, Jim
Duddridge, James
Duncan, Mr. Alan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Field, Mr. Mark
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Griffith, Nia

Griffiths, Nigel
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hands, Mr. Greg
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Mr. Tom
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Healey, John
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hendry, Charles
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Herbert, Nick
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoey, Kate
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Horam, Mr. John
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hughes, rh Beverley
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Iranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Key, Robert
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lammy, Mr. David
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Linton, Martin
Loughton, Tim
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Mackinlay, Andrew
Maclean, rh David
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Main, Anne
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Maples, Mr. John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rt Mr. Ian
McCrea, Dr. William
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meale, Mr. Alan
Mercer, Patrick
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Mr. George
Osborne, Sandra
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pearson, Ian
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Prosser, Gwyn
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Randall, Mr. John
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, John
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Rosindell, Andrew
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Christine
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Scott, Mr. Lee
Seabeck, Alison
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Sheridan, Jim
Simmonds, Mark
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tami, Mark
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ms Dari
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Ussher, Kitty
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Vaz, Keith
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wicks, Malcolm
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Wills, Mr. Michael
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Jeremy
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George

Tellers for the Ayes:
Joan Ryan and
Mr. Parmjit Dhanda

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Alexander, Danny
Baker, Norman
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Brake, Tom
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Bruce, Malcolm
Burgon, Colin
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Caton, Mr. Martin
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Ms Katy
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Clelland, Mr. David
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cruddas, Jon
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Drew, Mr. David
Dunwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth
Efford, Clive
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Flynn, Paul
Foster, Mr. Don
Galloway, Mr. George
George, Andrew
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Goldsworthy, Julia
Grogan, Mr. John
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Havard, Mr. Dai
Heath, Mr. David
Hemming, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Heyes, David
Holmes, Paul
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horwood, Martin
Howarth, David
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hunter, Mark
Jackson, Glenda
Jones, Helen
Jones, Lynne
Keen, Alan
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Kramer, Susan
Lamb, Norman
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Lloyd, Tony
McDonnell, John
Meacher, rh Mr. Michael
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moore, Mr. Michael
Mudie, Mr. George
Mulholland, Greg
Oaten, Mr. Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Pugh, Dr. John
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Short, rh Clare
Simpson, Alan
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, John
Smith, Sir Robert
Stunell, Andrew
Swinson, Jo
Taylor, David
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Walley, Joan
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Webb, Steve
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wood, Mike

Tellers for the Noes:
Richard Younger-Ross and Lorely Burt

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

EDUCATION AND INSPECTIONS BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Education and Inspections Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 11th May 2006.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration and Third Reading shall be completed in two days.

5. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion two hours before the moment of interruption on the second day of proceedings.

6. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

7. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

8. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

The House divided: Ayes 300, Noes 290.

Division No. 193] [7.16 pm

AYES

Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Bell, Sir Stuart
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blair, rh Mr. Tony
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Cairns, David
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chapman, Ben
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clapham, Mr. Michael
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Donohoe, Mr. Brian H.
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Eagle, Angela
Eagle, Maria
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Ennis, Jeff
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim

Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Gwynne, Andrew
Hain, rh Mr. Peter
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hall, Patrick
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodge, rh Margaret
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hood, Mr. Jimmy
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Iranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Knight, Jim
Kumar, Dr. Ashok
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Levitt, Tom
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lloyd, Tony
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McDonnell, Dr. Alasdair
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Milburn, rh Mr. Alan
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Mitchell, Mr. Austin
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Murphy, rh Mr. Paul
Naysmith, Dr. Doug
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reed, Mr. Jamie
Reid, rh John
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Angela E. (Basildon)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Smith, John
Snelgrove, Anne
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Stuart, Ms Gisela
Tami, Mark
Taylor, Ms Dari
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Joan Ryan and
Mr. Parmjit Dhanda

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burgon, Colin
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Alistair
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Cameron, rh Mr. David
Campbell, Mr. Gregory
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Connarty, Michael
Conway, Derek
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davies, Mr. Quentin
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Dobson, rh Frank
Dodds, Mr. Nigel
Donaldson, Mr. Jeffrey M.
Dorries, Mrs. Nadine
Duddridge, James
Duncan, Mr. Alan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Dunwoody, Mrs. Gwyneth
Efford, Clive
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farrelly, Paul
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne

Field, Mr. Mark
Fisher, Mark
Flynn, Paul
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Fox, Dr. Liam
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Galloway, Mr. George
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Greenway, Mr. John
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Grogan, Mr. John
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Hayes, Mr. John
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hoban, Mr. Mark
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jackson, Glenda
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Johnson, Mr. Boris
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Helen
Jones, Lynne
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Loughton, Tim
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Marshall-Andrews, Mr. Robert
Mates, rh Mr. Michael
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McCrea, Dr. William
McDonnell, John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mudie, Mr. George
Mulholland, Greg
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Oaten, Mr. Mark
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Ottaway, Richard
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Pelling, Mr. Andrew
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Pickles, Mr. Eric
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robathan, Mr. Andrew
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Robertson, Mr. Laurence
Robinson, Mrs. Iris
Robinson, Mr. Peter
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Short, rh Clare
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Alan
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, Sir Robert
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spelman, Mrs. Caroline
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, David
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wallace, Mr. Ben
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Waterson, Mr. Nigel
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann
Wiggin, Bill
Willetts, Mr. David
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Wilson, Sammy
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wood, Mike
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Andrew Rosindell and Mr. Crispin Blunt

Question accordingly agreed to.

EDUCATION AND INSPECTIONS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education and Inspections Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) expenditure incurred by virtue of the Act by the Office for Standards in Education, Children's Services and Skills or by a Minister of the Crown, and

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable under any other Act out of money so provided.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

Question agreed to.

EDUCATION AND INSPECTIONS BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education and Inspections Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment of fees by local authorities to Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Education, Children's Services and Skills, and

(2) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

Question agreed to.

CHILDREN AND ADOPTION BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME) (NO. 2) BILL

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the Order of 2nd March 2006 (Children and Adoption Bill [Lords] (Programme)) be varied by the substitution in paragraph 2 (time for conclusion of proceedings in Standing Committee) for the words "Thursday 16th March 2006" of the words "Tuesday 21st March 2006".—[Mr. Cawsey.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Will hon. Members leave the Chamber by all possible means if they are not staying for the rest of the proceedings?

PETITIONS

Business Rates

7.32 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): This petition is from residents using Billericay high street, who are concerned that further above-inflationary increases in business rates are pushing up prices and will threaten some independent shops with closure.

The petitioners are concerned that those shops could be replaced by theme pubs and supermarkets, as has happened in neighbouring towns. The high street has a good balance between day and night trade at present, and residents and shopkeepers wish to keep it that way. They do not want to see the high street turned into a 'pub alley'.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to give Billericay shopkeepers some respite by halting any planned increases in business rates.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Free Residential Care

7.35 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): I wish to present the petition of Jean Weatheritt, a constituent of mine living in Oban court, Byker and others. The petition

Declares that free residential care should be made available to all who need it. The Petitioners further declare that the "Barnett formula" should be scrapped in order to ensure that free care is available to all, whether they live in England, Scotland or Wales.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for health to respond to the Petitioners concerns.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Asylum Seekers

7.35 pm

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester) (LD): I wish to present a petition from Winchester Voice for Refugees, which calls on the Government to allow asylum seekers whose claims have failed to work rather than just seeking benefits.

To lie upon the Table.

Pet Crematoria

7.36 pm

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I wish to present a petition signed by 3,868 people on behalf of the National Federation of Private Pet Crematoria, which opposes the classification, operation and licensing of pet crematoria as landfill sites.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to remove pet crematoria from the category of landfill sites.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Red Diesel Derogation

7.36 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of those calling for derogation for red diesel, signed by 1,015 narrow boat owners. A further 3,000 people asked to be associated with it. I pay particular tribute to the work of John "Stokie" Chard, who collected many of the signatures.

The Petition of narrow boat owners from the canals of the UK and others,

Declares its support for the continuation of the red diesel derogation currently available to marine owners in the UK which is due to expire on 31st December 2006; welcomes the decision announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the pre-budget statement of the intent to negotiate an extension of that derogation and notes that the Financial Secretary needs to take account of the impact any loss of the red diesel derogation would have on narrow boat owners given the technical problems that will result from the inevitable conversion of engines, and the costs of heating living space. At a time when there is a massive increase in activity on Britain's waterways and canals, a direct result of government investment and help, this would be totally counterproductive.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Financial Secretary to consult fully with representatives from the Royal Yacht Association and the British Marine Federation and boat owners in general in order to secure this derogation.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Older Drivers

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

7.38 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Many issues that Members bring to Parliament arise from constituency work, and this is one of them.

Three-year-old Amicie Onyema Nwokeochar was on the footpath outside a chip shop in Highfield road in my constituency at lunchtime on 15 November 2003 when a car mounted the pavement and ploughed into the chip shop. Tragically, Amicie died within one hour of being admitted to hospital as a result of massive chest trauma following a collision with the car. Amicie lived in the constituency of the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ruth Kelly), but he regularly visited his grandma Mrs. Carol Brooks, who lives just around the corner from the chip shop.

The car was driven by a man within a few weeks of his 90th birthday, who started driving before a driving test became compulsory under the Road Traffic Act 1934. He claimed that he had pressed the accelerator of his Honda Concerto car instead of the brake while parking. The driver was convicted on 27 May 2004 of driving without due care and attention, fined £1,000 and banned from driving for two years. A police officer who gave evidence in the coroner's court, which recorded a verdict of accidental death, said that the accident was probably aggravated by the medical condition of the elderly driver, who surrendered his licence voluntarily to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.

Due to an ongoing heart condition, the driver was unable to attend the coroner's court, so the coroner could not cross-examine him. There is a requirement that all those who have attained the age of 70 submit themselves for a medical examination every three years. Form D45, which is sent out automatically by the DVLA, contains questions about a driver's health. If the DVLA is told of any conditions, it may require that medical evidence be provided before a licence is renewed. However, that is not a rigorous test of ability to drive and Amicie's grandmother, Mrs. Carol Brooks, and the family's solicitor, Mr. Tim Woods of Carl Chapman & Co, whose offices are in my constituency, have requested that I campaign for compulsory cognitive tests to be brought in for older drivers. They believe that, at the very least, form D45 should be completed in the presence of a general practitioner who has known the driver for at least three years, and that the form should include a section enabling the GP to give a statement on the driver's ability to drive. In their opinion, evidence of a recent eyesight test should also be presented to the DVLA.

Mrs. Brooks and Mr. Woods believe that a person's ability to control the car that they actually drive should also be tested in some way. On 25 October 2005, The Times reported that too many older drivers in Torquay, a well-known retirement town, were hitting the accelerator rather than the brake and thereby causing accidents. Police Constable Chris Lancaster, Torbay's road safety officer, recommends that older drivers enrol on a roadfit scheme, which allows participants to take part in a one-hour observed driving exercise to check their ability to drive. I am not sure whether this is a local or national scheme, but it sounds like a good idea to me.

Two million people aged 70 or over now hold a driving licence, and that figure is likely to rise to 4.5 million by 2015. The biggest increase in older active licence-holders has been among older women. Between 1965 and 1985, there was a 200 per cent. increase in male drivers aged over 65, but a 600 per cent. increase in female drivers over that age. In 2004, 550 car accidents out of a total of 7,035 involving drivers aged over 70—about 8 per cent.—resulted in the driver being killed or seriously injured. Despite an increase in the number of older drivers, between 1979 and 1996 there was a significant fall—from 10 per cent. to 4.6 per cent.—in the number of male casualties aged 60 to 69. The number of male casualties aged 70 to 79 has also fallen, but there has been a modest increase in the number aged 80 or over.

Older drivers drive less than those in other age groups. The rate of motor vehicle crashes per mile driven is higher for the 70-plus age group than for middle-aged drivers, but only after the age of 85 does it reach or surpass the rate for younger drivers. However, older people are, unsurprisingly, over-represented in accidents involving death because of their increased frailty. They drive more slowly than other drivers and they cannot handle traffic conflict situations very well. The 60 to 69-year-old age group have a higher percentage of accidents at junctions in both rural and urban settings. They drive less at night due to deteriorating eyesight, and they have to be closer to signs to be able to read them.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend the Minister has heard me make this point before, but I will do so again now because it is very important. When I talked to my local group representing those who suffer from macular degeneration, which, sadly, is a common problem in older age, I was staggered to learn that, virtually to a person, they had volunteered to give up driving. There was no medical requirement for them so to do, even though they themselves felt unsafe when driving. Does my hon. Friend agree that something needs to be done about that?

Dr. Iddon: I certainly do, and that intervention underlines the message that my Adjournment debate is intended to give to my hon. Friend the Minister.

Older drivers are badly affected by the glare from oncoming headlights. The visual field shrinks significantly beyond the age of 75. They suffer commonly from muscle and joint stiffness, which affects their ability to turn their head or body in the car. They are less able to monitor their position in dense traffic, reverse safely or change lanes safely as a result. Reaction times are also slower for older people. Of course, many older drivers are far more experienced than younger drivers. Nevertheless, in their late 60s and 70s, older drivers' impairments seem to outweigh any advantages that they may have accumulated with their years of experience and more cautious behaviour, and combined with their increased frailty, they are beginning to meet more risks on the road. However, many older drivers are aware of that increased risk and avoid more dangerous situations such as driving at night or in dense traffic.

Older drivers are more likely to take medication that may affect their driving. There is reliable evidence that certain prescribed medicines increase the risk of a road traffic accident, especially for older drivers. Anxiolytics as a class—benzodiazepines, for example—produce up to a fivefold increase in risk. Sedation and drowsiness are associated with pain-killing medicines containing opiates and opioids, including over-the-counter products. How many doctors discuss those increased risks with their older patients? Although some doctors are reluctant to advise their patients on driving, an increase in litigation, in which they are held liable in the event of an accident for not having advised a patient to stop driving, should act as a caution.

Certain diseases, such as epilepsy and diabetes, carry with them an increased risk of accidents on the road. A combination of those risks, which is more likely to occur in an older person, produces a much higher risk. Heart disease, however, is a fairly rare cause of traffic accidents. In a study of 2,000 acute collapses at the wheel while driving that led to a police-reported accident involving personal injury, only 10 per cent. were shown to be caused by a heart attack and 7 per cent. by stroke, the rest being due to epilepsy or diabetic hypoglycaemia. Many older people recover well enough from strokes to enable them to drive again.

A given dose of alcohol results in a higher blood alcohol concentration in an older person because of the reduced water content of the blood compared with a younger person of similar weight and sex. Alcohol can also increase night blindness and sensitivity to glare. The prevalence of dementing disorders is estimated to be as high as 47 per cent. for those aged 85 or older. Individuals with dementia are twice as likely to be involved in an accident as non-demented older people.

Not all older drivers are dangerous, although some clearly are. I am reminded of the case of veteran driver Tom Soulby, who got a lot of publicity last year—his 100th year—when he complained that his GP was insisting that he stop driving, after 82 years. Legislating on the ground of age is discriminatory. Therefore, if we are to deal with the dangers that some older drivers present on the road, we need to ascertain their fitness to drive in a more sensible way than we do now.

There are measures that the Government can encourage to make older drivers safer on the road. The motor industry is beginning to think about the design of motor vehicles with older drivers in mind. Design features include hand-operated braking and acceleration controls, other easily operated controls and easily readable instrument panels, swivelling seats, higher roofs and step-in access with rising seats, sliding doors, intelligent night vision systems and even rear view cameras. We can expect to see advertisements in future aiming cars at the older driver, alongside the racy adverts that are clearly aimed at the younger driver. Some useful changes, such as satellite navigation and sensors in front and rear bumpers are already with us.

We should not forget that older people are more at risk as pedestrians than as drivers. In general, older drivers are a lot safer than younger drivers. In 2004, the number of 16 to 19-year-olds and their passengers killed on Britain's roads increased by 12 per cent., while the annual rate for all drivers fell—I am glad to say—by 8 per cent.

In late 2004, the DVLA commissioned an independent review to assess the effectiveness of the present medical licensing system. It believes, as my constituents do, that the existing rules are outdated and inadequate.Research commissioned by the DVLA has shown that the present system is widely abused, with only 10 per cent. of drivers with a notifiable condition admitting it on the D45 form that they return to the DVLA. Further reports in the early part of this year indicate that the DVLA is about to embark on a public consultation on proposals to require drivers over the age of 75 to take a fitness-to-drive test every five years. It is proposed that those drivers who have reached that age will be required to bear the cost of attending an assessment centre to complete a paper-based test designed to examine their fitness to drive. A draft EU directive may require drivers over the age of 70 to renew their driving licences every five years instead of every three years, as now.

My constituent Mrs. Carol Brooks, and her family's solicitor Mr. Tim Woods, have also asked me to look at the Motability scheme and the safety record of its drivers. This scheme was launched in 1977, following the introduction of the mobility allowance the previous year. Prior to that, only disabled drivers who could drive themselves received help with transport. Most were supplied with a small, blue, single-seat, three-wheeled motorised invalid trike, which was incapable of carrying any passengers.

According to a parliamentary answer of 13 June 2005, more than 30 motor manufacturers supply over 140,000 new vehicles to the scheme annually, thus giving 400,000 disabled people mobility. Of those who benefit from the scheme, 33 per cent. are not actually the drivers of the vehicle, and around 10 per cent. of the drivers who benefit from the scheme require special adaptations to the vehicle to enable them to drive safely and in comfort.

The point has been made to me by Mrs. Brooks that the scheme is extremely generous with respect to the choice of vehicle. In her opinion, a significant number of disabled older drivers are allowed to purchase quite powerful vehicles. Therefore, does my hon. Friend the Minister feel that there is adequate oversight of the scheme to ensure that the purchased vehicle is suited to the capabilities of the older disabled driver?

We cannot discriminate against older drivers, but the fact is that they become an increasing risk to themselves and other road users with advancing age. In my opinion, more can be done to minimise the risk—by the Government, through legislation, regulation and careful planning of the road network and its signage, and by the manufacturers of motor vehicles designed with older people in mind.

The evidence shows that we cannot leave older drivers to assess their own ability. Most are reluctant to give up the convenience of driving their own car, especially after a lifetime of motoring.

I look forward to my hon. Friend's response.

7.52 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) on securing this debate. This is not his only contribution to road safety: he is a doughty campaigner on road safety in general, and he has bent my ear about this matter for some time. He is quite right to do so; the case of Amicie Nwokeochar is tragic and very sad, and we have to learn from it.

As my hon. Friend said, Amicie's death was the result of an accident caused by a man who was nearly 90 years old and who was subsequently found guilty of careless driving. For obvious reasons, I shall not comment directly on the case, which raises some general matters of which account should be taken.

I agree with my hon. Friend that we should do everything that is reasonably possible to avoid any repetition of such a dreadful accident. That is why the Government take the matter at the heart of this debate, and the issue of road safety in general, so seriously. My hon. Friend was involved in the Second Reading debate of the Road Safety Bill just a few days ago. He will know that it contains various measures designed to help to reduce road traffic casualties. I very much welcomed his contribution to last week's debate.

None of us can avoid the ageing process. The way in which it affects our mobility and fitness to drive will, of course, vary from individual to individual, but it is understandable that many motorists should want to continue to drive for as long as they are physically and mentally able.

The ageing of the population is one of the major structural changes facing the UK. The safety implications of our wish to remain mobile and independent will come increasingly to the fore as life expectancy and the average age of the population rises. Sadly, that will also increase the potential for older drivers to be casualties in road crashes, not necessarily as the cause but as a victim. It is very important, therefore, that we carefully consider not only the safety of older drivers but their relationship with other road users.

The public have every right to be concerned where older drivers have been involved in or have been responsible for accidents. Such incidents are often tragic and the issues they raise must never be forgotten, but, compared with the general picture of road traffic casualties and their causes, they tend to be the exception.

A great deal of research has been conducted into the accident involvement of and casualty causation for older drivers. Studies have shown consistently that older drivers do not pose a significant excess risk of injury to other road users compared with drivers of other ages, particularly young drivers. My hon. Friend is also concerned about the rate of accidents caused by younger drivers.

The indications are that many older drivers tend to regulate themselves by driving lower mileages, and keep within their limitations by avoiding, or reducing their driving at, higher risk times such as rush hours, at night and in the winter. This research has also shown that older drivers, when involved in accidents, are themselves more likely to be injured than others.

In our view, the crucial factor is not age but the physical and mental fitness of the driver to drive competently and safely. Old age alone should not be a bar to driving; my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East would share that sentiment. A number of statutory requirements currently apply to older drivers. The present driver licensing system recognises that, after the age of 70, there is a greater likelihood that health will deteriorate in ways that might affect driving. Licences expire at that age and must be renewed every three years thereafter. At each renewal, applicants are required to answer questions about their health and eyesight and to certify that they meet the required standards.

There is a further legal requirement for drivers of any age to inform the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency if they become aware of the onset or worsening of any health condition that might affect their fitness to drive safely. Failure to do so is a serious offence. When such notification is received, the DVLA will make medical inquiries and reach a decision about future entitlement to drive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who is concerned about road safety, raised the issue of macular degeneration and related issues. The same rules apply to people suffering from macular degeneration as apply to any other eyesight condition. If it is shown that somebody suffers from macular degeneration, which they ought to indicate to the DVLA, the DVLA will be responsible for making sure that an appropriate eye examination is performed and a judgment is made about fitness to continue to drive.

Mr. Drew: The problem is that medical intervention should kick that off. I argue that, very often, doctors will not take the initiative and they leave it up to the individual.

Dr. Ladyman: I understand my hon. Friend's concern and I will say in a moment how we might address that. The process of self-declaration and other issues affecting competence to drive are exactly the same for macular degeneration as they are for any other condition that affects a person's eyesight.

In addition to self-declaration, the DVLA frequently receives notification of potentially unfit drivers from third parties, particularly the police, doctors or concerned relatives or friends. If someone wants to inform us confidentially that someone is unfit to drive, we are happy to receive that information.

We also aim to ensure that doctors are well informed about the relevance of certain medical conditions to driving, and they obviously have a role in advising patients whether they should continue to drive. The DVLA issues guidance to all GPs for that purpose, which includes advising people who suffer from macular degeneration. In addition, the General Medical Council has issued guidelines to advise doctors to inform the DVLA about unfit patients who may have failed to declare themselves. In other words, the GMC expects doctors to do what my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud suggests, although doctors are not required to do so by law.

Present driver licensing arrangements are based on the second EU directive on driving licences—91/439/EEC, for those hon. Members who want to dig it out and read it for themselves—which sets minimum standards of medical fitness for driving, and on the advice of the Secretary of State's six honorary medical advisory panels. The panels comprise eminent medical practitioners and medical scientists who are acknowledged experts in their field.

Eyesight is, of course, a crucial element in medical fitness to drive. All drivers, of whatever age, are required to demonstrate their ability to read a number plate from a distance of 20.5 m and to inform the DVLA if they are no longer able to do so. That long-standing test has been effective in determining whether those who wish to drive have adequate vision. It is easy for the police to conduct and it complies with the current visual standard for driving set out in the second EU directive.

If, after an investigation by the DVLA's medical advisers, a driver is found to be unfit, or if co-operation is withheld, his or her licence may be revoked. In some cases, a driver may also be required to re-sit a driving test. Courts, too, have powers to require someone to take a driving test if, following a motoring offence, they have reason to doubt the individual's competence to drive. Those arrangements have, in general, been found to work satisfactorily.

Although there is no denying the potential danger posed by older drivers where they are unfit on our roads, there is no justification on road safety grounds for depriving older people of the right to drive, providing they can satisfy the DVLA that they are medically fit to do so. From time to time, there will be isolated cases where drivers evade those checks and endanger themselves and others by driving when they should not do so, but it is not clear at present that more stringent measures, such as compulsory medical examinations, eye tests or additional driving tests, would be the best way forward. The Government's overall aim is to maintain a balance between freedom of movement for older drivers and road safety for everyone.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East said, in 2005 the DVLA appointed consultants to undertake a fundamental review of its medical driver licensing system. The review was commissioned because the current arrangements have been in place since the early 1970s and to take into account significant demographic changes, medical developments and changes in public expectation that have occurred since then. The review looked at all aspects of the process for declaring, evidencing and assessing medical fitness to drive across all age groups. Recommendations for change centred on better identifying those whose fitness to drive needs to be formally assessed by the DVLA and on improved assessment and monitoring of those cases.

In spite of press speculation about the possible introduction of cognitive and eyesight tests for drivers over the age of 75, as my hon. Friend has suggested again today, no decisions have yet been taken on the research findings. I can assure my hon. Friends that we will take account of their comments and views and the tragic case of Amicie when reaching those decisions. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East was correct to suggest that we have promised that, when we make those recommendations and decisions, there will be full consultation on them.

It is essential to find ways to help older people to drive safely for as long as they are fit to do so. That is being done in a number of ways, including with research into developing training, information, counselling and driving assessment and support tools for older drivers. The 16 mobility centres in the UK, which make up the Forum of Mobility Centres, provide invaluable advice for elderly and disabled motorists to enable them to make informed decisions about their mobility needs. Such information ranges from advice on car adaptations and vehicle access to the individual assessment of driving ability. The forum, which in England is grant funded by the Department for Transport, includes the Department's own mobility advice and vehicle information service. The mobility centres are also used by the DVLA to carry out assessments to inform medical fitness to drive decisions. I will also take into account the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East about the Motability scheme. I assure him that, when people approach the scheme, it gives them advice about whether they need to declare any particular medical condition. However, he makes some interesting suggestions about the range of vehicles that Motability provides.

A number of local authority schemes have been developed to improve older drivers' skills. The Driving Standards Agency's "Arrive Alive Classic" programme, which is aimed at older people's organisations, offers a wide range of relevant information for older drivers. We also encourage the establishment of refresher courses for older drivers who wish to brush up their driving skills.

Most recently, I was pleased to note the announcement by the Institute of Advanced Motorists of its intention to enter this market in 2006. I also welcome the institute's new advisory leaflet for older drivers "Staying Focused on Road Safety", which complements the Department's own "Drive On!" publication. The quality of information and variety of opportunities for assessment and training for older drivers are already quite impressive and expanding. As more drivers reach their later years and demand increases, I am sure that these services will make an even greater contribution to ensuring safe mobility for older drivers and improving road safety for the whole community.

My hon. Friend has raised some important issues that deserve close further examination. He has my assurance that I will ensure that his views are taken into account and that this issue is given the detailed examination that it deserves.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Eight o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 16 March 2006

The House met at half-past Ten o'clock

PRAYERS

The unavoidable absence of MR. SPEAKER having been announced, THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS took the Chair as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

School Transport

1. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Which categories of children attending the proposed trust schools she expects to be entitled to (a) free and (b) subsidised school transport. [58779]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): All children attending their nearest suitable maintained school receive free transport if the journey is over three miles, or over two miles for children under the age of eight. In future, primary pupils from low-income families will receive free transport if they live more than two miles from school. Secondary pupils from low-income families will receive free transport to any one of their three nearest suitable schools if the journey is between two and six miles.

Tony Baldry: Every day, a number of parents in Bicester exercising parental preference hire a coach to take their children to Marlborough school in Woodstock, which is more than six miles away. In a semi-rural area such as mine, people who wish to express parental preference can do so only if they pay for it, which is unfair for everyone. It is unfair for parents who cannot pay, and it is unfair for parents who have to pay to exercise preference. With respect, the Education and Inspections Bill will not change that situation.

Phil Hope: The Bill includes a number of important measures that will help families with transport. The cost of transport is a barrier, particularly for low-income families, which is why the Bill extends the entitlement to free school transport. There is a general duty on local authorities to assess all pupils' travel needs; local authorities' current focus is on 7 per cent. of pupils. When the new travel plans in the Bill—another measure for disadvantaged pupils against which, regrettably, Liberal Democrats voted last night—come into force more families will benefit from the opportunity for their children to attend the school of their choice.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): The Minister will know that the top 200 performing state schools have two factors in common: the lowest number of children receiving free school meals and the lowest number of children with statements. The bottom 200 state schools have the highest number of children receiving free school meals and the highest number of children with statements. Does the Minister agree that the grand objective of trust schools is to achieve a better social mix, not just in trust schools but across all schools?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the nature of social segregation in different schools. He will be pleased that the Bill, which will proceed to Committee in a few days' time, includes new measures to ensure that local admission forums measure free school meal allocations and, indeed, other allocations in schools. The forums and, indeed, the school adjudicator can measure and assess the problems described by my hon. Friend. Indeed, the schools commissioner will produce a report every two years to show what progress has been made in reducing those problems.

Science

2. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): If she will make a statement on the teaching of science in secondary schools. [58780]

3. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): If she will make a statement on the teaching of science in secondary schools. [58781]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): The chief inspector's latest annual report shows that the quality of science teaching and learning is good or better in nearly three quarters of secondary schools. We are improving that teaching and learning further by making the school science curriculum more engaging; improving teacher recruitment; providing more and better professional development; and introducing a new statutory entitlement to study science programmes leading to at least two GCSEs.

Mr. Crabb: I thank the Minister for her reply. Yesterday, the CBI warned of the erosion of core science and engineering skills in this country, describing the decline in the number of science graduates as a car crash in slow motion. Does the Minister agree that the situation will not be turned around without serious improvement in the quality of science teaching in British schools? When 40 per cent. of all chemistry lessons are taught by non-chemists, is it any wonder that the country is not producing enough 18-year-olds with a love of, or an interest in, science?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is quite right, as are the CBI and others, to identify the importance for the economy of high numbers of science understanding and science graduates. That is why, for example, the introduction of specialised diplomas with an emphasis on applied science in areas such as engineering is important and why we need to continue working, as he suggested, on the quality of teachers. It is reassuring that, whereas in 1997–98 we recruited 2,790 people to teacher training places for science, in 2004–05 the number increased to 3,460.

Mr. Lancaster: May I declare an interest, as recorded in the Register of Members' Interests? Given the Minister's previous answer, what message does she think is sent to our sixth-form science students when they discover during national science week that the chemistry department of the five-star Sussex university is to be closed?

Jacqui Smith: Like other higher education institutions, the University of Sussex is, rightly, an autonomous organisation. Students in the south-east will be reassured to know not only that the number of home full-time undergraduates studying chemistry has risen by 6 per cent. since 1999 but that the Higher Education Funding Council, working with the surrounding universities, particularly Reading, Southampton and Surrey, has already ensured that the places lost at Sussex will be provided at those other universities.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I, for one, am very grateful for the extensive work that we have done to renew science facilities in schools. However, the reality is that the number of young women who are entering engineering apprenticeships is pitifully low, because we do not have sufficient resources aimed at promoting and taking women into work. What will my right hon. Friend do to address that very low figure and try to improve the number of women going into engineering apprenticeships?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend has a strong background in this area and has pushed me on numerous occasions on precisely that issue. There is the work that I know that she supported in respect of women in science and engineering, the task of ensuring that there are role models for young people, the introduction of the specialised engineering diploma that I mentioned previously and the task of ensuring that, as we improve information, advice and guidance for young people, we enable, for example, young women to undertake taster courses in areas such as engineering so that they realise that engineering is not only something for them, but needs their talents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Perhaps this is the moment to remind the House that the questions are about science in secondary schools.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The Department's own research has pointed to a crisis in specialist physics and chemistry teachers in deprived areas in particular. The Institute of Physics has called on the Government to adopt recruitment targets in the individual sciences rather than science as a whole. Why have they not done that?

Jacqui Smith: I refer the hon. Lady to the figures that I gave previously, which show that the Government have made considerable progress in increasing recruitment to initial teacher training of science teachers. I also refer her to the important work—the £51 million project—being carried out jointly by the Government and the Wellcome Trust to develop science learning centres around the country, which are contributing to the continuing professional development of science teachers throughout the country.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In the science curriculum in mainstream British secondary schools from September, creationism is to be taught alongside Darwin's theory of evolution. Does the Minister welcome that, as students should understand the context in which scientific ideas arise and reinterpretation of empirical evidence can generate scientific controversy?

Jacqui Smith: In fact, neither creationism, nor intelligent design are taught as subjects in schools and they are not specified in the programme of study for the science curriculum. In fact the national curriculum for science clearly sets out that pupils should be taught that the fossil record is evidence for evolution and that that is a fact. As my hon. Friend identifies, there will be opportunities, perhaps in RE lessons or in science, to consider scientific controversy and the issue of creationism may come up in that context, but it is not, of course, a factual element of the science curriculum.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): In the spirit of the consensus that was developed yesterday, I thought that, together, we might tackle science teaching in our schools. One of the unforeseen consequences of the Conservative Government's making science compulsory was the proliferation of the double science award GCSE, which is now almost universal in the state sector and likely to remain so even with the Minister's reforms. For someone going on to study three sciences at A-level, that means a reduction of a third in the amount of science that he or she studies at GCSE. Does she agree that we need much better science teaching in our comprehensives and far more students studying the three separate sciences at GCSE?

Jacqui Smith: I was not so involved in the consensus yesterday that the hon. Gentleman is talking about—[Interruption.] I voted for the Second Reading of our Labour Bill, yes—[Interruption.] And Conservatives voted for a Labour Bill, as well.

It is important that we ensure, in the way in which science is taught, particularly at key stage 4, that we provide our young people with both the knowledge and the enthusiasm to continue to study science at a later stage. That is why one of the things that we voted for yesterday was an entitlement for every pupil to study at least two science GCSEs. Part of the way in which that entitlement will be represented in schools will include the study of three separate science subjects. I am confident that, whether we are talking about the science and advanced science option, or the three single science options, that will provide young people with the knowledge and enthusiasm to carry on studying science at a later stage in greater numbers.

Trust Schools

4. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many trust schools she expects to be established over the next four years. [58782]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): There are no targets for the number of trust schools to be established in the next four years. This is about schools making decisions that are right for them and their children in order to raise standards. It will be for individual schools to decide whether they want to acquire a trust, what form that trust should take, and how the trust will help to improve outcomes for pupils.

Mr. Prentice: Given that the Conservative party will try to amend the Bill to take it back to its White Paper stage and encourage the development of independent trust schools, is it not as plain as a pikestaff—I say this gently to my right hon. Friend—that this legacy legislation is completely dead in the water?

Ruth Kelly: No. I thought for a moment that I was going to agree with my hon. Friend on something, but sadly not. I can assure the House that I will never compel a school to become a trust school, although it should be an option for a local authority, where a school is failing, to look at whether a trust is one way in which it could raise standards. The Labour party does not agree with the Conservative party, which in the minority report of the Education and Skills Committee insisted that all schools should be compelled to become trust schools.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Rob Wilson.

Hon. Members: Ah!

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): I have a slightly different question. As more and more schools become independent trusts with additional freedoms over recruitment and pay, what does the Secretary of State think the implications will be for the teaching trade unions?

Ruth Kelly: I did wonder when I read the minority report whether the hon. Gentleman and his friends had really understood the proposals, and now I am confirmed in the fact that they do not. There is nothing in the proposals on trusts, or indeed in the White Paper, that gives trust schools additional freedom or flexibility on teachers' pay. Teachers' pay will still be set in exactly the framework of terms and conditions, set nationally and negotiated with the teacher unions, that community schools follow now.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): May I help my right hon. Friend with the question of what is as plain as a pikestaff? It is as plain as a pikestaff that any incoming Government of a party political complexion different from ours can change whatever they like in education—that is the truth of the matter. Can we just concentrate on the question about the partnerships of trusts that can be of great benefit to schools? There is already a track record of very good relationships with foundations and outside partners that are good for the schools, good for the students and good for the future of education. Can we not nail the myth that partnership is bad and an inward-looking school is good? That is not the case.

Ruth Kelly: I completely agree with my hon. Friend that schools should be looking outward to their communities, looking to establish deep and lasting partnerships, both with other schools and indeed with external partners, such as universities, FE colleges and business foundations, where they can make a difference to raising standards for their pupils. That is precisely what the trust school proposal in last night's Education and Inspections Bill was about.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): There is a slight flavour of the morning after the night before, and I detect that a squabble about paternity has already broken out. May I assure the Secretary of State that we will be very responsible in our approach to raising and encouraging trust schools, which have now been given birth to? I realise that she does not like giving predictions, but will she at least consider offering some encouragement to schools to become trust schools—it is, after all, a policy that has now had widespread support on both sides of the House?

Ruth Kelly: The best encouragement for schools to become trust schools is to see what works. To see that, one has only to talk to head teachers, who already work with foundations and trusts, who can explain what difference that makes to pupils and to raising standards in their schools. It is my view that the more schools see that working in practice, the more will be interested in trusts, but it is right to have a voluntary approach because in the end head teachers know best what is in the interests of raising standards.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that further work needs to be done on defining the risks that might be encountered by small primary schools in converting alone to a trust model? The evidence of foundation status and, before that, grant-maintained status in my constituency indicates that there are significant risks that governing bodies may not be aware of at the time.

Ruth Kelly: I know that my hon. Friend has deep concerns about the matter, and many in the House were scarred by the experience of grant-maintained schools, but I can give him the assurance that the trust school model is the antithesis of the grant-maintained school model, in that trusts remain as local authority-maintained schools, where local authorities are responsible for the financial control and for ensuring adequate financial controls in schools—indeed, they fund the schools and can withdraw the delegated funding where they consider that there is an issue to resolve, as well as being responsible for ensuring adequate standards.

Trust Schools

5. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What discussions she has had with voluntary and charitable organisations on the implementation of her policy on trust schools. [58783]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Both the Prime Minister and I have held a number of discussions with a range of stakeholders about the opportunities that trusts can offer. These stakeholders have included schools, local authorities, business foundations, and charitable and voluntary organisations. All these organisations may have much to offer in raising standards and improving outcomes, especially for pupils in our most disadvantaged areas.

Mr. Turner: May I assure the Secretary of State that the Conservative-led Isle of Wight council, which inherited from 20 years of Liberal Democrat control an education system that even the Liberal Democrats admitted was failing, is looking with enthusiasm on trust schools as a means of reversing that failure? Will she assure me that the regulation-making powers contained in the Bill, particularly in clauses 7, 8, 12, 17, 19, 22, 24 and 25 will be used with a light touch so as not to put off charities and other organisations offering trust status to schools?

Ruth Kelly: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. We want a light-touch system. Where a school considers it to be in its interest to acquire a trust, it should have the opportunity to do that. That will help the school deepen its existing partnerships with its specialist schools relationships, and enable schools to build federations and collaboratives of schools working together to raise standards, which is particularly important in the light of our commitment to enable every young person from the age of 14 to study vocational education—yet again, a measure delivered by the Education and Inspections Bill.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend clarify the position with regard to schools that choose not to go down the trust route? Can she give us an assurance that they will not be disadvantaged in any way? She said that the private sector would support schools. Will she state that legislation will be drawn up to ensure that that will not be used to privatise schools?

Ruth Kelly: I can certainly give my hon. Friend those assurances. It will be laid down in legislation that trusts must be charities operating on a not-for-profit basis and overseen by the Charity Commission, as well as the local authority. In no sense will schools outside the trust school regime be disadvantaged by not being trust schools. They will be funded on exactly the same basis as any other local school, in both revenue and capital terms—yet again, a sharp contrast with the GM school policy operated by the Conservatives when they were in government.

FE Colleges (Dorset)

6. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): What assessment she has made of the level of staff salaries at colleges of further education in the Dorset area; and if she will make a statement. [58784]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): No such assessment has been made. Colleges of further education are autonomous institutions that negotiate pay and conditions with staff and their unions, without Government involvement nationally or locally.

Mr. Ellwood: I am grateful for that reply, but not for the answer itself. Colleges are waiting for a response. The Minister is aware of my concerns about education funding in Bournemouth in general. My question is specifically to do with the fact that staff salaries at further education colleges, such as Bournemouth and Poole college, are often significantly lower than those of staff teaching the same subjects in a school. I know that the Government have taken some initiatives, but as long as teachers are receiving £2,000 a year more at a school than at further education colleges, colleges will be unable to compete in recruiting and retaining staff—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is over-lengthy.

Bill Rammell: Let me be clear that negotiations are a matter for colleges and the trade unions. No college in the country would thank the Government for intervening directly on the issue. It all comes back to funding. Since 1997 the Government have increased funding to the further education sector by 48 per cent. in real terms, which compares favourably with the 14 per cent. real-terms cut that took place in the five years running up to 1997. We envisage that with those increased resources, greater flexibility as regards their use and a longer-term funding framework, colleges should be able to address the structural barriers—

Mr. Ellwood: That was 14 years ago.

Bill Rammell: It was, but we must compare like with like. The calls for higher pay from the Conservatives carry no credibility. They never delivered the resources when they were in power, and they would not do so if they got the chance again.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I remind my hon. Friend that FE salaries in Dorset and elsewhere suffered a pay freeze and therefore a real-terms cut during the 1990s. When the funding gap is closed, as he has promised in this House, the issue of staff salary differentials, which the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) has described, should be dealt with, too.

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for his question and know that he takes these issues very seriously. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the way in which we are reducing the funding gap between further education colleges and school sixth forms at the Association of Colleges conference back in October, the announcement was widely welcomed by the FE sector. We have made it clear that the gap will be reduced by 5 per cent. in the coming financial year, and it will be reduced by a further 3 per cent. in the following year. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not enough"] I can hear Conservative Members, but if they are committed to cutting public spending, they need to say where they would find the funds.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): I want to restore the glorious outbreak of harmony between Front Benchers on education reform. I agree with both my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) and the Minister that we need to increase academic pay in FE and HE. Does the Minister agree that it is bizarre that the Liberal Democrats should oppose any reform that involves variable fees and yet at the same time support a strike by FE teachers in Dorset and elsewhere, the explicit purpose of which is that academics should have a larger share of the fees? Is not that position completely absurd and due to be overturned?

Bill Rammell: Now I am very confused. Conservative Back Benchers are calling for increased pay, but the shadow Minister has said that we should not support increased pay. The one thing that I agree with him on is that Liberal Democrat policy on higher education is completely untenable.

Special Educational Needs

7. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What steps she is taking to reduce the time involved in statementing pupils with special needs in schools. [58785]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): Following our 2004 special educational needs strategy—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): He did not hear me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has a reputation for sedentary interventions, but I would appreciate a lower decibel level.

Bill Rammell: I take it that my hon. Friend's remark was not directed at me.

Following our 2004 special educational needs strategy, we established a team of SEN advisers. It has been working with local authorities to help them meet their statutory duties and has targeted authorities showing poor performance in getting statements completed on time, which has led to a significant improvement in performance.

Dr. Cable: The Minister will be aware of the enormous frustration faced by many parents who are trying to get rapid and satisfactory statementing. What assurances can he give me that the situation will not deteriorate for children statemented into the mainstream sector when schools become more independent and may be less inclined to provide support arrangements for special needs children in the school of their first choice?

Bill Rammell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his question and know that he takes a detailed interest in the issue. I assure him that all maintained schools, including trust schools, are under a duty after being consulted to admit children whose statements name their school, so the policy is clear and categorical. On top of that, the framework includes early intervention and advice through SEN co-ordinators, which has led to a significant improvement in performance—an increase of some 10 percentage points in the proportion of statements that are dealt with within the statutory time limit of 18 weeks in the five years running up to 2005. That is what the parents of children with special educational needs want to see happen, and we are making sure that it does.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Parents of autistic children are interested in special needs statements, as well as in what provision exists in schools. Will my hon. Friend carry out a national audit of provision for autistic children in our schools, as the situation is very patchy? Will he issue a statement on what LEAs are doing, given that some provide more than others and some provide more in some parts of their area than in others?

Bill Rammell: I believe that looking at best practice and seeing how we can spread that right across the country is the way forward. We do, from time to time, receive calls for radical reappraisals and reviews. That would not be the right way forward. We need to ensure that we get it right on the ground by improving early intervention, building the skills base within our schools to deal with special educational needs, bringing special and mainstream schools closer together and, in particular, improving multi-agency working.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I hear what the Minister says, but there is a great deal of concern about statementing. The system is not working properly at the moment. Only last week, I met a group of parents in my constituency who expressed their concerns about statementing and the inclusion in mainstream schooling of children with autism and Asperger's syndrome. Schools cannot cope, and the parents did not feel that the action being taken was appropriate. Will the Minister share with the House his thoughts on why Government figures show that the number of children with special educational needs, but no statement, has increased? Does he agree that the time has come for a review of how statementing, and indeed inclusion, work to support this important and vulnerable group of children?

Bill Rammell: This group of vulnerable children is at the forefront of our thinking as we develop policy. Since we introduced our SEN strategy, "Removing Barriers to Achievement", in 2004, there has been a tangible and significant improvement in performance. On the key criterion of the percentage of statements without exceptions that are drafted within the 18-week target, performance has risen from 82 per cent. to 92 per cent. in the five years running up to 2005. That is significant evidence that we are improving performance.

Adult Education

9. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): How many adult education courses have closed at colleges in England in the last 12 months; and if she will make a statement. [58787]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): We do not collect details of individual course changes centrally. However, our priorities for adult learning are outlined in the Learning and Skills Council's strategy document, "Priorities for Success". They are: support for adults who lack basic skills; support for adults who lack the level 2 platform of skills for employability; ensuring opportunities for developing level 3 skills; and safeguarding adult opportunities for personal and community development. We expect provision to be realigned to meet those priorities, and colleges, as independent bodies, will decide which courses they choose to run.

Tom Brake: The Minister will be aware that the Association of Colleges estimates that some 200,000 courses will be lost by the end of this year. The LSC document to which he refers estimates that by 2008 some 500,000 further education courses will be lost. Does he accept that not only Australian cake decorating courses will be scrapped or have their fees increased, as he suggested, but vital courses for people with severe learning disabilities, as well as people who are seeking to re-skill mid-career?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on his last point. We expect the amount of funding to support adult participation in learning to remain about the same at some £2.8 billion to £2.9 billion, but we are reprioritising where that money is to go in line with the skills gaps that, for example, Lord Leitch's interim report identified. The number of adult places on courses contributing directly to those priorities might reduce. However, some 274,000 additional level 2 places will be created through our new train to gain programme—a £630 million programme over the next two years to deliver training of the kind that employers need through a demand-led system. I might add that some colleges—for example, City College Brighton and Hove—has expanded participation while increasing its fee income, so it can be done.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): When my hon. Friend said that we do not collect numbers, does he mean that we have no idea of how many adults take educational courses at FE colleges? If so, I would be amazed, given the benefits to our nation of adults going back to FE colleges. They not only improve their skills, albeit sometimes at a basic level, thus contributing to their reskilling and re-employment, but make a major contribution to the country. I am surprised that we do not have our eye on the ball.

Phil Hope: The question was about the number of adult education courses, not adult education learners. We collect figures on learners, as I said in an earlier response. The number of adult education courses is a matter for local colleges to determine. My hon. Friend is right that we have a skills gap that needs to be filled—Lord Leitch spelled that out in his interim report; the full report will be published later this year. Indeed, our FE White Paper, which we shall publish in the near future, spells out the importance of skills for the future success of our economy and the important role that FE plays as one of the economic drivers of social mobility and economic success in this country.

Trust Schools

10. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): What powers new trust schools will have beyond those already available to foundation schools. [58788]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Trust schools build on the existing foundation school model and will be empowered to make decisions about their buildings and staff needs. The specific opportunity that trust schools have compared with the majority of foundation schools is the ability to benefit from a lasting relationship with external partners, who will provide new opportunities for collaboration and support for leadership, teaching and learning in the school.

Mr. Hands: As was said in yesterday's debate, my constituency has one of the country's fastest growing rates of independent school attendance. Will the Minister view it as one of the key indicators of the success of the new trust schools that the rate of parents who opt out of the system in a constituency such as mine is decreasing rather than increasing?

Jacqui Smith: It has never been the Government's objective to get more young people and families to opt out of the state school system. Our objective is to draft in support for state school pupils from wherever we can get it to ensure that we are confident that all children, whatever their background, get the high standard of education that they deserve.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Several schools in my constituency have shown an interest in and willingness to look at trust and foundation school status. However, some say that we already have such partnerships and are already venturing into the outside world. I believe that those partnerships are not as deep or extensive as those that trust school status would bring to schools. Such status will offer many more opportunities. What is my right hon. Friend's view on that?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The trust school model is aimed precisely at building on the good experience in our system of the past eight years, such as the contribution that external partners make to the specialist school movement and the way in which schools are beginning to collaborate for the benefit of their pupils. However, as my hon. Friend rightly says, those collaborations are too often dependent on the enthusiasm and commitment of dedicated individuals. If they move on, the collaboration is often unable to continue. The ability to embed such collaboration, make it permanent and bring in external support is one of the key benefits of the trust school model.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): Will the Minister confirm that, when a trust school is established, it will be wholly responsible for all the maintenance commitments on the school site? Will the trust have the right to dispose of the school's assets when the local authority currently holds the freehold?

Hon. Members: Read the Bill.

Jacqui Smith: And read my speech from yesterday, in which I spelled out the provisions for ensuring that, although the assets of a trust school, like those of foundation schools, will be vested in the trust, there are also considerable provisions governing the disposal of assets. They are aimed at protecting publicly funded assets so that, to dispose of them, the trust would need to inform in advance the local authority, which would be in a position to agree a share of the proceeds or alternative use. If a school broke its link with a trust, the assets would revert to the school or, in the case of closure, the local authority.

Child Protection

11. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): If she will include paid children's entertainers working in private homes in her list of those barred from working with children following conviction for sexual offences against children. [58789]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): All those who are on the children's barred list, as defined by the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, will be barred from any work that involves frequent teaching, training, supervising, caring for, advising or providing treatment for a child. This will include children's entertainers who are engaged in such activities. Parents will be able to check the barred status of individuals whom they employ to perform those activities.

David Tredinnick: I have already presented a petition to the Home Office from thousands of my constituents about the activities of a professional child entertainer who was working in the Hinckley area. He was, and is, on the sex offenders register, but because he goes to people's homes rather than to schools he does not have to be vetted or have a licence. He has subsequently moved to another part of the county following press reports, and I understand that he is now working there, having changed the name of his company. Will the Minister give us an assurance that the measures that she has just described will cover this situation? Does not she think that it is time that such individuals were properly licensed?

Jacqui Smith: I have just outlined the strengthened provisions that will come into operation following the enactment of the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill. Those provisions make it clear that any individual who is involved in frequent teaching, training, supervising, caring for, advising or providing treatment for a child will be able to be monitored under the new scheme. Parents will also be able to check the individual circumstances of the people who are engaged in that work. That represents a strengthening of the present position.

Child Care

12. Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): What range of options the Government expect to be available for child care. [58790]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): The number of child care places has doubled from 600,000 in 1997 to more than 1.2 million in 2005, supported by investment of more than £17 billion of public funding. This enables parents to choose from a wide range of options, including child minders, nursery care, and out-of-school and holiday provision. We are building on this further by offering high quality child care through extended schools and, in disadvantaged areas, through children's centres.

Ms Johnson: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that response. Will the provisions of the Childcare Bill that place a statutory duty on local authorities to ensure sufficient child care places be matched by the necessary funding arrangements, so that families in my constituency will see the materialisation of extra child care places that they can afford?

Beverley Hughes: My hon. Friend is right. The provision in the Childcare Bill of a duty on local authorities to ensure that there is sufficient child care involves not only a sufficient quantity but a sufficient range and flexibility of child care to meet local parents' needs. That will have to be part of a local authority's obligations. Of course, that does not mean that the local authorities themselves will provide that child care, but they will have sufficient resources to stimulate the market and ensure that it responds with the quantity and range of provision that local parents need.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): With 100,000 under-threes now in full-time nurseries, is the Minister concerned at the rising number of very young children—some as young as three months old—who spend all week in these full-time institutions, sometimes for up to 60 hours?

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Gentleman is being unnecessarily alarmist. There is clear research evidence that high quality early-years experience for three and four-year-old children considerably enhances their development and, in comparison to their peers who do not have that experience, gives them a considerable advantage at the start of their primary school education. Clearly, many parents of younger children will want a range of options. That is why, in addition to stimulating the provision of good quality child care, this Government—unlike the previous Conservative Government—have made it possible for mothers and fathers who are balancing their work and home life to make the decisions that they feel are right about where their very young children should be cared for.

Youth Facilities (Stoke-on-Trent)

13. Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to improve facilities and increase the availability of activities for teenagers in Stoke-on-Trent. [58791]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): The current Education and Inspections Bill will require local authorities to secure access for young people to educational and recreational leisure time activities, as proposed in the "Youth Matters" Green Paper and yet another progressive measure that the Liberal Democrats voted against last night. Our next steps document, published this month, also provided extra resources for young people to put spending power directly into their hands through the youth opportunity and youth capital funds. Those funds will be worth more than £593,000 in Stoke-on-Trent over the next two financial years.

Mr. Flello: My hon. Friend will no doubt be aware of the excellent work already done by many local voluntary groups working with young people in my city. One of the best ways in which my hon. Friend could help with that work would be to visit my constituency. Has he any plans to do so in the near future?

Phil Hope: I am very grateful for the invitation. Given that the programme motion was passed last night, I will probably have a little more time to do so after 18 May. Empowering young people through offering such resources and facilities is at the heart of our policy on youth matters. What is crucial is that young people have a voice, a chance to be heard and a real influence over the decisions of organisations, voluntary and statutory, that affect their lives.

Social Behaviour

14. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If she will bring forward an option for local authorities to give the same priority to teaching social behaviour in primary schools as is given to numeracy and literacy; and if she will make a statement. [58792]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Teaching social behaviour helps children learn. That is why we have made the social and emotional aspects of learning programme available to all primary schools. Heads are best placed to decide how that work should be organised in their schools, but they have the flexibility to allocate dedicated time, as part of the recommended whole-curriculum approach.

Mr. Allen: Will my right hon. Friend thank her departmental officials and the local education authority team, led by Edwina Grant, in Nottingham, for the innovative work that they are doing on the promotion of social behaviour in the city? Will my right hon. Friend consider the very first amendment to the Education and Inspections Bill, which suggests that local education authorities should have a duty to promote the emotional well-being and pro-social behaviour of every child? I hope that I have got the words right: I should have done, because I tabled the amendment.

Jacqui Smith: I will of course look in great detail at my hon. Friend's amendment. I am also happy to praise the work of my officials and of Nottingham local authority, as well as that of my hon. Friend, who has pushed hard the approach to social behaviour as an opportunity for children, young people and families in Nottingham. I am looking with great attention at the way in which that exciting innovation will work in Nottingham and more widely.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am sure that the Minister will agree—she said so, to all intents and purposes, in her answer—that good discipline and good social behaviour can contribute to the ability of young people to learn better in schools. What support do schools get from parents? Does she agree that the support of parents is essential, and what can the Government do to encourage parents to support good social behaviour?

Jacqui Smith: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. That is why, in the Education and Inspections Bill, we responded to the calls from teacher associations to make clear teachers' unambiguous legal right to discipline. The hon. Gentleman is also correct about parental responsibility, and the Bill will also extend the ability of schools to engage in parenting contracts with parents before the child or young person is excluded from school. Both those factors are important to ensuring that our teachers are able to teach, our children are able to learn, and parents take responsibility for their children's behaviour—all things that the Liberal Democrats voted against yesterday.

Looked-after Children

15. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to improve the educational attainment of looked-after children. [58793]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): The educational attainment of looked-after children is far from acceptable, and we intend to consult shortly on proposals to transform outcomes for that group of children. Building on the new duty on local authorities to promote the educational attainment of looked-after children, we will also propose, in the Education and Inspections Bill, to help those children to get into the right schools in order to meet their needs. We will enable local authorities to direct school admission authorities to admit looked-after children at any time, not just at the beginning of the school year, and even when the school is already full.

Stephen Pound: I am grateful for that answer, and all the more delighted that I voted for the Bill last night.

My right hon. Friend will be aware that nationally only 1 per cent. of looked-after children go to university. In the London borough of Ealing, owing in no small part to the inspirational leadership of Judith Finlay, the figure is 11 per cent. May I seek to tempt my right hon. Friend to visit the London borough of Ealing when, shortly, we are to open a one-stop shop to provide looked-after children with education, social welfare and benefit advice? Sadly, it will be a few metres outside my constituency—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I seek to tempt the hon. Gentleman to be more concise in his questions? I hope that the same will apply to the Minister's answer.

Beverley Hughes: It would be taking a rather dangerous path to succumb to temptation from my hon. Friend, but he is absolutely right. One of the aspects of educational attainment that we want to improve is further and higher education for looked-after children. As my hon. Friend says, Ealing has made considerable progress in supporting young people from care to higher education through subsistence and the drop-in centre to which he referred, and a package of support for those going to university. Those are exactly the kinds of innovation that we are exploring, and I shall be very pleased if I can go to Ealing and observe them in practice.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Witness Support

21. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What steps the Crown Prosecution Service takes to support vulnerable witnesses in court proceedings. [58771]

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): The Crown Prosecution Service can apply to the court to allow vulnerable witnesses to give evidence via a televised link or from behind a screen, or to withhold their personal details. The court may of course refuse the application.

Ms Keeble: Hate crimes have been a problem in my area, especially homophobic attacks. If the courts and the CPS cannot establish certainty, vulnerable witnesses may find themselves in a court without a screen, or in a court that is unsafe because of the layout and the furniture. A defendant may discharge his lawyer and, in effect, use the courtroom to continue to harass the vulnerable witness. Will my hon. and learned Friend examine the position, especially in relation to hate crimes?

The Solicitor-General: I will certainly do so. However, it is open to the CPS, under section 36 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, to prevent the accused from personally cross-examining a witness. The court must be satisfied that the quality of evidence given by a witness under cross-examination is likely to be diminished if the cross-examination is conducted by the accused, that it may be improved if the accused does not cross-examine the witness, and that it would not be contrary to the interests of justice to restrict cross-examination by the accused.

There are a number of provisions and conditions, but it is possible that the courts have the power to which my hon. Friend refers. As she knows to her cost, however, benches sometimes decide not to use some of the powers that they could use, such as the power to provide screens. It is important for the courts to realise how vulnerable witnesses often feel in such circumstances.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have got off to a very slow start. We shall not give hon. Members a chance if we do not have shorter questions and shorter answers.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): In the courts where I sit, one of the big problems occurs in domestic violence cases when, for one reason or another—fear, perhaps—women do not turn up. Does the Solicitor-General recognise that problem? It costs a good deal of money. Can more be done to strengthen the position of such women?

The Solicitor-General: There has been a considerable problem with domestic violence cases. There have been pilot schemes in Caerphilly and Croydon to establish whether non-lawyer advocates can work with domestic violence victims and witnesses, take them through the criminal justice system, and ensure that they are relieved of at least some of the stress of giving evidence—although the experience is always likely to be stressful.

Crown Prosecution Service

22. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): What steps he is taking to improve liaison between victims of crime and the Crown Prosecution Service. [58772]

The Solicitor-General: A new code of practice for victims and witnesses is due to come into force on 3 April that sets out responsibilities towards victims, witnesses and bereaved relatives. Breaches of the obligations can, if unresolved through a complaints procedure, be referred to the parliamentary ombudsman. The Attorney-General has also recently published the prosecutors pledge to victims of crime.

Keith Vaz: My hon. and learned Friend will know that the first full performance review of the CPS was published on Tuesday. It showed that performance was less than good in more than half of CPS areas and that in most there was a failure to communicate with victims of crime—to tell them that charges had either been dropped or reduced. Those are damning criticisms of the CPS. What steps is my hon. and learned Friend going to take to ensure that the Director of Public Prosecutions is aware of these failings—and what is the CPS going to do to get its act together?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman did well to pause at that moment.

The Solicitor-General: The overall assessment of the recent analysis was that three CPS areas were "excellent", 16 were "good", 19 were "fair" and four were "poor". So some 45 per cent. of CPS areas are either "excellent" or "good", and 90 per cent. are for the most part complying with relevant standards satisfactorily. The inspectorate also said:

"we are confident that the performance generally across the CPS is improving."

A lot of good work has already been undertaken in the past year through the charging programme, the "No Witness, No Justice" programme and the effective trial management programme. We predict that by December 2007, due to the steps that we are taking, 12,000 more trials will go ahead per year than do so currently.

Murder

23. David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Home Secretary on changes to the way murder is prosecuted. [58773]

The Solicitor-General: The Law Commission is dealing with the first stage of a review of the law on murder, and the Law Officers have had discussions with the Home Secretary and other Ministers. The Law Commission, which is of course an independent body, has issued a consultation paper containing provisional proposals. The Government will await the final proposals before taking a view on them.

David T.C. Davies: Can the Solicitor-General assure us that, whatever the outcome of the review, the most serious forms of murder will continue to carry a mandatory life sentence? Can he further assure us that from now on, a mandatory life sentence will mean that the person in question spends the rest of their life behind bars, rather than spending several years watching Sky television before being set free to continue a campaign of violence against the innocent populace?

The Solicitor-General: If the hon. Gentleman had listened when the review was announced, he would know that the Home Secretary made it clear that the mandatory life sentence for murder will indeed remain. The murder principle set out in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 will also remain. The Government passed that Act to ensure effective sentencing principles in dealing with murder cases, which, I have to say—given the way in which the hon. Gentleman asked his question—his party singularly failed to do when in power.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Does the Solicitor-General agree that it is far better to respond to the Law Commission's proposals in the rational and measured way that it made them, than in the histrionic manner that we just heard from the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies)? The Law Commission has made it clear that the law is in a mess, that it is not saying and doing what the public think it is, and that it needs reform. The best way to get reform is to have a rational debate and to build consensus. Will the Solicitor-General commend the Law Commission's very sensible proposals?

The Solicitor-General: The proposals are out for consultation and will remain so for only a few more weeks, so I suggest that the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies)—who asked the "histrionic" question, as the hon. Gentleman put it—respond to that consultation and make their respective views known. The proposals, provisional as they are, are very important and will doubtless change the law on murder in due course, although we have yet to take a final view. It is important that Members take the opportunity to make their views known to that independent body.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Solicitor-General will be aware that the Law Commission proposes that, although first-degree murder would continue to carry the mandatory life sentence, second-degree murder—which could involve killing a person when the intent is to commit grievous bodily harm of the most serious kind—would not. Does the Minister think that it might be useful for the review also to look at how fixed-term sentences are passed, and at the disparity between what the judge says in court and the sentence that is in fact served? The public need greater reassurance that fixed-term sentences mean what they say and approximate to the period that a person might serve in prison. Would it not be possible to provide that reassurance by making it clear that the mandatory sentence was not always necessary? People latch on to the mandatory sentence because they do not have confidence in the current sentencing system.

The Solicitor-General: I suspect that the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) and other Back-Bench Opposition Members may take that inquiry as something of a rebuke for the way he asked his original question. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is right that it is important that we consider these matters with a degree of calm and ensure that the public have confidence in the sentences that are passed. The Law Commission is looking at how such matters should be dealt with. We must await the outcome of that, but the Government are discussing how to ensure that people understand better precisely what a sentence passed by a judge will mean in practice for each defendant. There are ways to achieve that, but we must approach the matter through a process of consultation and not by making announcements here. However, I take on board the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

Identity Theft

24. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Pursuant to his oral answer of 9 February 2006, Official Report, column 1003, on identity theft, what response he has received from Home Office Ministers. [58774]

The Solicitor-General: I understand that the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), who deals with policy on identity fraud, has written to the hon. Lady on this matter. I have seen the letter, and I have also further discussed with him my concerns about the case that she raises. He has agreed to meet her and her constituent to discuss the matter.

Miss McIntosh: It is a very simple question: under what circumstances will identity fraud be investigated and prosecuted? Does the Solicitor-General agree that data protection should not be used an excuse for not conducting an investigation?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Lady needs to raise this issue with my hon. Friend at the Home Office and, in due course, with Royal Mail. I share some of her concerns about how Royal Mail has decided to deal with this matter. The appropriate method for reporting abuse is via the Royal Mail security team, which then liaises with the police investigation, but it is also important that we ensure that a person whose mail is diverted is able to get to the bottom of what on earth went on. That is why I have had a conversation with my hon. Friend at the Home Office, and I hope that the hon. Lady will be able to take those discussions further.

Business of the House

11.33 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the coming weeks?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I have previously announced the business for next week, but I hope that it will be helpful if I give the House a little more detail. The forthcoming business is as follows:

MONDAY 20 MARCH—Estimates [2nd Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on the costs of peacekeeping in Iraq and Afghanistan, followed by a debate on deficits in the NHS. Full details will be given in the Official Report.

Followed by proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) (No. 2) Bill. At 10 pm the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

TUESDAY 21 MARCH—A motion to approve a money resolution on the Armed Forces Bill, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords amendments, followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Bill, followed by a debate on "a points-based system for managed migration" on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lord messages which may by then be received.

WEDNESDAY 22 MARCH—My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will open his Budget statement.

THURSDAY 23 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate.

FRIDAY 24 MARCH—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 27 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate.

TUESDAY 28 MARCH—Conclusion of the Budget debate.

WEDNESDAY 29 MARCH—Consideration of Lords amendments.

THURSDAY 30 MARCH—Motion on the Easter recess Adjournment.

FRIDAY 31 MARCH—The House will not be sitting.

[The following is the information: The Estimate is to be considered in so far as it relates to the costs of peacekeeping in Iraq and Afghanistan (Resolution of 16th March). Relevant documents: Fourth Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2005–06 (HC 980) on costs of peacekeeping in Iraq and Afghanistan; Spring Supplementary Estimate 2005–06; and Ministry of Defence Annual Report and Accounts 2004–05 (HC 464).

Uncorrected oral and written evidence taken by the Health Committee on 1 and 6 December 2005 (HC 736–i, –ii and –iii) on Public Expenditure Health and Social Services 2005.]

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for the 30 March will be:

THURSDAY 30 MARCH—A debate on the report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee on the courts and small claims.

The House may wish to be reminded that we will rise for the Easter recess at the end of business on Thursday 30 March and return on Tuesday 18 April.

Mrs. May: I suspect that not all Members will be aware that this morning it has been announced in a written statement that due to chaos in the Rural Payments Agency, which is responsible for the single farm payment, the chief executive has been replaced—I assume that means sacked. May we have an oral statement on Monday from the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs so that Members can question Ministers and raise farmers' concerns about the failure of that agency?

I appreciate that there will be a statement today by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on the Government's response to the parliamentary ombudsman's report, "Trusting in the pensions promise". However, the Government's initial attempt to dismiss the ombudsman's findings called into question her role and her ability to act on the referrals that she receives from hon. Members. Constituents assume that the ombudsman is the last line of defence against possible maladministration by the Government. The ombudsman serves this House. Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a debate on the role and powers of the parliamentary ombudsman?

The latest annual study by the Association of Directors of Social Services shows that council social services departments have a funding shortfall of £1.76 billion, some of which is due to deficits in the health service. Crucially, that means that councils are cutting the provision of services to elderly and other vulnerable people. May we have a statement on joint funding and working between health and social services and a debate on the provision of social care?

In business questions recently, I, and other hon. Members, asked for a debate on the withdrawal of the Post Office card account and the possible resultant closure of 10,000 post offices. The right hon. Gentleman dismissed those concerns. Last week, in reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) he said:

> "No one is suggesting that people should be forced to use the banks. Indeed, I have been at great pains to emphasise that there is a range of accounts available at the post office".—[Official Report, 9 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 955.]

I have checked the Post Office website. There are indeed accounts that can be used at the post office. They are accounts that are held at Abbey, Alliance & Leicester, Bank of Ireland, Bank of Scotland, Barclays, Clydesdale Bank, the Co-operative Bank, First Trust Bank—the list goes on. Unless I am mistaken—and the names do rather give it away—those are all banks, although there is one building society, the Nationwide. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain to the House what accounts the Post Office provides as an alternative to the card account? I ask him again for a debate on the future of the Post Office.

Finally, may we have a debate on standards of financial management? I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman was concerned that the treasurer of the

[Mrs. May]

Labour party did not know that the party had received a loan of £1.5 million. I wonder what account the money went into if the treasurer did not know about it. Should we assume that the money went into a hedge fund? The Labour party treasurer is married to the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman) who speaks for the Government on the funding of political parties. Indeed, in a debate in Westminster Hall on 8 November last year, the right hon. and learned Lady said:

"We do not have any millionaires in Peckham, and we probably do not have any people who would donate £5,000".

She went on to say in reference to local party members:

"If they think that donations are entirely the remit of millionaires, they will feel that they themselves do not matter".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 8 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 20WH.]

Could she not have helped her husband out on this matter, or is this yet another Labour household where financial matters are not discussed over the breakfast table?

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Try not to smile, Geoff.

Mr. Hoon: I will certainly give it a try.

The House has clearly been concerned for some time about rural payments. Business questions have been asked routinely about the difficulties faced by farmers who have not received appropriate payments, so I would have thought that the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) would congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on dealing with the matter. Where there are problems, it is obviously right that the Government and accountable Ministers should take the action necessary to bring about an improvement in the situation. I can assure the House that that is precisely what my right hon. Friend has done through her decision.

On pensions, I can assure the House that no one is dismissing the report of the parliamentary ombudsman. Indeed, after business questions, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will make a statement to the House about the report, as is appropriate. As the House is aware, it has a proper process for dealing with reports from the parliamentary ombudsman and, as I understand it, that proper process will be pursued by the Select Committee on Work and Pensions, which again is as it should be.

The responsible Minister at the Department of Health is looking at any shortfalls that may arise in social services. I have made clear to the House before the importance of health service bodies being able to deal with deficits and having appropriate procedures and accountancy standards to deal with them. I am sure that all Members want the huge amount of extra money that the Government have put into the health service to be spent wisely and effectively on continuing to improve health care both for the elderly, in conjunction with social services across the country, and for all other users of the service.

I look forward to the right hon. Member for Maidenhead telling the House about the evidence on which she relied when suggesting, in rather emotive terms, that 10,000 rural post offices will be closing. I have seen that in headlines and in newspapers and although there is a tendency for the Opposition to believe all they read in the Daily Mail, it is not necessarily the best source for research or advice. Nevertheless, I take seriously the future of the Post Office—the Government take it extremely seriously. I have previously set out the position on Post Office accounts and accounts that can be used at the post office. It is important that pensioners and others get the best return on their savings and their money. I have generally assumed that the Conservative party supports financial improvement for pensioners, so I am a little surprised that week in, week out Opposition Members continue to suggest that pensioners should not get the best return on their savings and their accounts. That is the implication of the right hon. Lady's suggestion.

The Government have introduced clear standards of transparency on financial management in respect of donations—[Laughter.] Quite why that should cause the Opposition so much entertainment is difficult to understand. Without those arrangements we would not be aware of the range of contributions that have been made to the Conservative party over the years. The Government have no difficulty about discussing such matters and I am surprised that Opposition Members are not a little more embarrassed about the history of the arrangements in their party.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The evidence on which the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) might have been relying was the words of Adam Crozier, the chief executive of the Post Office, who might be expected to know about the Post Office system.

The Leader of the House cannot just sweep aside an issue that the treasurer of the Labour party calls impropriety. Is the right hon. Gentleman not at all ashamed that there should be even a suspicion that in this country people can buy a place in Parliament? There is nothing wrong with loans to political parties, if they are transparent and if they do not buy preference, but should not we have a debate on removing patronage altogether from Parliament and stopping millionaires from payrolling parties the money they need to go about their business?

I note that the Leader of the House has arranged for a debate on the costs of the actions in Iraq and Afghanistan, which I welcome. But is there not a need for a wider foreign affairs debate, dealing with not only what is now acknowledged by the Secretary of State for Defence as a prospective civil war in Iraq and the continuing situation in Afghanistan, but also the crisis in Palestine? We need an opportunity to debate the British position on these matters more fully than the time available for the statement would permit.

Lastly, I wonder whether we ought to have a debate on the teaching of English in universities, because I am very concerned that the Home Secretary, who went to Cambridge—which some say is a reputable university—appears to think that a scheme that is compulsory for everybody who drives a car and for everybody who wants to go on holiday is somehow voluntary. For nine out of 10 people in this country it will be compulsory, so I do think that perhaps we need a debate on English comprehension.

Mr. Hoon: Well, as someone who has suffered at the same institution as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, I am confident that we both understand English and that we can both explain it with the same ability. I recognise that in the recent past the hon. Gentleman has had some difficulty understanding my replies. I will do my best to make them clearer to him, not least because he has at least accepted the House's advice in relation to his political ambitions—I see that he is planning to become the deputy leader of the Liberal Democrats. We all congratulate him on that, and if I were to get a vote, I would be voting for him.

On the question of political patronage, I assure the hon. Gentleman that in any event, rightly, it is against the law for honours to be sold—a law that I think was passed by the House as a result of the activities of a previous Liberal Democrat Prime Minister. [Interruption.] I am sorry; I should correct that—Liberal Prime Minister.

Mr. Heath: He published the prices.

Mr. Hoon: I have no knowledge of that. But in any event it is something that is clearly thoroughly disapproved of, and something that I assure the House does not happen.

On the question of a wider foreign affairs debate, we have regularly scheduled such debates. I am sure that it will be possible to have such a debate in the future. This week we had Foreign and Commonwealth Office questions, where I know that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary went out of his way to provide as much detail as he could at the time in relation to recent and very troubling events in Palestine. That is a subject that I am sure the House will want to return to, and certainly we will look at the possibility of arranging such a debate.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that Labour Members are justly proud of the fact that it was a Labour Government, after returning to power in 1997, who introduced and enacted the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which, yes, brought a real transparency to the funding of political parties? [Interruption.] Hon. Members should read the thing. Yes, it brought transparency covering donations; but I hope that some Opposition Members will read it, and agree that we need and want a debate to discuss how quickly we can introduce amending legislation to cover loans as well as donations. It is as simple at that.

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend has made his point extremely well, and certainly no one on this side of the House would be in any way concerned about such a debate.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): After my criticism last week, I thank the Leader of the House for coming here today in a much better mood, which is much appreciated. Let me try and ensure that he stays in that mood, and suggest to him that his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman) does have a serious potential conflict of interest, as her husband is treasurer of the Labour party. Would it be wise for her to come to the House next week and tell us that this particular part of her many responsibilities has been divested to another Minister within the Department?

Mr. Hoon: I can tell the House that, yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs asked to be relieved of her responsibility for electoral administration. My noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has accepted that request and has strengthened my right hon. and learned Friend's portfolio by adding legal aid and family justice. She will now deal with the central planks of the Department's portfolio on justice, including the courts and legal aid.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): May I also refer to political donations, which, I believe, I was the only Member to raise at Business questions last week? Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), I recognise the changes that have come about in terms of transparency since we were elected, but I wish to restate the need for a statement in view of the controversy. Given all the circumstances, perhaps it would be wise for all the latest nominations for peerages from the three parties to be withdrawn. At long last, after all these years—this issue goes back a long time indeed—is it not essential that we separate the connection between donating large sums of money and getting a peerage? We need to clean up the whole act.

Mr. Hoon: I assure my hon. Friend that those matters are entirely separate. Indeed, as I indicated in agreeing with my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), the Government have done more to introduce transparency in such matters than any previous Government in history. That is why we are proud of that record and why we will continue to be willing to debate it on any and every occasion.

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware that students are rightly exempt from paying council tax, but the Government grant formula is supposed to ensure that local residents in large university towns, such as Hatfield, do not lose out by having to make up the shortfall. However, it has come to light that, because of an error in the way that the Office of the Deputy Prime calculates the number of students in an area, 6.5 million people are spending £82.5 million too much on their council tax. If I send him the proof of that, may we have a debate to discuss it?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman sends me the details, I will certainly refer them to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House consider early-day motion 998, which is in my name and those of 20 other hon. Members from both sides of the House and congratulates Nissan Motor Manufacturing on its decision to build a new model in Europe's most efficient car plant—a record that it has held for the past seven years—especially in the light of the fact that the Nissan's chief executive officer will be visiting my constituency to see the new model come off the production line tomorrow?

[Mr. Fraser Kemp]

[That this House congratulates the Nissan car company on its decision to build the new Note model and the compact Qashqai car at its Washington plant; further congratulates the workforce on being the most productive car plant in Europe for seven years consecutively and for winning the right to build the new model in the face of stiff internal competition; notes that the Nissan car plant in Washington is the biggest car plant in the United Kingdom with a production capacity of more than 300,000 vehicles a year employing 4,100 people and has just announced a further 200 jobs will be created; further notes that sales of Almera and Primera cars in Russia manufactured in Washington were up 61 per cent. in September, the eighth consecutive month of growth in demand; and further congratulates Nissan for selling more than 1.8 million cars in the first six months of its financial year, up 15 per cent. on last year.]

Does the Leader of the House not feel that that is a great tribute to the work force and British manufacturing in general? Does he not agree that Government procurement agencies should consider that car as an ideal model for Ministers and others?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point, and I am pleased to agree with him, not least because, given the history of difficulty with the British car industry, companies such as Nissan are responsible for exporting about 75 per cent. of their production. Not only are they providing important sources of high-value employment in areas such as the north-east, but they contribute significantly to the success of the British economy abroad.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The Leader of the House expressed incredulity that Opposition Members keep raising, week after week, the Post Office card account? Can he not just take us at our word? We want a debate. There are 9,000 account holders in the New Forest. They are anxious and angry about the proposals to abolish their accounts. They expect both my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) and me to raise that issue, ask Ministers questions and demand to scrutinise the Government's proposals.

Mr. Hoon: I am not at all suggesting that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members should not raise those issues as and when appropriate, and they have done so regularly. Perhaps my only slight scepticism stems from the fact that hon. Members do not listen to the replies. Given our concern about education, I realise that there are still some Opposition Members who perhaps have not benefited from the excellent state education that the Government provide and continue to improve. However, in those circumstances, I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government take very seriously the Post Office card account and the future of rural post office services, but we believe that, equally, pensioners who use the Post Office card account have an interest in moving to accounts that, for example, pay them rather better interest than they earn currently.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend consider holding a debate on foreign workers? We should be welcoming foreign workers into the country, but we have a problem in my constituency with Monaghan's mushroom farm, which encourages indigenous workers to be squeezed out by paying foreign workers less and giving them reduced conditions of employment. That is a serious matter: it causes racial rumblings in communities that want no part in that type of behaviour.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that issue, which is important in her constituency, as in other constituencies, and she is right to highlight it. Of course, there will be an opportunity for her to contribute to the debate next Tuesday, when there will be a chance to discuss the Government's new proposals on a points-based system for managed migration. I am sure that, if she catches the Deputy Speaker's eye on that occasion, she will be able to make her points again.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Will the Leader of the House find time to debate the lack of adequate education provision for young people with severe physical disabilities and profound learning difficulties who are in the 19-plus age group in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry to learn that the hon. Gentleman believes that that is the position in Northern Ireland. I am sure that that matter can be looked into if he lets me have appropriate details or provides them to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): May I tell my right hon. Friend that thousands of my constituents suffered from a loss of gas supply in sub-zero temperatures last week? Although the community and those involved with the emergency plan pulled together marvellously—many people are to be congratulated on ensuring that those who were vulnerable were warm and fed—many important matters now arise, not least with the compensation system, which is over-complex. Will he find time for the House to consider how the regulator is responding to requests from my constituents, who have to wait until the gas supplier receives the money from the gas network before it can be passed on to my constituents?

Mr. Hoon: I am pleased to hear from my hon. Friend that the response by those responsible was effective and minimised the time that people spent without an adequate gas supply. I equally recognise that it is important that we reduce unnecessary bureaucracy in dealing with any compensation payments, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be considering that issue.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have a debate in Government time on prison education? Given that children in young offenders institutions on average receive only eight hours education a week and that the operation of the churn means that thousands of young people are constantly shunted from one institution to another before they have had the chance to finish their education or training and to acquire the qualifications that they seek, would not a debate allow right hon. and hon. Members to explore what is being done by both the Home Office and the Department for Education and Skills to tackle that phenomenon and to give those young people the chance to reform and constructively to contribute to our society?

Mr. Hoon: I heard the hon. Gentleman raise that important issue on a previous occasion, and he is right to suggest that it is a matter of great concern that those young people, who perhaps need education more than most, should have that opportunity. It is something that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department equally takes very seriously, and it is something that the Government have at the forefront of their mind.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is wrong for politicians and political parties to play fast and loose with the constitution and integrity of the House? He may be aware that the Scottish National party voted on the Education and Inspections Bill last night, despite claiming publicly and in early-day motions that SNP Members do not vote on matters not relevant to Scotland. May I ask my right hon. Friend to use his good offices to reassure the House that that kind of hokey-cokey politics will not be tolerated?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this issue. We have got used to the inconsistency of the Scottish National party over the years. He has simply highlighted another aspect of that.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Leader of the House may not be aware of the case of Stephen Ayre, a convicted murderer who was let out of prison early and who then abducted and raped a young boy in my constituency. Given that 7,000 crimes have been committed by people out of prison on tags and that 1,600 crimes have been committed since 1997 by people out on parole, will the Leader of the House provide time for a debate on sentencing? Many people in my constituency are angry that people sent to prison are let out early to commit crimes such as the one that I have described. People want prisoners to serve their sentences in full. May we have debate on this issue?

Mr. Hoon: This issue is regularly discussed when Home Office affairs are dealt with on the Floor of the House. As someone responsible for managing the Government's legislative programme, I know that we have the opportunity in the House very frequently to discuss Home Office matters as part of the significant programme of legislation that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has brought forward in this Session and, I anticipate, will do in future Sessions.

It is easy to talk about the problems that arise when prisoners are released early. Leaving aside the individual case that clearly we all must look at very seriously, I would be more understanding of the hon. Gentleman's concern if he were able to place his criticism in the context of what he believes should be an appropriate solution to the problem. Simply highlighting the particular case does not help to take the debate forward.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): The House will know that there has been just a single prosecution under the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925, and that was way back in 1933. Given the swirl of allegations about cash for honours, is there not—I say this seriously—a compelling reason for an early statement by a Minister from the Cabinet Office or perhaps even the Prime Minister himself in the House next week?

Mr. Hoon: I do not believe that that is the case at all. I do not believe that there has been any impropriety; there has been no evidence of that. I accept that there is a swirl of allegations, but I do not believe that any of those allegations have foundation.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): My constituent, Miss Izzo, has been waiting eight months for an answer to a complaint that she made about the medical treatment that her mother received shortly before her tragic death. Currently, more than 1,500 complaints are waiting more than six months for the Healthcare Commission to resolve, and it is now more than a year since the health care ombudsman issued her own damning report into the system. Does the Leader of House not agree that there is an urgent need for a debate on the national health service complaints system and that it is in crisis? Such a debate is long overdue.

Mr. Hoon: Obviously, I do not have the details of the particular case, but if the hon. Lady would like to let me have them, I will certainly draw them to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): In a written statement, the Minister with responsibility for disabled people advised Parliament of her intention to engage consultants to conduct a strategic review of the future business options for Remploy. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that provides a very good opportunity for people who work in Remploy, the board of Remploy and those of us who represent constituencies with Remploy bases in them to make the case for the recommendation in the National Audit Office report, "Gaining and retaining a job: the Department for Work and Pensions' support for disabled people", that said that we should find ways of re-engineering the profile of Remploy? Does he know of any forthcoming debates that there may be on the support that the Department for Work and Pensions gives to help the 2.6 million disabled people who are of working age to look for work when we might talk about the strengths of Remploy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I think the hon. Lady has got her point across to the Leader of the House.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have had the opportunity in the past of visiting more than one Remploy factory, and I know what a tremendous contribution it makes in improving employment opportunities for disabled people. As I am sure she is aware, our recently published Green Paper on welfare reform set out the Government's intention to continue to do more to provide employment opportunities for disabled people. We believe that Remploy has a key role to play in helping us to achieve that goal.

[Mr. Hoon]

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): When I asked for a debate on the cash-for-honours scandal last week, the Leader of the House told me that his political antennae had not detected any groundswell of concern on the issue. How are his political antennae this week now that the scandal is threatening to engulf the entire Labour party? If political honours are not for sale in this country—and this Prime Minister has appointed 290 peers when Lloyd George managed 26—why is it that 80p of every pound of individual donations to the Labour party has come from people who were either knighted or ennobled by this Prime Minister?

Mr. Hoon: I have made it clear that political honours are not for sale in this country. I stand by the remarks that I made last week. It may well be the case that there is a swirl—to use the word of my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice)—of speculation and debate about this matter, but the Government have set out in legislation a process that provides transparency in these arrangements. That is something that no previous Government have done and is something of which Labour Members can rightly be proud.

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the invidious position of Port of Liverpool police with regard to their employment rights. I have tried to determine which Department is responsible for the employment rights of Port of Liverpool police and I have failed dismally. Some Department must be responsible, so would my right hon. Friend be kind enough to let me know which?

Mr. Hoon: When I find out, I will.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I would like to inform the Leader of the House that more than 50 Members have now joined my all-party parliamentary group for dairy farmers. That shows the extent of passion and feeling that many MPs on both sides of the House feel about the state of the dairy industry. Will he provide time for us to discuss the plight that dairy farmers are facing, so that we can compel supermarkets to treat them in a more appropriate manner?

Mr. Hoon: I know that the issue has been raised on more than one occasion with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. He has made clear the Government's concern to ensure that there should be fair treatment not only of dairy farmers but of farmers in general. That is why the Government are taking such urgent action to improve the present arrangements for rural payments.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I know that my right hon. Friend is aware of the sad death this week of Jimmy Johnstone, the former Celtic and Scotland winger. Height wise he was, as we say in Scotland, five foot nothing but, in terms of skill, ability, personality and humility, he was a giant of a man. He played many memorable games for both Celtic and Scotland, and was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand why the hon. Gentleman wishes to refer to this matter, but we need a question relating to next week's business.

Mr. Devine: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will my right hon. Friend support early-day motion 1807?

[That this House notes with sadness the passing of Celtic and Scotland legend Jimmy Johnstone and offers his family its condolences at this difficult time.]

It is in my name and the names of 113 other hon. Members on both sides of the House, and extends our condolences to his wife Agnes and to his friends and family.

Mr. Hoon: I would like to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to a great footballer. This country has lost a number of very talented footballers in recent times, and I know how strongly those north of the border feel that Jimmy Johnstone was never recognised as he should have been south of the border in his playing career. I certainly join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to him.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Can the Leader of the House arrange for a debate in Government time on the role of the Health and Safety Executive? It is responsible for the safety of industrial work in this country as well as for investigating disasters such as the one that took place at Buncefield. However, it could end up prosecuting itself, because it is the prosecuting authority as well. Its inquiries are carried out behind closed doors, so could we have a debate on the Floor of the House into its future role in dealing with disasters such as that at Buncefield?

Mr. Hoon: I believe that health and safety standards in this country are among the very highest in the world and that that in no small part is the result of the work of the Health and Safety Executive. If the hon. Gentleman has specific concerns about the way in which it operates, I will have them investigated if he lets me have them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the Leader of the House on referring to the considerable successes that we have had since 1997 in the national health service and in many aspects of its work. However, did he see earlier this week the announcement by Laing, the midwife of many private finance initiative projects, that the book value of its contracts had quintupled and that its profits had increased by 43 per cent? That stands in stark contrast with the acute problems that one or two acute hospital trusts face. May we have a debate on PFI, which is increasingly seen as prohibitive in cost, flawed in concept and intolerable in consequences for taxpayers, patients and clinical staff in the UK?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that argument. A huge amount of extra money has been put into the national health service by the Government but, at the same time, extra money has come from the private sector which would not otherwise have been available, providing, for example, significant additional capital projects, including the construction of new hospitals, wards and facilities that contribute directly to the NHS and to in-patient care. I urge my hon. Friend to look carefully at those schemes, which are an excellent illustration of the way in which the public and private sectors can work together for mutual benefit.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): May we have a debate on domestic violence victims who do not have any recourse to public funds? I pay tribute to good work of the MK Lighthouse project, but overseas nationals who are married to British and EU nationals face a stark choice if they are victims of domestic violence. Either they leave the home and face destitution, because they do not have recourse to public funds, or they stay in the violent home. The Government have acknowledged that problem by giving funds to Women's Aid, but those funds have now run out.

Mr. Hoon: That is an important and difficult issue. The Government have recognised the dilemma particularly of women in that position, and it is something that we will keep under review.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): The Leader of the Opposition told the House yesterday

"We believe in parliamentary scrutiny".—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1452.]

This morning, however, when I attended the Ninth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation to consider the Civil Proceedings Fees (Amendment) Order 2005, not a single member of the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties bothered to turn up. We were bereft in particular of the hon. Members for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) and for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes). May we have an early debate, but not too early in the morning, on the subject of alarm clocks and the Government distribution thereof to Opposition members?

Mr. Hoon: I have discovered in the course of my responsibilities that I am expected to deal with a range of different institutions and answer questions on their behalf. I have not previously been asked to be responsible for the organisation of the Opposition Whips Office, but I am always willing to give it the benefit of my advice.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Will the Leader of the House consider holding a debate on male health? I have tabled early-day motion 1639, which has already been signed by more than 55 Members.

[That this House notes the statistics contained in the Northern Ireland Cancer Registry showing that in the last 10 years the number of men diagnosed with prostate cancer has increased by almost 50 per cent.; recognises that hospitals and clinics dealing with this type of cancer are doing so against a traditional reluctance among males to use their services; and calls upon all hon. Members to offer assistance in promotional activities that demonstrate the utter folly of such attitudes regarding male health.]

A debate would help us to try to dispel men's traditional reluctance to go to hospital, and ensure that there is a reduction in the number of men diagnosed with prostate cancer.

Mr. Hoon: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising that important issue—the more publicity that is given to the question, the better—and he is right to do so on the Floor of the House. I join him in urging people to support that campaign.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I apologise for my late attendance in the House—I was at a meeting with a Tesco representative. Last Saturday, I was delighted to attend an event at the Tesco superstore in my constituency to promote its involvement in Fair Trade fortnight. I was therefore outraged to find out on Monday in the local press that Tesco is shedding more than 400 jobs in my constituency, without any prior consultation with the local council, the local chamber of commerce or me. May we have a debate in the House to discuss employment relations to ensure that employers such as Tesco do not behave in such a cavalier fashion?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point. It is clearly important that major employers, particularly when contemplating significant reductions in their work force, ensure that Members of Parliament and others affected by such matters are given as much warning as possible.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the Secretary of State for Health come to the House and make a statement about the impending redundancies of NHS dentists, which are an unintended consequence of the new dental contract? Strategic health authorities and primary care trusts must be told by the Department of Health to stop the loss of NHS dental care, including from the excellent practice of Foreman in my constituency and other practices in south Essex.

Mr. Hoon: I will certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend writes to the hon. Gentleman, but I doubt that any dentist will be out of work for long, given the significant demand for their services.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): On 16 February, the Leader of the House dismissed my request for a debate on honesty in sentencing, and today he was equally dismissive of the same request from my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Philip Davies), saying that he had focused on one case. John Monckton was murdered in his own home by someone who was released five years early from his sentence, and yesterday we read about Robert Symons, who was murdered in his own home by someone who was released nearly three years early from his third sentence for burglary. Is it not the case that people are being killed because there is a policy to get offenders out of prison when they ought to remain there? Is not the solution to supply enough capacity in prisons to keep them there?

Mr. Hoon: I am not in any way dismissing perfectly proper concern and anger about that case, which no one would take lightly. I am not suggesting for a moment that anyone has done so. However, this is not a new issue or a recent problem for the penal system. The Government have adjusted the rules significantly to provide more clarity about the length of sentence that is actually served. Leaving that aside, the hon. Gentleman must set out to the House more clearly his proposed solution. If he is suggesting that everyone should serve precisely the term set out by the judge at the time of sentencing, he should say so.

[Mr. Hoon]

Hon. Members: Yes!

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Would the Leader of the House find time for a debate on why the council tax misery of people living outside metropolitan areas has been compounded by unrestrained hikes in town council precepts, such as a remarkable 48 per cent. by Trowbridge town council in my constituency?

Mr. Hoon: The calculation of council tax is a matter primarily for local decision making, which, in Trowbridge, is the responsibility of the town council. I expect that it is 48 per cent. of a fairly modest figure, given town councils' responsibilities, but nevertheless all councils should apply modest increases, because they affect those who have to pay them.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Does the Minister share the concern of the Royal Society of Chemistry and myself about the proposed closure of the chemistry department at Sussex university? There is something deeply wrong with funding mechanisms if they result in the closure of a five-star-rated chemistry department. Developing countries such as India and China produce 3 million scientists a year, including more than 100,000 chemists, but we are starving centres of excellence of funding. Will the Minister consider allowing a debate on strategic science provision in English universities?

Mr. Hoon: It may be a five-star institution, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the number of chemistry students at Sussex has declined for a considerable number of years. It is not inappropriate for universities to decide which courses to offer and to reorganise their provision accordingly. I would not want him to leave the House with the impression that there is a shortfall in the number of people studying chemistry, as chemistry course applications and acceptances through the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service rose by more than 12 per cent. last year, compared with a national average increase of 7 per cent. More chemistry students are therefore being educated at our universities, which we should all welcome.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May we have an early debate in Government time on the work of the Assets Recovery Agency, which is one of the main weapons in the fight against crime and criminals, particularly in Northern Ireland, where paramilitary organisations are steeped in crime? Such a debate could focus on the issue of powers for the agency so that it can do more to fight people who evade tax, thus providing it with a main weapon against paramilitary organisations in particular.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has raised the work of that agency before, and I have joined him in congratulating it on its efforts. It is important that it should continue to succeed in removing criminality from society in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find time for an urgent debate into the future funding of Hertfordshire mental health services? In the next financial year, the service faces a £5.5 million cut, which will put many of the most vulnerable in my constituency and across Hertfordshire at risk. I know that money is tight, but those cuts will hit the most vulnerable in the county.

Mr. Hoon: What is important is that the Government continue, as they have done, to provide extra funding and resources for the important facilities that the hon. Gentleman rightly recognises are being made available. The Government continue to provide more money for mental health services and other aspects of the health service than any Government in history. Clearly, that money is not unlimited; it has to come from taxpayers' pockets. However, the Government are proud of their record in that area and of the health service in general.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have an important statement to come. May I ask for brevity on the part of hon. Members who are still seeking to catch my eye?

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): In lending my support to a debate on single farm payments, I ask the Leader of the House to ensure that it takes place before the Easter recess. Will he visit auction marts such as that in Thirsk in the Vale of York to see the distortion caused by Scottish farmers being paid the single farm payments in full and North Yorkshire farmers not being paid a penny?

Mr. Hoon: The urgency with which the Government view the situation was made clear by the decision recently taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. That matter is important for farmers up and down the country. There are farmers in my constituency who will be concerned about those payments. The Government take the matter seriously, as they should.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Last Saturday, Mrs. Cutting came to my weekly surgery. She has been admitted four times to hospital with a heart condition. She saw a consultant in September 2005. Her ECG appointment was made for the 8 November—but it was 8 November 2006. Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House and explain the situation with waiting times?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman lets me have the details of that case, I will ensure that they go to my right hon. Friend and she will write to him directly.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find Government time to debate the recent changes to the home oxygen service? One of my constituents contacted me about the problems that he was having in obtaining cylinders for his terminally ill wife. He said:

"You would not have treated an animal the way that my wife and others are being treated."

Last week, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) said that she had not blamed anyone for the shambles. When can we have a debate to find out who is responsible for the shambles and what lessons can be learned to ensure that the same thing does not happen again?

Mr. Hoon: I am well aware that there have been some difficulties in different parts of the country and that the issue has been raised before on the Floor of the House at Health questions. The Government are addressing the issue and we need to resolve it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend is considering the matter with some urgency.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I am sure that we all welcome the example set to her ministerial colleagues by the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman), although we might wonder when she discovered that her husband was treasurer of the Labour party. May we have a debate on the ministerial code and the Register of Members' Interests, and how they treat the interests of spouses and quasi-spouses?

Mr. Hoon: The ministerial code is set out for the House and is available for anyone to see. Obviously, from time to time, changes are made to the code, but, again, they are published. The Register of Members' Interests is a matter for the House. I see no need for a debate on that question at present.

Occupational Pensions

12.23 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): With permission, I should like to make a statement on the ombudsman's report on the security of final salary occupational pensions published yesterday. The parliamentary commissioner's report is a detailed piece of work and, of course, deserves a proper, full and formal response. It is my intention to publish such a response in the next few weeks. However, I would like today to set out the reasons why, after very careful consideration, we have reached the view that we cannot accept any of the findings of maladministration and why we have therefore decided to reject all but one of her recommendations.

The ombudsman's report concludes that between 1996 and 2002, both this Government and the Conservative Government were guilty of maladministration in three principal areas. I would like to take each of those findings in turn. I make no apology for the detailed response that I am about to give. To offer anything less comprehensive would not properly reflect the importance of the report and the seriousness with which we treat the findings that the ombudsman has made against this Government and the Conservative Government. I should stress, in that context, my Department has co-operated fully with the ombudsman and her office during the preparation of the report. It has provided detailed information and documentation on request and it has commented extensively on the specific findings that the ombudsman had indicated that she intended to make. Those responses are set out in the report, included in a lengthy annexe to it.

Turning to the individual findings: first, the ombudsman found that official information about the security that members of final salary occupational pension schemes could expect from the minimum funding requirement, introduced in the Pensions Act 1995, was sometimes inaccurate, incomplete, inconsistent and therefore potentially misleading, and that that constituted maladministration. We do not accept that the Department's leaflets were inaccurate, incomplete, inconsistent or misleading. It is true that some were more detailed than others, but that was because they were designed for different audiences. All the leaflets covered by the report carried very specific statements that they were not a full explanation of the law and were for general guidance only. The leaflets themselves make that clear.

Perhaps I could illustrate those points by taking some of the key documents referred to in the report, in order. In 1996, the then Government published a guide to the 1995 Pensions Act—leaflet PEC3—which described the intention of the various measures in the Act, including the minimum funding requirement, or MFR, and how they were expected to operate. The leaflet also said:

"This leaflet is a brief summary of the changes. If you need advice about your occupational pension, speak to the trustees or managers of the scheme . . . This leaflet gives general guidance only and should not be treated as a complete and authoritative statement of the law."

That was very much the pattern.

[Mr. John Hutton]

In July 1997, the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority—OPRA—guide for pension scheme trustees summarised what the minimum funding requirement was. The guide also said:

"You"— that is, trustees—

"will need to take advice from professional advisers so that you can use your powers and fulfil your duties properly. Please note that this guide should not be taken as a definitive statement of the law."

In May 2002, the Department issued leaflet PM3: "Occupational Pensions—your guide". Although the guide did not discuss the risk of schemes winding up underfunded, it did say:

"this guide . . . looks at some of the questions you may need to think about and it tells you where you can find more information . . . Read any pension information your employer gives you . . . This leaflet is for guidance only. It is not a complete statement of the law."

The Government do not consider that any of the leaflets or quoted statements relied on by the ombudsman could have formed a proper basis for scheme members, still less trustees who were professionally advised, to assess the security of their individual pension schemes. But, even more importantly, the Government also believe that the report fails to demonstrate that decisions taken by individual scheme members were influenced by the information that the Government did, or did not, make available. In other words, the report simply does not establish that the wording of the leaflets led to the losses suffered by individuals.

I now turn to the second finding of maladministration. The ombudsman says that the failure by the Department for Work and Pensions to review its existing information leaflets, when informed that scheme members and member trustees did not know the risks to their accrued pension rights, constituted maladministration. The Government do not believe that the information given to the Department by the actuarial profession during this time should have instigated a review of its publications.

Those recommendations concerned how trustees—not the Government—should communicate with their members about the funding of their schemes. The Department invited views on that issue in the consultation document that it issued in September 2000 on the future of the minimum funding requirement. The response to that consultation led ultimately to proposals, which were then implemented, for the replacement of the minimum funding requirement. I want to say more about that replacement later. But so far as we are aware, no respondents suggested that departmental publications were causing confusion. They were not advising that the content of these leaflets concerning the purpose or intent of the minimum funding requirement was misleading or inaccurate. Ministers cannot fairly be criticised for failing to do something that was simply not proposed.

Moreover, trustees had access to advice from their own scheme actuary, who would have been well aware of the operation of the minimum funding requirement. In addition each MFR certificate included a statement that meeting the minimum funding requirement did not equate to full buy-out. All of this information was available to scheme members. We do not believe that it would have been reasonable for trustees to have relied on publications issued by the DWP which were brief and general in nature, rather than the professional advice they had access to and were under an obligation to consult. Trustees were required to give all scheme members basic information about their scheme, and many trustees produced fairly detailed information booklets. We have seen no evidence from the report that the ombudsman has considered what information trustees supplied to their scheme members and what, if any, impact this information might have had.

Thirdly, the ombudsman has said that the decision in 2002 by the Department for Work and Pensions to approve a change to the basis of the MFR was taken with maladministration. The Government believe that we acted wholly responsibly in implementing the recommendation of the actuarial profession, which had received the backing of the independent Government Actuary's Department. The ombudsman has not allowed us to see the full actuarial advice on which some of her comments were based. The Government Actuary advised the ombudsman that, if this advice was not disclosed, it made it impossible for anyone to understand the basis on which she reached her conclusion that the Government were guilty of maladministration. As a result, we have not been able to see or challenge how she arrived at some of her conclusions on the 2002 change.

The change in 2002 was intended to bring the MFR back to its original strength. Adjustments to the MFR were always on the principle of maintaining its 1997 level. This was the principle on which the actuarial profession kept the basis of the MFR under review and made recommendations to the Department. It was also the basis on which the Government Actuary's Department advised my Department. The report published yesterday contains a letter from the Government Actuary, referring to the decision criticised by the ombudsman, and I want to quote from it. It says that "the evidence base"

for the DWP's decision

"was not insufficient since it was based on strong advice from the actuarial profession, which had been developed by a committee containing leading technical experts from most of the major firms of actuaries, and supplemented by GAD as a further independent source of advice. The evidence base for this decision was in fact extremely strong and much stronger than for many (perhaps most) of the decisions that have to be taken by Government."

The ombudsman acknowledges in her report that the 2002 change did not affect the degree of knowledge which scheme members had.

Against this background, the Government have considered carefully the ombudsman's first four recommendations, which involve considering whether to restore the lost pension rights of affected scheme members, making consolatory payments and apologising to scheme trustees. As I have already made clear, the Government are unable to accept the findings on which those recommendations are based. We do not believe that the findings of maladministration can be supported by the facts. It simply cannot be right that the losses from the schemes that have collapsed should be met by the taxpayer without establishing any causal connection between the actions criticised in the ombudsman's report and the losses that people have incurred. The report fails to establish that connection.

Indeed, in respect of the ombudsman's fourth recommendation, relating to schemes that began to wind up between April 2004 and April 2005, the report itself acknowledges that the individuals concerned could be said to have had the opportunity to take whatever action they could to mitigate their potential loss. I do not consider that it would be in the wider public interest for Government to accept that very substantial liability on behalf of taxpayers. We calculate that liability as being in the range of £13 billion and £17 billion in cash terms over the next 60 years. We estimate that the administration costs would be in the region of a further £20 million each year. We do not therefore intend to take the actions recommended by the ombudsman. The taxpayer cannot be asked to accept the responsibility for effectively underwriting the value of private investments in the way the report suggests.

The Government do, however, accept the ombudsman's fifth recommendation with regard to reviewing the time that it takes to wind up a defined benefit pension scheme. Work is already under way in this area, and we will set out our proposals for how we intend to proceed when that work is completed.

I would like to finish by making two things absolutely clear. First, this Government have been the first to accept the moral and social obligation to make sure that as many as possible of those who have suffered hardship and distress in these circumstances receive financial support. That is why this Government have set up the financial assistance scheme, with £400 million of public money. The scheme is designed to provide help to those who have lost the most and who are in the greatest need—those closest to retirement and who are therefore least able to make alternative provision. The scheme will currently help up to 15,000 people who have faced significant occupational pension losses. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. It is customary to hear statements of this kind in silence. Hon. Members will have their own opportunities to respond in due course.

Mr. Hutton: The financial assistance scheme will top up those people's pensions with financial support, to give a maximum income of up to £12,000 a year. The Government are prepared to look again at all aspects of the scheme as part of the current spending review, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday made it clear that "we will expedite that review and do it as quickly as we possibly can".—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1450.]

Secondly, this Government have led the way in providing greater levels of security for the future. We have replaced the MFR, which is of course a large part of the subject of this report, with new scheme funding arrangements that are more flexible and fit for purpose. The Pension Protection Fund and the new pensions regulator will transform security for members of defined benefit schemes.

We do not underestimate the importance of this issue for those people who have been affected by pension scheme closures, particularly when employers are insolvent and cannot make up any deficiency in scheme funding. We will continue to do what we can to help them. That is the fair and sensible way for us to proceed.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): May I start with the bit that the Secretary of State missed out? On behalf of Opposition Members, I should like to express my sympathy for the 85,000 people who have lost their pensions through occupational pension scheme failures. Those are decent people who set out to do the right thing to try to ensure a decent retirement for themselves, and they have seen their dreams of a comfortable and secure retirement cruelly shattered. Their plight is not only a series of personal tragedies, but a tragedy for the cause of increased pension saving as confidence in the system is further undermined.

The ombudsman's report specifically addresses misleading information by Government, but let us not forget the context. In spite of any amount of dodgy information, the problem would never have arisen if the pension funds in question had not failed. The Government must accept their share of responsibility for those failures, as well as for the information that misled people about the consequences. It was this Government who reduced the minimum funding requirement for occupational pension schemes. It was this Government and the present Chancellor who raided pension funds and are still raiding pension funds, to the tune of £5 billion a year with his pension stealth tax, equivalent to £120 billion of capital value wiped off pension funds.

So the Government stand accused not only of misleading about the consequences of the failure of occupational pension funds, but of helping to precipitate that failure. On the first count the ombudsman, an official of Parliament charged with the task of reporting to Parliament on claims of maladministration, has investigated and found that maladministration has occurred. What is the Government's response? It is a direct challenge to the authority of Parliament. The accused in the dock has decided that he will be judge and jury in his own case. He has just spent 10 minutes of his 15-minute statement going over the case again and telling us that the ombudsman, an Officer of the House, got her findings wrong.

The ombudsman rightly replies to the right hon. Gentleman that

"Parliament has decided that it is my role—and not that of any party to a complaint—to determine what constitutes maladministration."

The House must insist that the Government bow to the decision arrived at by the due process which the House put in place in respect of the factual finding of maladministration by the ombudsman. While they are at it, the Government could also comply with the ombudsman's recommendation that they apologise. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman's mother ever taught him this, but my mother always taught me that an apology costs nothing.

The real problem for the Government is that the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, South-West (Mr. Darling), then Secretary of State for Social Security, and the present Secretary of State for Transport, has already committed the Government to the principle of redress. In March 2000 he told the House that:

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

"As a matter of principle, we believe that when someone loses out because they were given the wrong information by a Department, they are entitled to redress."—[Official Report, 15 March 2000; Vol. 346, c. 308.]

The Secretary of State has sold the pass, leaving Ministers in the ridiculous position of trying to deny the ombudsman's findings of maladministration because that would-be Chancellor of the Exchequer has already committed them to providing redress in those circumstances.

Surprisingly, yesterday at Prime Minister's questions, the Prime Minister was rather more honest about the situation. He did not say the ombudsman was wrong. He did not question her findings of maladministration. He simply told the House that the Government could not pay what he claimed would be a £15 billion bill.

However, the ombudsman's principal recommendation was that the Government should consider whether they should make arrangements for the restoration of the pensions and other benefits of those who had lost out, in her words

"by whichever means is most appropriate".

The Prime Minister said yesterday that the Government

"have to look for another way of dealing with the issue"—[Official Report, 15 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1456.]

The obvious way, to which the Secretary of State alluded, is the financial assistance scheme, which was put in place to help people who lost their pensions or suffered diminished pensions because their pension funds had failed. I welcome what the right hon. Gentleman said about his willingness to look again at the way the financial assistance scheme works. At present, it does not work. It is limited to people who are already retired or who are within three years of retirement age when the scheme fails. It is slow and cumbersome. Only 27 people have received payments from the scheme, out of 85,000 people who have lost their pensions or suffered diminution of their pensions. The fund is clearly underfunded for its stated purpose, having only £20 million a year at its disposal.

Will the Secretary of State as a matter of urgency look at how the financial assistance scheme can be reconstructed to help a much wider group of people who have suffered loss of pension rights through no fault of their own? He said in his statement that it would be wrong for the whole burden to fall on the taxpayer. With that thought in mind, will he consider the possible use of unclaimed assets, in particular unclaimed pension and insurance assets, to see whether those could be used to support an expanded financial assistance scheme?

When we proposed that last year, the Chancellor said that those assets did not exist, but since the general election he has discovered them and earmarked some of them for one of his own pet schemes. It would be a more appropriate use of unclaimed assets in the pension and insurance sector to use them to fund failures in that sector. I urge the right hon. Gentleman to ask his colleagues at the Treasury to embark upon a serious piece of work to identify the extent and scope of those assets, to see whether they could contribute towards a remedy of the situation.

When the Secretary of State is talking to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor about additional funding for the financial assistance scheme, will he remind him of the £45 billion that he has had so far from pension funds with his pension stealth tax, and the £5 billion a year that he continues to levy on those pension funds, even as the system is collapsing about his ears? Will he remind the Chancellor of the pension fund failures and the misery suffered by tens of thousands of individual stakeholders in consequence?

Both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have used the figure of £15 billion. The Secretary of State today spoke of £13 billion to £17 billion. That is a cash figure and it is meaningless. Will he make a commitment today to put in the Library for the benefit of all Members a properly worked out net present value figure for the cost of making good the pension funds, so that Members can understand what the real figure is, not the hyped-up figure that he and the Prime Minister have been using?

The Government must accept without further delay the ombudsman's factual finding of maladministration. If they do not, the authority of Parliament and the credibility of the ombudsman's office will be critically undermined. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, South-West had already committed them to the principle of redress in these circumstances, but the ombudsman's recommendations leave scope for examining various ways to deliver that redress—through the financial assistance scheme, or perhaps by revisiting the use of unclaimed assets, as I suggested. The commitment to redress, in whichever form, has already been made by the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the Government, so Ministers cannot duck it by refusing to accept the ombudsman's finding of fact. It is for the Government to deliver on that commitment, and a great deal is at stake. With national pensions day ahead of us this Saturday, and the Government's response to the Turner report eagerly awaited in the spring, if the Government get this wrong and send the wrong signal about the security and safety of pension funds to the British public, there is a real danger that efforts to address Britain's pension crisis by promoting pension saving will be fatally undermined before they even get off the starting blocks.

Mr. Hutton: I agree, in some respects, with the hon. Gentleman. It is important that we establish proper arrangements for confirming the security and confidence that people have in their pension investments and pension savings. We have taken action to try to strengthen those arrangements, and I am confident that we have succeeded.

I also welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for what I have said about the financial assistance scheme, which is the right way to see what further help, if any, we can provide for pensioners who are caught in that particularly difficult situation. I have listened to his expressions of concern and sympathy, which we all feel, but many people in the country will regard that as crocodile tears. [Interruption.] It is important to make that point because his party had plenty of opportunities to devise a similar compensation or assistance scheme, which it completely failed to do. It is all well and good for him to express his concern, but no financial assistance scheme was previously available. [Interruption.] He referred to when pension schemes started failing, but he clearly knows nothing about the issue, because it is utterly ridiculous to suggest that pension schemes suddenly started to collapse in 1997. We have implemented the necessary provisions and are examining further help.

The hon. Gentleman referred to unclaimed assets, which are obviously a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and the £5 billion figure. Since 1997, there have been two significant impacts on pension funds: first, rising life expectancy has increased the costs of UK pension funds by some £250 billion; and, secondly, the fall in world stock markets at the end of the 1990s had a similar impact. [Interruption.] Conservative Members do not like it because they do not like the facts of the matter and are not prepared to listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very serious matter that affects many thousands of people outside this House. I think that we should conduct our affairs seriously and, if we can, politely, this afternoon. Hon. Members must listen to the Secretary of State's answers.

Mr. Hutton: Recent research shows that the figure was never £5 billion. The sum was accompanied by tax cuts for business, and it may well be not much more than half of the widely quoted figure.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman argued that Governments must always accept the findings of the Parliamentary Commissioner, but that was certainly not the way in which the previous Tory Government used to respond. I simply draw his attention to his party's rejection of the Barlow Clowes report. If he wants to be credible, he must be consistent, but he has no consistency whatsoever.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, the Front-Bench statement and response have taken almost half an hour, and I want as many hon. Members as possible to get in this afternoon. May we have brisk questions and, hopefully, brisk responses, too?

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the clarity that he has brought to the situation. Will he confirm that there should always be a correlation between the evidence and the verdict? The FAS was set up to cover the current comprehensive spending period, and we need early action before the start of next year's period. Will he indicate the time scale of any review of the scope, extent and financing of the FAS?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear yesterday that we are looking to expedite the review of the FAS, and I hope that we can do so in the near future.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for advance sight of his statement, but I fear that his response to the ombudsman's report will have created even greater anger and an even greater sense of betrayal among those people who have lost their pensions. As I understand it, the essence of his statement is that he believes that the Government have got more or less everything right and that the ombudsman has got more or less everything wrong. With respect, his Department has had a chance to put those points to the ombudsman over the past few months, and I remind him of her conclusion:

"I have found that maladministration was a significant contributory factor in the creation of financial loss . . . Nothing in the DWP's submissions persuades me otherwise."

As the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) pointed out, paragraph 7.26 of the ombudsman's report states:

"Parliament has decided that it is my role—and not that of any party to a complaint—to determine what constitutes maladministration".

If the Government are going to trample over the ombudsman's report, what is the point in having a parliamentary ombudsman and giving her those responsibilities? I hope that Committees of this House, including the Public Administration Committee, will take up the way in which the DWP has dealt with the report.

Does the Secretary of State agree that those people who have lost their pensions will now feel doubly betrayed, not only because of what originally happened, but because of the way in which the Government have dealt with the report, which comprehensively condemns the Government and states that they provided information that was "inaccurate, incomplete, unclear and inconsistent"?

Is the defence in the DWP response to the ombudsman's report—that many people will not have bothered to read those leaflets or that those who have read them will not have paid any attention to them—good enough? One wonders why the Government bother to distribute such leaflets, if people are not supposed to read them or pay attention to them. The Secretary of State's statement was peppered with the excuse that people should have read the small print in the leaflets, but that is the approach of a dodgy second-hand car dealer, which one would not expect from a Secretary of State charged with regulating such matters.

On cost, I share the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge about the £15 billion figure that the Prime Minister has been waving around, and I want a clear commitment that the Secretary of State will put an explanation in the Library. I also want a clear commitment that the Secretary of State is not going to fob off people with a token increase in the FAS, when a more substantive measure, such as extending the protections in the pension protection fund to people who are currently losing out in relation to the ombudsman's report and the existing FAS, is clearly needed. Will he tell us the cost of such action? Is that not precisely the type of expenditure that should fall to the contingency reserve? Given that this Government can find billions of pounds to fund an unjustified war in Iraq, surely they can find the money out of the reserve to fund such compensation.

As a Minister told the House of Commons in 2000:

"We are aware of the importance of protecting members' rights . . . If we cannot do that, they have no one else to look to".—[Official Report, 3 April 2000; Vol. 366, c. 765.]

[Mr. David Laws]

What has changed? Why do Ministers now say that they are not responsible for protecting those rights and that members must look only to employers or trustees? Surely that approach not only betrays those people who have lost their pensions, but undermines the Government strategy to encourage millions more people to take up second pensions. The ombudsman, who obviously has a sense of irony, has entitled her report, "Trusting in the Pensions Promise". Does the Secretary of State understand that if he deals with the ombudsman's report in that way, people will not trust this Government's pensions policy?

Mr. Hutton: I can agree with some of the hon. Gentleman's points, but I am afraid that I am unable to agree with his fundamental analysis of our response to the parliamentary commissioner's report or to the arguments that I have advanced today. It is important—indeed, it is our responsibility—to place on the record why we disagree so strongly with the ombudsman's findings. In particular, in relation to the second of her findings of maladministration, there is very strong evidence that the Government acted on the basis of proper professional advice and followed that advice at every stage of the decision-making process. That is not just my view, but that of the Government Actuary's Department. In those circumstances, particularly given that we have not seen her actuarial advice, it is right and proper for me to put that on the record.

I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman, as I should have done to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), that we will set out the details of our costings when we produce our fuller response.

It is simply untrue to say that the Government are not seeking to provide financial assistance and support for people who are caught up in these circumstances, terrible as they are. We are looking to see what more we can do. As I said in response to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge, that is the right and proper way for us to proceed.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is time that the parliamentary ombudsman was brought within the Freedom of Information Act 2000? When I, as an individual, tried to find out information on the report, I was denied it because the ombudsman is not subject to the Information Commissioner.

I first raised this matter in the House in July 2002. Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), I did so because of what has happened at ASW Sheerness and ASW Cardiff. We are most concerned, as regards the financial assistance scheme, that £400 million is not enough. Will my right hon. Friend put into the Library the amount that he considers to be enough? How much money will need to be put into the fund, overall, over the next 20 years?

Mr. Hutton: I think that I had better steer clear of the first part of my hon. Friend's question, because it is not my responsibility to comment on that.

In relation to my hon. Friend's important points about the financial assistance scheme, let me be clear that I am very happy to meet Members, from both sides of the House, over the next few weeks to talk about the future of the financial assistance scheme as we expedite the review of the scheme and look to the future, to the extent that we are able to, to provide more support for people caught up in these terrible circumstances. That is an open invitation to Members on both sides of the House to express to me their views about what further support we should be providing. We will listen very carefully to all those points.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): The Secretary of State's statement is shameful. It is an outrage to come to the House and systematically attack an independent arbiter who was set up by this House independently to investigate accusations of difficulties. His defence that those people had a let-out clause at the bottom of their advice is utter nonsense. Does he not realise that when lawmakers offer advice, it is categorically different from advice offered by second-hand car dealers who then opt out by saying, "You didn't read the small print."? Surely he should accept that his responsibility now is to shoulder the burden of the difficulties that have happened as a result of his advice and deal with it instead of attacking the messenger.

Mr. Hutton: I absolutely reject what lies behind the right hon. Gentleman's comments. They are not accurate and they are not a proper reflection of my statement. We are making it clear—I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman has not heard me saying this, because it is the seventh time that I have done so—that we are looking to expedite the financial assistance scheme review to see what further help and support we might be able to give.

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State will look at the financial assistance scheme again. I can inform the House that my constituents are not looking for sympathy, as suggested by the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond); they want their pensions back—the pensions that they have paid for. I am sorry to disagree with the Secretary of State, but they took out an occupational pension on Government advice in the belief that it would provide them with a guaranteed income in retirement. I am therefore disappointed that the ombudsman's recommendations are not being accepted by the Government.

It was my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), not the Conservatives, who first mooted the idea of using unclaimed assets to try to provide restoration. Will my right hon. Friend speak to the Chancellor about that to see if it is one way in which restoration can be given?

Mr. Hutton: I fully respect the views that my hon. Friend has expressed. As it happens, I am meeting my right hon. Friend the Chancellor later this afternoon, and I promise her that I will relay to him the very strong views that she expressed.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Whatever the reasons for his announcement, does the Secretary of State accept that all this is a bitter blow to the public's confidence in saving for a private pension for their retirement? Does he recognise that the £15 billion price tag that he has put on this compensation deal is regarded by many as an excuse by the Government not to pay up? When he publishes the information requested by my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond), will he also give an assessment of the likely benefit that might accrue to people who have lost their pension scheme so that the House can make a proper assessment of the true compensation package that the taxpayer should be considering?

Mr. Hutton: Yes.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend talked about extending the financial assistance scheme. When he does that, will he bear it in mind that there is a group of schemes, including the APW scheme in Hampshire, in which the employer is still solvent, but the trustees were effectively forced into compromise with no option, with the loss of a significant part of individuals' pensions? So far, the Government have set their face against extending the financial assistance scheme to schemes such as APW. Will he give me an assurance that in the review he will look afresh at that group of schemes to see whether assistance can be offered, because those people have suffered just as much as anybody else, and through no fault of their own?

Mr. Hutton: I fully accept what my right hon. Friend says. This is a very difficult group of cases, and I pay tribute to the work that he has done in drawing our attention to them. We will need to have another look at it as part of the review, but I am afraid that I am not holding out any promise to him that we will be able to make progress. However, I assure him that we will take another look at it and see what further help, if any, we are able to give.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): I believe that the Secretary of State is an honourable and a decent man, but it saddens me that he has had to read out a squalid attempt to justify the unjustifiable. He knows, as we do, that each and every one of those 85,000 cases represents an individual, and a personal tragedy for somebody in retirement. Some of those cases include steelworkers from ASW in Kent, who are my constituents. They were looking to the guardian of the people—the parliamentary ombudsman—to come up with a fair answer. What are we supposed to say to them now that the Government have decided to overturn the findings of the judge?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks.

The essence of our argument is that we strongly dispute the findings of maladministration, and I have tried to explain to the House why that is so. That is an entirely proper and sensible thing for any Minister to do, particularly when significant amounts of taxpayers' money are involved. I suspect that a Conservative Minister would have done exactly the same. What we have to do now—this is where I agree with the hon. Gentleman—is see whether there is scope for doing more to help more people. I have confirmed today that we are doing that.

I want to return to an important issue that goes to the heart of this argument. I hear every Conservative Member saying that we should pay out in full for everyone covered by the ombudsman's report, even when the ombudsman herself indicated, in relation to some of the scheme failures, that individuals had the opportunity to mitigate their loss. I am slightly confused by the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that, even in those cases, the taxpayer should be required to pay out to meet the losses, given that the evidence that links the alleged maladministration with the loss is not substantiated in her report.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): We can bandy accusations all afternoon as to who is to blame for the collapse of occupational pension schemes, but that does not help the large number of my constituents who have lost some, if not all, of their pension savings following the collapse of the Richards pension scheme. Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reiterate that the Government will stand behind those individuals who have lost large amounts of money and savings? The Government are the only body who can reimburse them for their loss, whether through the financial assistance scheme or any other mechanism. I am looking to the Secretary of State to reiterate that these people will be reimbursed in future.

Mr. Hutton: That is why the financial assistance scheme was established: to provide financial assistance and support for people who find themselves in those terrible circumstances. As I keep saying, we are re-examining the scheme to ascertain what further scope there might be for providing additional help. That is at the heart of my announcement and I want every hon. Member to appreciate that the Government are saying that.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): In the statement, the Secretary of State said that the financial assistance scheme would help up to 15,000 people. However, yesterday, only 27 people had registered for it. Does not that suggest that the scheme is barely scratching the surface of the problem? When the right hon. Gentleman attends one of the national pensions day events on Saturday, what arguments will he deploy to persuade people to take the Government's advice to invest in new occupational pension schemes? The Government are obviously not prepared to take responsibility for the failure of past advice to do so.

Mr. Hutton: I have made it clear that no Government can take responsibility for underwriting the total value of people's private savings. That is impossible and untenable. The pension protection fund and the new powers of the pensions regulator mean that we have a much stronger regulatory environment to deal with the point that Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front

[Mr. Hutton]

Benchers made about securing confidence in the future. That is essential, and the Government are determined to do that.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): In my view, ordinary people's typical behaviour when making what they perceive as an ordinary decision in ordinary circumstances is at the heart of the matter. Will my right hon. Friend therefore further consider how those people can be quickly supported through the financial assistance scheme, so that those who are retiring imminently or fairly soon have some assurance about their immediate future? Will he also consider the advice that ordinary people are given in what they perceive to be ordinary circumstances? Will he examine how advice is published—I have asked for that on previous occasions—so that such situations can be avoided in future?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend and I can give her that assurance. As part of the review of the financial assistance scheme, we will have to examine the way in which it currently operates—the time it takes to process applications and the interim financial payments that we can make. I am not satisfied that, so far, only 27 people have received payments. My hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions Reform and I are working together to ascertain how we can improve the current administration of the scheme.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): There are many examples of great human tragedy and hardship among the hundreds of people affected by the closure of the company scheme at the Richardson's IFI factory in my constituency. Joe Blair, who was one of the people in the four cases that were taken to the ombudsman, feels that he has been doubly robbed. He lost his pension and now the Government have rejected and attacked the ombudsman's report in a cavalier way. What does the Secretary of State say to Joe Blair and the many others whose health and families have been affected, and who look to the future with despair as a result of what has happened to them?

Mr. Hutton: We have considered the ombudsman's report carefully. It is the first time in more than 40 years that my Department has taken such a view of an ombudsman's report. We have not done that lightly or in a cavalier way, as the hon. Gentleman suggested. I can only reiterate the points that I have tried to make repeatedly about the existence of the financial assistance scheme, the reasons for setting it up and the group of people whom we wanted it to help at the beginning of its operations—those in the greatest need and closest to retirement who cannot make alternative financial arrangements. I have made it repeatedly clear that we are taking a further longer look at the financial assistance scheme and I hope to present proposals as soon as possible.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's restatement of his willingness to review the financial assistance scheme. For my constituents who are workers or former workers at Kalamazoo, time is of the essence. Given the current timetable for the comprehensive spending review, it may leave many people in appalling positions. Will he therefore say a little more about the possibility of expediting the review? Given that the situation requires substantial amounts of money, will he speak to appropriate firms and bodies in the financial sector to ascertain whether, even at this late stage, there may be mileage in considering not purchasing annuities and pooling the schemes' assets to ensure that money can be front-loaded and the cost spread over the maximum period?

Mr. Hutton: On the first point, I do not want to sound repetitive, but we recognise that time is of the essence. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced yesterday that we would expedite the review of the financial assistance scheme. I hope to present proposals as soon as that work has been completed.

My hon. Friend's last point is important and many of the delegations that I have met have raised it with me. If we took his advice—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It would help if the Secretary of State addressed the House or, at least, his microphone, partly through courtesy but also because not doing so makes it difficult for others to hear.

Mr. Hutton: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Everyone is probably fed up to the back teeth with hearing from me this afternoon.

There is a significant problem with taking my hon. Friend's advice about dropping the requirement to purchase an annuity. If we dropped it, there is clearly the potential for creating problems further on because it is inevitable that the remaining pension schemes would rapidly run out of resources. It is neither fair nor reasonable for us to do that. That is why the requirements are what they are.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Secretary of State appears to say one of two things: either the ombudsman is ill informed and has not done a proper job, or she is well informed but her views are irrelevant. Which is it?

Mr. Hutton: The ombudsman has prepared a thorough report and reached conclusions. We disagree with them.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): May I reinforce the point that the Secretary of State should examine the position with some urgency to help people, some of whom are in serious predicaments? People from, for example, Federal-Mogul in Coventry, are waiting for the outcome. So far, we have discussed the ombudsman's report, but should we not hold a proper inquiry into where the money that was invested went and who spent it?

Mr. Hutton: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is important to expedite the review of the financial assistance scheme and I look forward to discussing that with him.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Since 1995, public sector pensions, including ours and Ministers' pensions, have become relatively more secure, but private sector pensions—partly because of the £45 billion tax on pension funds—have got relatively less secure. Given that context, does not the Secretary of State acknowledge that my constituents and others will greet with incredulity the Government's overriding the judge's verdict on maladministration?

Mr. Hutton: I have already made it clear that the £45 billion figure is rubbish. On the hon. Gentleman's point about the security of defined benefit schemes, I remind him of the Pensions Act 2004, which will significantly improve matters in ways that I am sure he would like.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and especially his commitment to reviewing the financial assistance scheme. In my constituency, nearly 1,000 members of the Richards pension fund managed to be admitted to the scheme, but that has not removed the deep uncertainty, which has been with them for a long time—since the first rumours circulated about the state of the pension fund through to its closure, and then the fears about whether they would get into the scheme. It will be several years before my constituents will be without uncertainty. I hope that my right hon. Friend views that as a matter of urgency and will thus bring not only clarity but certainty to the thousands of pensioners who are affected.

Mr. Hutton: I fully understand my hon. Friend's concerns and those of his constituents. That is precisely why we are expediting the review of the financial assistance scheme.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): As the Secretary of State knows, based on a recommendation by the Government Actuary, the national insurance fund is required to retain a balance that is equivalent to one sixth of annual expenditure. That would equate to £9.5 billion in 2004. The balance actually held amounted to £29 billion. The Government Actuary reported that that balance will reach £60 billion by 2010—an average increase of between £5 billion and £6 billion a year. The funds are available to meet the ombudsman's recommendations and it is an important point of principle that the Government should consider fulfilling in full the obligations that she set out.

Mr. Hutton: I can only say to the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of respect, that it is impossible for Governments to guarantee the value of private savings in the way that he suggests. We all need to think very carefully about that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Among the 85,000 personal tragedies are the 572 deferred pensioners involved in the fund collapse in October 2000 at British United Shoe Machinery in Leicestershire. Will the Secretary of State tell us whether the £15 billion that he has cited—giving an average £176,000 to each of the 85,000 people involved—includes any assessment of the ombudsman's second recommendation in relation to consolatory payments for the inconvenience, distress and uncertainty that she believes these people have had to endure? Has any assessment been made of the cost of such payments? Do they lie outside the £15 billion?

Mr. Hutton: I think that those payments are included. We will set out the full details of the costings when we produce our report.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that there is a large number of former employees of the Albert Fisher Group in my constituency whose pensions have been decimated and whose lives have been ruined? They will certainly be feeling no better after his lacklustre performance this afternoon. He has mentioned the figure of £15 billion. My constituents tell me that the capital required to give 100 per cent. relief to the 85,000 scheme members across the country is only £2.8 billion. If indexed, that would go up to £5.5 billion. Will the Secretary of State ensure that the correct figures are put in the Library?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, we will put our figures in the full response to the ombudsman's report.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I warmly welcome the glimmer of hope that the Secretary of State has given for the first time to APW Electronics employees, in his answer to the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham). May I ask him to focus, however, on the health warning that was attached to the leaflets? When I read something that says, "This advice is for guidance only", it makes me think that I should be guided by it. People who are encouraged to invest are told, in a forthright way in many advertisements, that the value of their investment can go down as well as up. Will the Secretary of State at least consider ruling that, in future, all such guidance will be phrased in much stronger and less ambiguous terms?

Mr. Hutton: The information to which the hon. Gentleman refers is the information that successive Governments have used to describe these matters. Conservative Members have simply not acknowledged that fact today.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): May I add my plea to that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) that the Secretary of State look again at assistance for those who have suffered under schemes wound up by solvent companies? Will he also look again at tightening up measures such as contribution notices, to dissuade companies from taking such action in future?

Mr. Hutton: There is no question but that the issue of solvent employers is probably the most difficult issue that we need to consider as part of the review. As I said to my right hon. Friend, I do not want to raise false expectations in this regard, but we will have another look at this.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the European Commission has conducted its own study of these matters and that its interim findings have already concluded that successive British Governments have failed to meet their responsibilities? Is the Secretary of State as dismissive of the views of the Commission as he has been today of those of the ombudsman?

[Adam Price]

Mr. Hutton: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, that legal case is still continuing, and I do not want to comment on current legal proceedings.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the Government's stewardship of our pensions over the past nine years has been less than stellar? In fact, it has been a complete and utter disaster. Does he accept that, every time he comes to the House, it is to tell hon. Members another horror story?

Mr. Hutton: No.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): In good faith, I took a delegation of the 700 Dexion workers who had had their pensions stolen from them to see the Secretary of State. I have spoken to members of the delegation this morning, and they feel betrayed. At no time during the meeting did the Secretary of State indicate that the Government would ignore the advice of the ombudsman. This is a bad day for Parliament. If that kind of advice is ignored, how can people have any faith in what goes on in this House?

Mr. Hutton: It was clearly not appropriate for me to say at that meeting, before the ombudsman's report had been published, that I was going to reject it.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I have been raising this issue in the House since shortly after I was first elected to Parliament in 2001, on behalf of my constituents who work for Dema Glass, Coalite and Chesterfield Cylinders, who have been robbed of their occupational pensions. Some of those people, including a Labour councillor, have saved into the schemes for more than 40 years, but now they will have to live in poverty in retirement. Will the Minister undertake to meet some of my constituents, and others, to explain in person why he is rejecting the independent expert opinion of the ombudsman and why, despite repeated Government assurances, those pensions were not safe and not guaranteed?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I am always willing to meet the constituents of hon. Members in such circumstances; I have done so repeatedly. All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that we have set out our arguments again today, and it is for others to judge them. We are determined to provide help and support for those in the greatest need when their pension schemes collapse. We are absolutely determined to continue to do that.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I usually feel sympathy for the monkey when it is clearly the organ grinder who has messed up. I would feel a great deal more sympathy for the Secretary of State if he had started out by expressing sympathy with those who had lost their pensions, and if he had then not behaved like a desiccated calculating machine and compounded his error by questioning the good faith of my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). The Secretary of State knows that many people have lost out as a result of these problems, but even the £2.5 billion a year stolen by the Chancellor from pension schemes would be enough to pay for the losses that those people have suffered. Will the Secretary of State tell me why Government spokesmen were rubbishing the ombudsman's report before it was published?

Mr. Hutton: We have set out clearly, today and yesterday, why we do not agree with the ombudsman in her principal findings of maladministration, and I have set out those arguments again today.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): The Secretary of State has given the impression today that not only was there no Government maladministration, but that there seems to be no recognition of the scale of the problem faced by many people, including my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), who used to work at Dexion. Does the Secretary of State accept that the stance that the Government are taking will damage confidence in occupational pensions and weaken the parliamentary ombudsman, and that it gives the impression that the Government are out of touch, arrogant and uncaring?

Mr. Hutton: No, I do not accept any of those allegations. We are the first Government to accept that there is a responsibility to make financial provision in these circumstances. In the context of the facts—the facts will always speak louder than the hon. Gentleman's words—people will come to their own views on these matters.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now move on to the main business.

Points of Order

1.28 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will be aware that, following the question put to the Prime Minister by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) yesterday, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has today issued a written statement admitting fundamental problems with the Rural Payments Agency and announcing the dismissal of its chief executive. This is extremely serious news for the thousands of farm businesses that already face a difficult financial future. In her statement today, the Secretary of State says that she has asked the new acting chief executive to report to her by Tuesday on the immediate steps needed to get the payments back on track. What indication have you received that the Secretary of State will come to the House to make an oral statement as soon as she has received that report?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand the seriousness of the matter that the hon. Gentleman raises, but I have no knowledge at this time of any plans that the Secretary of State might have to make such a statement. However, she will no doubt have noted the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, which are now on the record, and will decide accordingly.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that we are not now to proceed with Lords amendments to the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill this afternoon. Will you confirm that that is the case and tell us whether you have been notified of any reason for the delay? Given that we were informed of the business of the House for the next two weeks just two hours ago, without any alternative date being given, may we assume that those Lords amendments will now be taken after the Easter recess?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All I can tell the hon. Gentleman is that I understand that his supposition is correct, but I also understand that the Minister will deal with the matters he has raised when we reach them during the debate later today.

Estimates

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 145 (Liaison Committee),

That this House agrees with the Report this day of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. Watson.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Heath: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am most grateful for your earlier guidance, but will we actually reach the matter in the debate if it is not to be proceeded with? You said that the Minister would give an indication on the matter when we reached it in the debate, but if it is to be withdrawn we will never reach that point. I wonder whether you could give me some further guidance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised that the hon. Gentleman should pursue the matter through the usual channels. I also understand that when we reach the matter during the debate it will be dealt with then. The Minister will either move or not move the items that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Orders of the Day

Identity Cards Bill

Lords reasons for insisting on amendments and disagreeing to Commons amendments, considered.

Lords reasons: 16C and 22D

1.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their amendments Nos. 16 and 22, and proposes the Government amendments (a) and (b) in lieu thereof.

The amendments are technical amendments to clause 8, making it clear that an application for an identity card must include or accompany one to be entered on the national identity register. We have already had one debate on the Lords amendments this week, on Monday 13 March, when the House rejected them for the second time. However, their lordships have again insisted on their amendments to remove the requirement for anyone obtaining a designated document such as a passport to register and be issued with an identity card.

Yesterday, in the other place, the mover of the main Lords amendment, Lord Phillips of Sudbury, rebuked me in his summation in the following terms:

"The other thing worth saying is that last Monday, the Home Secretary . . . in levelling his defence against our proposal to make the scheme voluntary, did not in any sense call upon the constitutional justification of the Commons' position that has been the mainstay of the noble Baroness's closing speech"

—he was referring to Baroness Scotland of Asthal—

"and has been the subject of speeches from various noble Lords. Mr Clarke attempted to justify the Government's case according to the issues that he raised in the other place—none of them were constitutional issues; they related to the merits and demerits of this Bill.—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 March 2006; Vol. 679, c. 1248–49.]

I intend to remedy that defect in my presentation today. Let me start with what was said by Lord Strathclyde, the leader of the main Opposition party in the Lords. He spoke very wisely, as befits a graduate of the University of East Anglia. He said:

"This House should always proceed with caution when it is trying to defeat the Government, even when it is asking the House of Commons to think again on a Bill it has passed. Generally speaking, we do that. I think we always do that. What is so unusual about this aspect is that the Government have already been defeated on two occasions, and therefore this is the third occasion on which we are dealing with this matter.

In this context, perhaps I may make three points. First, I think the House should proceed with caution and should deal with matters as controversial as this only when they are very few in number. This is the first time in this Session that we have come to an issue of this kind. Secondly, we should proceed only on an issue where there is a good deal of public support for what this House is doing. Thirdly, we should not proceed if there are issues to do with the Salisbury convention. My noble Friend and the Government may disagree about the use of the Salisbury convention; I am entirely satisfied that there are no Salisbury convention implications if the House were to return this small point back to another place."

I shall deal with each of those three points. The first was that the House of Lords should proceed with caution. I think that Lord Strathclyde was quite right about that, and he should take his own advice. The fact is that the amendment is not a small point. It constitutes a major and deliberate effort by the Opposition parties to sabotage the whole of a Bill that has been agreed by this House, and that was set out to the public during the general election campaign. I hope that the Lords will indeed proceed with caution, and will not adopt a strategy that is designed to undermine the entire Bill.

Secondly, Lord Strathclyde said that the other place

"should proceed only on an issue where there is a good deal of public support for what this House is doing."

I remind the House—and perhaps, via this House, the other place—of the facts about public support. There is not such support for what the House of Lords is doing. Even the result of the latest opinion poll sponsored by the NO2ID campaign shows that 52 per cent. of the public are in favour, while Home Office research shows that 70 per cent. are in favour.

Lord Strathclyde said that the other place

"should proceed only on an issue where there is a good deal of public support for what this House is doing."

According to the NO2ID campaign, 52 per cent. of people are in favour of the identity cards and against what the other place is doing; and, as I have said, Home Office research shows that 70 per cent. are in favour.

The Conservative election manifesto was entirely silent on the matter, although the then leader of the party was a known supporter of identity cards. However, the findings of an opinion poll published by ICM before the election, in December 2004, show that some 80 per cent. of the public were then in favour of the introduction of identity cards, with 88 per cent. of Conservative supporters, 81 per cent. of Labour supporters and 72 per cent. of Liberal Democrat supporters in favour. So the answer to Lord Strathclyde's second point—that the Lords should block the will of this elected Chamber only if there is clear public support—is that there is not.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Surely the point is that it was not put to the people who were polled that the system would be compulsory. I am sure that there would be huge support for voluntary identity cards. The issue that the House of Lords and this House are having to consider is the whole issue of voluntary versus compulsory. I suspect that if those people had been asked, "Should it be a criminal offence not to carry an identity card?" or, "Should it be compulsory to carry an identity card?", the answer would have been very different.

Mr. Clarke: We have already agreed, in response to proposals from the other place, that before the stage was reached of making identity cards compulsory there would be further primary legislation. The Bill explicitly excludes a requirement for anyone to carry an identity card, so what the hon. Gentleman has said is completely incorrect.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): May I add to the effective point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry)? There would be more consensus, not only in the House but among the public, if we could see the final price tag. Can the Home Secretary tell us how much the whole project will cost the taxpayer?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman may have made my point for me. We have debated costs with the House of Lords, and we accepted an amendment on the subject tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson), in the spirit of seeking agreement.

As for the point made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), the NO2ID poll explicitly asked whether the card should be issued with a passport, which is what we are dealing with here.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Would the Home Secretary continue to take the line that he is taking in the context of what the Information Commissioner has said on the subject—that the Bill would cause a sea change in the relationship between the individual and the state? Has he spoken to the Information Commissioner recently, and has he any reason to suppose that the Information Commissioner has changed his view?

Mr. Clarke: I have not spoken to the Information Commissioner recently but, as I have said, there has been considerable debate on the substance of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman speaks of the relationship between the individual and the state. A general election is a pretty important part of the relationship between the individual and the state. That is why I think that the hon. Gentleman's noble Friend Lord Strathclyde was right to say yesterday that in his view—not mine—the House of Lords should proceed only on an issue on which there was a good deal of public support for what that House was doing. My point is that there is not.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Is my right hon. Friend at all concerned about the apparent drift away from the high levels of support for identity cards in the past? Does he recognise that if the identity card is introduced with a designated document, for a number of years people will be charged for an identity card without receiving any of the benefits, which will further undermine the system?

Mr. Clarke: I accept the first point, but not the second. Because of the debate about these issues and because the precise questions are different in different polling data, there is an issue concerning public support that needs to be addressed. That is a major part of the proposal, and my hon. Friend is right to raise it. Lord Strathclyde's second point was narrow, but important. It is: is there

"a good deal of public support" for the House of Lords to overturn the elected House consistently on these matters? I contend that there is not.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not; I want to deal first with Lord Strathclyde's third point. He said that the House of Lords should not proceed if there are issues to do with the Salisbury convention."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 March 2006; Vol.679, c. 1244–45.]

That is a very important point and it is worth recalling what the position is. First, it is absolutely clear that the introduction of ID cards is a manifesto commitment that has been approved twice by the elected House. I remind Members of the view of the Salisbury convention taken in January 2000 by the royal commission on the reform of the House of Lords. It was chaired by Lord Wakeham, who is not a notable Government toady, except when the Conservatives were in government. Recommendation 7 of the commission's report states:

"The principles underlying the 'Salisbury Convention' remain valid and should be maintained. A version of the 'mandate' doctrine should continue to be observed; where the electorate has chosen a party to form a Government, the elements of that party's general election manifesto should be respected by the second chamber. More generally"—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will complete the quotation:

"More generally, the second chamber should be cautious about challenging the clearly expressed views of the House of Commons on any public policy issue. It is not possible to reduce this to a simple formula, particularly one based on manifesto commitments."

I argue, therefore, that that doctrine exists and that it addresses the point made by Lord Strathclyde.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way one or two times.

Mr. Heath: I am most grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way; we are familiar with his semantic acrobatics on this issue. Given that this scheme will not, if he has his way, be anything other than compulsory for anybody who wants to drive a car or to go abroad on holiday—probably nine out of 10 of the population—is not this the primary legislation to which he refers, on which we should have a proper debate on whether the scheme is compulsory or voluntary? It clearly is compulsory.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong, but I regard it as characteristic for the Liberal Democrats to say explicitly that they do not care about the outcome of general elections. His colleagues in the other place have made it clear that they do not accept that the result of the election was right. Indeed, the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) came very close to saying that explicitly when we debated this issue the other day. The Liberal Democrats must answer to the public for their contempt for them in respect of this issue.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Does the Home Secretary recall that when the Chief Secretary to the Treasury was a Home Office Minister he told this House that it was absolutely clear that ID cards would start on a voluntary basis, leading to compulsion? Indeed, such statements were made before the general election and therefore must be taken into account as part of the manifesto. Does that not make this House's position absolutely clear?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. Documents published in 2002 and 2003, documents and debates published in 2004, and the 2005 general election manifesto are entirely consistent and clear on this issue.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, I was vice-chair of the Labour party's national policy forum in the run-up to last year's general election, and as such I took a close interest in the manifesto's development. I am pleased to remind him, and ask him to confirm, that that manifesto said that we "would introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renewed their passports".

[Anne Snelgrove]

So it is in our manifesto.

Mr. Clarke: I am very grateful for my hon. Friend's contribution. She played a major part in developing the policy, and it is clear that the position is exactly as she sets out. Indeed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) said a moment or two ago, the position has been clear for some time.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): The hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) has let the cat out of the bag—the manifesto clearly states "on a voluntary basis". Why does the Home Secretary not amend the Bill, so that people obtaining passports and driving licences who do not share his confidence in ID cards do not have to have one forced on them? Then, we would all be happy.

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal with that point in a moment, but the basic fact is that the biometric data being collected for passports on this basis are broadly the same as those that will be collected for the ID card system. It is absurd, not to mention costly, to have the double process that the Lords want.

1.45 pm

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that name, date and place of birth, address and nationality are the only personal information required on the national identity register? All that information and more is already required for the passport application, so does he agree that the House of Lords is fighting on what is a very narrow point? The issue is simply whether identical information collected for the passport office register can or cannot be transferred to a national identity register.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is entirely right and I completely accept his main point. This is not, as Lord Strathclyde suggested, a minor issue; it is a major one and the intention is to destroy the whole scheme.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con) rose—

Mr. Clarke: That is also the intention of the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), who will now set out why he wants to destroy the ID card system as a whole and break the conventions of Parliament.

Mr. Garnier: I am very grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way because it enables me to prevent him from carrying on unwittingly misleading this House. He insists on repeating the canard that the biometric passport obligation has something to do with the national identity register system that he wishes to set up. The obligation under the biometric passport system is to provide a system whereby passport officers can read biometrics at the port of entry; it has nothing whatever to do with the entry into the national identity register system that this Government are trying to achieve by stealth. If only they would come clean, they would have a much more sympathetic audience.

Mr. Clarke: That is entirely wrong. We discussed this issue earlier this week and we will continue to do so.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall not give way any more at this stage.

I return to what Lord Strathclyde said in the other place yesterday, because it is important. I believe that I have addressed each of the three points that he made. As I said earlier, he made it clear that the Lords should not proceed if there are issues to do with the Salisbury convention. He said that if the Government were not prepared to back down or to find a compromise, the only option was for the unelected House to force the Government to use the Parliament Act procedure to ensure that the will of the elected House prevails.

The Parliament Act has been used four times since 1949, and Lord Strathclyde is not right to suggest that we have reached the point where that option should be invoked. For the three reasons that he himself gives in columns 1244 and 1245 of the Official Report of yesterday's Lords debate, the other place should indeed think again, just as this place should decide to insist on its own position.

Simon Hughes: Will the Home Secretary give way on that point?

Mr. Clarke: In a moment. My fourth point is that the Lords amendments would impose an additional burden and cost on the plans for the introduction of ID cards that were approved by this House. It cannot be right for the constituents whom we represent to be denied by those whom they did not elect and cannot remove the most cost-effective option in implementing a scheme. In effect, the Lords voted for the establishment of two parallel biometric databases, with all the cost, inconvenience, confusion and insecurity that that approach involves. That raises the question of whether the unelected House has the right directly to place such burdens on our constituents.

The remaining issue is, essentially, a constitutional one: whether it is right for the other place to keep insisting on amendments that have been rejected here twice already, and that will be rejected again today.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Such a scheme would not only impose additional costs, which is an issue that clearly exercised the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) earlier; we would also end up with two databases, one unprotected and the other protected by the national identity scheme commissioner. Is that not what the Lords are advocating?

Mr. Clarke: That is completely right. The effect of the Lords amendment would be precisely as my hon. Friend says. If it were passed, the protections that this Bill provides for the national identity register would not be available for the biometric passport register.

Simon Hughes: The Home Secretary referred to our exchange on Monday. If Lord Strathclyde is right to say that the Lords should act only when there is a significant amount of public support, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the latest poll that he cited shows that public support for the position taken by the Lords is 10 per cent. higher than was the support for his party at the general election? The numbers in respect of the share of those who voted are about the same, so he surely cannot argue that the Government are justified on this issue, and that the House of Lords is not?

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): That does not make sense.

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. Friend is right about the Liberal Democrat arithmetic. The situation is very simple. I repeat that Lord Strathclyde made it clear that the Lords should frustrate the will of the Commons only when there is a "good deal" of public support for what the Lords was doing. The NO2ID campaign is opposed to our policy, but that organisation set the questions in the poll, in which more than half the country said that it did not support the campaign.

I studied yesterday's Divisions in the Lords carefully, to establish how opinion had moved between the votes on 6 and 15 March. There was almost no change in the position of those peers who are whipped by the Conservative, Liberal Democrat and Labour parties. On 6 March, 190 peers—principally Tories and Liberal Democrats—were against the Government position. Yesterday, that number rose to 194—almost no change.

The peers who are not whipped—the Cross Benchers and the bishops—voted on 6 March by 37 to 12 against the Government position, but yesterday a majority was clearly in favour of supporting and not frustrating the Commons' position. [Interruption.] In answer to the hilarity among Opposition Members, I have to add in fairness that there were only four bishops in the total of more than 50 Cross-Bench peers. They were not significant in the arithmetic, although their significance may lie in the guidance that they get from yet another place.

My point is that it was the whipped Conservative and Liberal Democrat peers who voted to frustrate the elected House and overthrow the Government's position. That was what happened, and I urge my colleagues to sustain the Government's position. I also urge the Opposition to stop trying to frustrate the will of the people.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The Home Secretary wants to represent the process in which we are engaged today as a clash between the House of Lords and the democratic will of the people, as represented by the Government. Hon. Members should put to one side the fact that this House of Lords is, after eight years, effectively the Government's creation, and that the opposition to this aspect of the Bill is driven by a belief in the ancient liberties of the British people. The right hon. Gentleman gave us some numbers, but they demonstrate that that belief transcends party. It drives an opposition that encompasses all parties, including Cross Benchers—

Mr. Charles Clarke: No.

David Davis: Yes: the Home Secretary said that a majority of peers—Cross Benchers, Liberal, Labour and Conservative peers—were against the proposal, not that all of them were. That is another factor that we must put to one side. To justify his stance as the representative of the people, the right hon. Gentleman is forced to pretend that the Bill exactly reflects the Labour party manifesto, but that point was destroyed by the hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove), who was such a senior person in the Labour party during the election.

The words of the Labour manifesto are clear.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will in a moment, as I have referred to the hon. Lady. I did not know that Labour Members were so sensitive these days, but there we are.

The words of the Labour manifesto are clear. It states that ID cards will be "rolling out on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports".

The key word is "voluntary", and we shall return to it time and again in the next five or 10 minutes. The Home Secretary has been forced to declare that the ID card is effectively voluntary.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I will in a moment, the hon. Lady need not worry. To do that, the right hon. Gentleman is forced to the ludicrous assertion that passports are somehow voluntary, too. He said that, in terms, the other day.

Later this year, the World cup tournament will be held in Germany. When I travel there to support the England team, and I tell the German immigration office, "I've not brought my passport because the Home Secretary tells me it's voluntary", I am sure that that officer will be very understanding.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): It is voluntary to go.

David Davis: We will come back to that in a minute. I am getting heckled by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), and I shall give way to him in a moment, when he will learn about heckling. I am sure that I will be treated very sympathetically by the German immigration service. When I am eventually let out of prison and I return to Britain, I am sure that I shall have no trouble getting back in without a passport.

[David Davis]

It is, of course, ridiculous to assert that passports are voluntary. Perhaps what the Home Secretary means is that foreign travel is voluntary, which is what the Under-Secretary said from a sedentary position. I think that that is what the Government are trying to say.

I suppose that we can also put to one side the disgraceful idea that British citizens, of all people, can leave their own country only if they agree to let the Government intrude on their privacy, on a scale unprecedented in British history. However, does he really believe that foreign travel is voluntary for business men whose customers are all abroad? Does he think that travel is voluntary for people whose parents or children live abroad, as is increasingly the case today? Does he think that foreign travel is voluntary for people whose children get in trouble abroad—something that we have read about too often in the past few months and years? [Interruption.] Does the Under-Secretary of State want to intervene? If so, I shall give way.

Andy Burnham indicated dissent.

David Davis: I see that he does not want to intervene. Does the Home Secretary think that foreign travel is voluntary for diplomats, soldiers and other Crown servants and their families?

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is not compulsory.

David Davis: The Home Secretary says that foreign travel is not compulsory. Oh, yes it is: I am afraid that people cannot be Foreign Office employees without going abroad. The idea is clearly ridiculous. Under this Bill, ID cards are clearly not voluntary; they are clearly compulsory.

Anne Snelgrove: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, but either he has cloth ears or he has problems with semantics. I used to be an English teacher, so I shall give him an English lesson if that is what he wants. In our manifesto, we understood that ID cards would be "rolling out on a voluntary basis as people renewed their passports".

We know what that means. If the right hon. Gentleman does not, that is his problem. The House of Lords should implement our proposals and allow the Bill to go through. Does he agree?

David Davis: The answer to that question is clearly no. The hon. Lady will be aware, as I am, that at least one Home Office Minister recommended that the word "voluntary" should not be used in the manifesto, but the Government insisted on it.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He is making a very important point, but I want to add a small one. When he goes to the World cup, he will not manage to get as far as Germany. Civil aviation regulations mean that it is compulsory for people to have passports before they get on a plane.

David Davis: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that.

Tony Baldry: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. It is disgraceful for the Government to try to pretend that they are rewriting the manifesto. Did we not all hear the Home Secretary on Monday try to defend this proposal with his reference to free will? He said:

"That is the free will that people may exercise in deciding whether or not they wish to have a passport . . . That is the free will over what they can do and how they can operate. That is what the wording means."—[Official Report, 13 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1261.]

In other words, the Home Secretary seems to suggest that we have a voluntary choice as to whether we have a passport. That is what he said, in terms, on Monday, so the Government cannot come to the House on Thursday and try to rewrite completely what they said then.

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right, and I suspect that the Home Secretary designed his speech today to try to drive away the memory of his second intervention on Monday, which was a ridiculous disgrace.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. He will have noted, as the House will have done, that the hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) a few moments ago used the word "understood" in respect of the Labour manifesto. Does he accept that the hon. Lady has invented a new constitutional doctrine: that the purpose of a manifesto is not to communicate a clear message to the electorate, but to communicate internally to party colleagues in the doublespeak that only they understand? Will he confirm that establishing what proportion of the electorate thought that the return of a Labour Government would mean compulsory ID cards would require several noughts after the decimal point before one reached a positive figure?

2 pm

David Davis: My hon. Friend is right in all except one respect. This doctrine is not entirely novel; it first saw the light of day in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland".

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): When I was mobilised to serve in Iraq, which was not a voluntary process, I was required to produce a passport in order to travel—[Interruption.] It was scrutinised at Brize Norton. That again was not a voluntary process. Other officers and soldiers had to acquire a passport in order to comply. I suppose, ultimately, the decision to join the armed forces was voluntary. Was that what the Government meant?

David Davis: My hon. Friend makes his point perfectly. He was heckled from a sedentary position by a Labour Member who said that he had military ID, but if my hon. Friend was taking members of his family, they would not have military ID. Indeed, I see no exemption in the Bill to allow people not to be put on the national identity register because they are soldiers, Crown servants, Foreign Office employees or the like.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No, I shall not. I must make some progress. I may give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but I am not sure.

We can see that the Government's proposal is clearly in breach of their own manifesto, unless one takes the attitude that the manifesto did not mean to say that or that that is not what they understood it to mean—but the words mean what they mean. This part of the Bill is not the exercise of a democratic mandate. The best that can be said of it is that it is an exercise in elected dictatorship, full stop. So the Lords are right to amend it and they are entirely within their rights. That point destroys the entire speech that the Home Secretary just made.

We have continually been treated by the Home Secretary and his Ministers—sometimes from a sedentary position, but mostly on the "Today" programme—to new reasons for this legislation, be they terrorism, welfare reform, immigration or fraud. One Minister puts up a reason for the idea; only for another honest Minister to admit that the Government have overstated their case. That has happened several times in the course of argument over the Bill. That is followed by another Minister coming up with another argument, which is also overstated. That has been most obviously the case on terrorism.

The Government love to portray everybody except themselves as soft on terrorism. It is their favourite tactic with all of their illiberal legislation. Time and again, impositions are placed on the British people, which they have not faced for centuries, on the basis of arguments that are designed to make other people, the Government think, look soft on terrorism. That has applied most obviously to this Bill. I want the House to listen to the words of Baroness Park of Monmouth. The House should remember that Daphne Park has worked in the defence of our country in some of the most dangerous postings in the world. She has taken more risks in the defence of our country than the Home Secretary has had hot dinners, and that is a pretty high hurdle. I would trust her judgment on the defence of the realm way beyond that of the Prime Minister or, indeed, any Minister. Yesterday she said:

> "The very creation of such an enormous national identity register will be a present to terrorists; it will be a splendid thing for them to disrupt . . . . It will also provide valuable information to organised crime and to the intelligence services of unfriendly countries".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 March 2006; Vol. 679, c. 1234.]

So much for our national security.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend is making a powerful case, as always. Could he speculate on why so few peers support the Government on this, given how many new peers have been invited into the House of Lords under this Administration with this very generous Prime Minister? Could it be because they think that the Government have a lousy case?

David Davis: Of course they think that the Government have a lousy case. As I said before, there is opposition to the Bill across all parties. Some Labour Members who have severe worries about the Bill are bravely resisting it. I have made the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) wait for some time, so I shall give way to him.

Chris Bryant: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman because he said "No", then "Yes", then "Maybe", but now he says "Yes".

David Davis rose—

Chris Bryant: I am deeply grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He said earlier that he thought it was a gross infringement on the ancient liberties of the British people for the state to insist on somebody carrying an ID card. But, as I understand it, he believes that it is entirely appropriate for the state to insist that people should carry a passport when they fly into or out of the country. Why does he not see that there is a paradox there?

David Davis: There is no paradox; however, the point is interesting because I did not say what the hon. Gentleman said I said. Throughout this process, I have always argued—this is an extremely serious point and I am taking the hon. Gentleman's comment seriously—that the problem is not the piece of plastic, such as the type of card that I am holding up, which we all carry for a specific purpose. It is what is behind it. The database is the serious issue. I am entirely in favour of biometrics on passports, but we do not need to have a national identity register, which is what is proposed.

Andy Burnham: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: Certainly not. The Under-Secretary, who sits and heckles, gets it all wrong and will not take part in the debate, now wants to take part on an à la carte basis. This is a table d'hôte proposal by the Government and they are going to get a table d'hôte response from me. The latest argument is the ludicrous—I use that word advisedly—assertion by the Home Secretary that having an ID card will limit the intrusions of the state upon the person. That is an extraordinary argument.

If that were not daft enough, the Home Secretary tells us that citizens will find having an ID card useful, and even valuable. The technology director of Microsoft, no less, pointed out that the identity register will be a honeypot for hackers, fraudsters, thieves and terrorists. It will worsen the risk of identity theft. Far from being an infallible security system, we hear this week that the Government intend to rely on chip and pin technology to protect the card—the same technology that we have used for years in the common, everyday Visa card. So much for improving our personal security.

Simon Hughes: Is not the answer to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) that until today we have never required this document, a passport, to travel in our country?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Visual aids are strongly discouraged, not least because the reporters of the Official Report find it very difficult to understand what the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Simon Hughes: Will the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) accept that we have never required a passport to travel in our own country and, even if the Government were to implement their proposal, we would not be required to carry one?

[Simon Hughes]

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman is right. It is one of the distinctions of our country that we are not required to identify ourselves at every turn. We are not required to live in a society that requires us to produce a pass of any sort. That is one of the things that has distinguished us as a country over many years, indeed, centuries.

Andy Burnham: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No, I will not. The hon. Gentleman had his chance, and he missed it.

Kali Mountford: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I want to come to a close on this.

If an ID card were really valuable to the citizen, as the Home Secretary claims, presumably ordinary citizens would want them; everybody would want them if they were as valuable as the Home Secretary claims. So why are the Government not willing to leave citizens to make decisions for themselves? If cards are going to be popular, if they are going to make people happy, if they are going to do things for them, then they will take them up of their own accord. What we are talking about today is the compulsion issue—they will not need to be compelled to have an ID card. Of course, the Government do not believe their own argument. That became clear in the Home Secretary's view of this amendment.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: No.

The Government believe that unless they force a majority of the population to have an ID card by covert compulsion, they will never win the vote to make it compulsory in the final analysis. They know that if the card is not compulsory, it will not just be ineffective against terrorism, fraud, illegal immigration and crime; it will be completely useless.

Listening to the Home Secretary go on about the extra costs arising from the scheme, I was almost dumbstruck. The Opposition are not imposing £20 billion on the public for no virtue—we are not doing that, but that is what will happen.

Covert compulsion has become necessary to the Government's ill-starred strategy, which is incompetent in design, ineffective in execution and deceitful in delivery; but that does not mean that it is not dangerous. The proposal will completely invert the relationship between the citizen and the state. As we saw from the statement that preceded the debate, the Government too often forget that they are the servant of the people, not the other way round. The right to my identity is held by me, not by the state. My right to my citizenship is my birthright, not the gift of the Government, and our right as British citizens to our liberty and privacy should not be carelessly thrown away. That is why I ask everyone in the House to support the Lords in their defence of the rights of individual British citizens against unnecessary intrusion into their lives by an over-meddlesome Government, apparently bent on creating a surveillance state.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): The debate and the disagreement between the other place and our House turn on whether the scheme is compulsory or voluntary. The Home Secretary is right to remind us that we should need primary legislation if the scheme were to be completely compulsory, but the Bill establishes, by the back door, a halfway house to compulsion. Why?

I suspect that the real reason is that the Home Secretary is not confident. When we eventually reach the stage of introducing primary legislation to make the scheme compulsory, he wants to be able to tell the House and the public, "Sixty per cent. of people in the UK already have an ID card. What are you worried about?" However, the only reason that 60 per cent. of people will have a card will be as a result of this back-door way of compelling them to have a card if they want a passport or a driving licence.

It is perfectly respectable for the Home Secretary to want a universal card, but as the shadow Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said, the proposed scheme will not be effective; the card certainly will not achieve any of the things that the Government hope for it against terrorism, international fraud and so on, unless it is universal. The idea that it could be semi-universal actually denies the whole purpose of an ID card, certainly in terms of its practical effectiveness.

It is not unreasonable for the Home Secretary to want a universal card, but he does not want to legislate for it now because he knows that he would not get the measure through—[Interruption.] No, he is not legislating for a compulsory card. If he did that now, he knows that the Government would have to pay the full costs for such a card. He could not compel people to have a card and to pay £90 for it. He knows that a compulsory card would have to be financed by the Government and the Chancellor does not want to do that, so we have this rather dishonest and disingenuous halfway scheme.

If the Government and the Home Secretary were really confident about the proposed card, they would trust the British people. If the Home Secretary feels that he can make an overwhelming case for the importance of an identity card—as he undoubtedly does; I think that he is entirely sincere—he should trust his judgment and make that case to the British people. He should say, "Believe me, we will benefit from the card so volunteer for it", but he cannot introduce the scheme by compulsion. In proceeding by compulsion, he does not trust the British people. He certainly does not trust the people when he proposes this semi, rather false voluntary scheme, which is in effect compulsory.

2.15 pm

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I agree with my hon. Friend's line of thought. Does he agree that many of our constituents, who were deeply opposed to ID cards, gave the Government the benefit of the doubt because they thought that at least the scheme would not be compulsory? Now that a compulsory scheme is being brought in by the back door, does my hon. Friend fear that the next step will be a provision brought in by the back door that people have to carry their identity card?

Mark Fisher: As always, my hon. Friend makes good sense. She goes to the essence of the matter. This is not a proper voluntary scheme; it is compulsory, which is the only way it can work.

Will the Home Secretary listen to the other place, and to the public, and trust his own judgment? If, as he believes, he can convince the public of the importance of identity cards, he should trust them and let them volunteer for the scheme. The Bill does not trust the public; in effect, it asks them to be compelled to sign up for the cards.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The simple facts are that the Government say that ID cards will be introduced voluntarily, yet the 80 to 85 per cent. of the British population who possess passports will, if the Bill is passed, have an ID card foisted on them in coming years whether they like it or not.

By refusing to acknowledge the blindingly obvious—that a measure applied by stealth compulsion on the vast majority of the British people could never be described as voluntary by any known use of the English language—the Government seem to have turned their back on the most elementary terms of rational debate. The Home Secretary seems to inhabit a curious back-to-front world, worthy of C.S. Lewis, where words simply do not mean what they used to—

Tony Baldry: Lewis Carroll.

Mr. Clegg: I stand corrected. The House must forgive me. As an Alice in Wonderland allusion was used earlier, I deleted mine from my notes and clearly made an error in my replacement.

As it appears fruitless to continue to ask the Government to use the same dictionary definitions as the rest of the English-speaking world, I shall take a slightly different line of inquiry. If, according to the Government, the scheme will be voluntary, will British citizens be able to withdraw their data from the ID database voluntarily? I know of no database in operation to which individuals can voluntarily enter their data, and from which they are not equally free to remove that information at a time of their own choosing. The Data Protection Act 1998, which sets out the core data protection principles, is clear. It states:

> "It must be recognised that even when consent has been given it will not necessarily endure forever . . . Data controllers should recognise that . . . the individual may be able to withdraw consent."

Just this once, I shall take at face value the Home Secretary's insistence that the scheme is voluntary. If it is voluntary to enter, based on individual consent, will he confirm that it will also be voluntary to leave it?

I am also struck by the breakneck urgency with which the Government seem to want to roll out ID cards by surreptitious compulsion. This week, we mark the 10th anniversary of the tragic shootings in Dunblane. The Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 included a provision for a national firearms database, yet almost 10 years later nothing has happened. This week, Ministers told us that the decade-long delay was due to difficulties with the IT systems required for the firearms register. Apparently, at long last, a pilot register will start in May, with a view to rolling it out in fully fledged form a little later.

The contrast between the woeful delay in establishing a comparatively small database, agreed 10 years ago after the harrowing loss of life in Dunblane, and the headlong rush towards a vast uncosted, untested and unjustified national ID database speaks volumes.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman refers to the anniversary of Dunblane. Last Saturday was the second anniversary of the Atocha bombings in Madrid. He knows perfectly well that possession of an ID card is mandatory in Spain in order to have a mobile phone, which enabled the Spanish authorities to secure prosecutions.

Mr. Clegg: The point is, why should the Government be so keen through compulsion to roll out an untested, uncosted and vast ID database and seem incapable for a decade to develop the IT systems for a much smaller one? It hardly confers confidence in the Government's ability to deliver. The Government drag their feet on something that is urgently needed and justified, yet rush ahead on something that is neither needed nor justified.

Martin Linton: The hon. Gentleman has not answered what I may call the Rhondda paradox. If he regards the passport as compulsory, surely a passport is just as much an infringement of civil liberties as the national identity card. If he regards it as voluntary, then there is no problem. What is his answer?

Mr. Clegg: The key point is the distortion of the English language: saying that the ID card will be introduced voluntarily and yet doing it through compulsion. As to whether the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) is a paradox, I leave that for the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) to judge.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clegg: I should like to make some progress since time is short.

Ramming through illiberal legislation to no obvious end, while failing to honour pledges made to the families of victims of murder over 10 years ago, reveals the extent to which the Government appear to have lost any sense of proportion or any clear sense of priorities, on this as on so many areas of public policy. I urge those in all parts of the House, and those following this debate in the other place, to reject the Government's motion to disagree with the excellent Lords' amendment.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) concluded several points in his speech by saying, "put that to one side", so I intend to do that. But he did make two points that ought to be addressed. First, by virtue of the fact that some people have good reason to travel abroad, and therefore need to have a passport for that purpose, he argued that linking the identity card with the passport was in some way introducing an element of compulsion.

[Mr. George Howarth]

By even the greatest stretch of the imagination, that argument is based on pure sophistry. The fact is that whether people have good reason or not—

Mr. Garnier: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will give way in a minute if the hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to finish the point that I am making. The fact that some people do choose to go abroad for very good reasons—

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howarth: No. I have said that I will give way in a moment.

The fact that some people do choose to go abroad for very good reasons does not make it any the less a voluntary activity. For the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden to pretend otherwise is to mislead not only the House but those who are following his arguments at home.

Mr. Garnier: If the passport system is voluntary and the link between the passport and the giving of information for the national identity register is voluntary, why are the Government proposing to fine people for not providing that information?

Mr. Howarth: For the very obvious reason that, as far as I understand it, they were moving over to biometric-based information for passports anyway, so that process was already in hand and, unrelated to the Bill, that would have happened anyway.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howarth: No, I will not give way to my hon. Friend. There is very little time left and if I give way someone else will not be able to speak.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden raised a second, more general point against identity cards on the grounds that having such a biometric database would effectively open up the way for fraudsters, terrorists and anyone else to access the system.

David Davis indicated assent.

Mr. Howarth: I see that the right hon. Gentleman nods, so that is part of his argument. But he is urging us to agree with the Lords in an amendment that would effectively create two databases of that kind. In other words, if his argument were correct—I do not necessarily accept it, but in his own terms—he is arguing for two separate opportunities for those breaches of security that he fears. The right hon. Gentleman has not in the least persuaded me with his arguments.

Finally, it has been well established during the course of this debate, not least by one of my hon. Friends who was responsible for drafting the Labour party manifesto, that it was quite clear what was intended. It was absolutely clear at that time and it has been made even clearer in our subsequent debates on the subject. Frankly, for the House of Lords to reject this one more time would be in breach—

David Davis rose—

Mr. Howarth: Let me finish this point and I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman. It would in fact be in breach of the Salisbury convention and it would be an outrageous abuse of the Lords' powers and privileges.

David Davis: I was not going to make this point, but, since the hon. Gentleman appeared to accuse me of misleading the House, I will. It is clear that the manifesto was intended to mislead. It was intended to be capable of being interpreted in two different ways.

Mr. Howarth: I did not actually accuse the right hon. Gentleman of misleading the House; I accused him of sophistry, and he has compounded that in the intervention that he just made.

It would be outrageous if the House of Lords were to reject the Government's proposals in the Bill one more time, and frankly, it would be playing into the hands of people such as me who believe that it should be abolished anyway.

Tony Baldry: The right hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) knows jolly well and full well that if the Labour manifesto had said in terms that the Government were going to introduce compulsory ID cards, they would have got a raspberry. We all know from our constituency postbags and from conversations on the doorstep that the people of this country are resolutely opposed to compulsory ID cards, and that was why the Labour party manifesto was drafted as it was. No amount of sophistry by the hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) will change the fact that the manifesto made it very clear that this is intended to be a voluntary measure.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mark Fisher) made an excellent contribution today, as he did on Monday, and he summarised this debate neatly on Monday when he said:

> "If we believe in a voluntary scheme, as the Home Secretary and the manifesto say that we do, there is no way that we can reject the Lords amendments. By rejecting the amendments, the Government will be opting for compulsion."

What the Government are seeking to do is simply that—opting for compulsion.

But even today the Home Secretary keeps trying. He abandoned his attempts on Monday. On Monday he tried to persuade the House that it was not compulsion—that somehow it was voluntary as to whether or not we actually went and applied for a passport. So when we decided to go overseas, we got this ludicrous Alice in Wonderland description by the Home Secretary:

"That is the free will that people may exercise in deciding whether or not they wish to have a passport—[Interruption.] That is the free will over what they can do and how they can operate. That is what the wording means."—[Official Report, 13 March 2006, Vol. 443, c. 1260–1.]

It is completely crazy.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that what the Lords amendments actually do is to bring the Bill in line with what the Labour party manifesto said at the last general election?

Tony Baldry: What the Lords amendments do, and what Opposition Members want to do, is very simple: we want it to be voluntary; those on the Labour Benches want it to be compulsory.

Chris Bryant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Baldry: No.

As the House of Lords Select Committee on the Constitution said,

"we continue to believe that the constitutional significance of the Bill is that it adjusts the fundamental relationship between the individual and the State."

If one is going to adjust the fundamental relationship between the individual and the state—an issue of some importance—one would have thought that that would be clearly set out in the manifesto. If the Government want to introduce compulsory ID cards, let them come to the House with a Bill to do so, and let them not do so through the back door, as they are seeking to do.

Laura Moffatt: I suspect that many of my constituents—I do not choose to speak on behalf of other hon. Members' constituents, as has been done in the House—consider the debate with absolute dismay, as those of us who engaged with our constituents and surveyed and invited comments know. The numbers in my constituency were overwhelmingly in favour of an identity card, and they continue to be so. My constituents will know, having had an opportunity to see the debate, that there is another motive behind the Opposition supporting the other House in its attempt.

The reason I absolutely depart from some of the spurious arguments on why the Bill should not proceed is that I hear the same Opposition Members who argue for clarity in databases and say that we must have a single database—I cite child protection and many other issues that are before the House—using an entirely separate argument in this case.

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [13 February 2006].

Question put, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their amendments Nos. 16 and 22, but does not insist on its amendment No. 22C and proposes amendments (a) and (b) in lieu thereof.

The House divided: Ayes 292, Noes 241.

Division No. 194] [2.30 pm

AYES

Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burden, Richard
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coaker, Mr. Vernon
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Cousins, Jim
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Farrelly, Paul
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.

Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Kilfoyle, Mr. Peter
Knight, Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moon, Mrs. Madeleine
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, David
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Todd, Mr. Mark
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Usher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. John Heppell and Mr. Dave Watts

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Breed, Mr. Colin
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Conway, Derek
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Duddridge, James
Duncan, Mr. Alan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Fisher, Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Galloway, Mr. George
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hoey, Kate
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Hosie, Stewart
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jackson, Glenda
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Lynne
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Key, Robert
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Knight, rh Mr. Greg
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian

Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Love, Mr. Andrew
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
Maclean, rh David
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McDonnell, John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Mercer, Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Roseindell, Andrew
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Short, rh Clare
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Steen, Mr. Anthony
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, David
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Williams, Mark
Williams, Mr. Roger
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Andrew Selous and Mr. Tobias Ellwood

Question accordingly agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 16 and 22 disagreed to.

Amendments (a) and (b) agreed to.

Terrorism Bill

Lords reasons for insisting on amendments and disagreeing to Commons amendments, considered.

Lords reasons: 5A, 11A, 31A and 34C

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their Amendments 5, 11, 31 and 34 and insists on its Amendment 34B but does not insist on its disagreement with the Lords in their Amendment 28 and proposes the following Amendment in lieu:—

No (a), in page 6, line 24, at end insert—'(8A) The reference in subsection (8) to something that is likely to be understood as an indirect encouragement to the commission or preparation of acts of terrorism or Convention offences includes anything which is likely to be understood as—

(a) the glorification of the commission or preparation (whether in the past, in the future or generally) of such acts or such offences; and

(b) a suggestion that what is being glorified is being glorified as conduct that should be emulated in existing circumstances.'. —[Mr. Charles Clarke.]

2.45 pm

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this we will consider the following: leave out from "following" to the end and insert in lieu amendment (b), in page 2, line 1, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

'( ) for the purposes of this section, "indirect encouragement" comprises the making of a statement referring to terrorism in such a way that the listener, reader or viewer would infer that he should emulate it.'.

Amendment (c), in page 6, line 24, at end insert—

'(8A) The reference in subsection (8) to something that is capable of being understood as an indirect encouragement to the commission or preparation of acts of terrorism or Convention offences comprises the making of a statement referring to terrorism in such a way that the listener, reader or viewer would infer that he should emulate it.'.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): The effect of my motion is simple. It effectively reinstates the wording that this House has previously decided on and rejects the attempts of the other place to remove all references to glorification from the Bill. I can be brief in my remarks because I set out in detail what was wrong with the amendments made by another place when we last discussed the issue on 15 February, and I do not intend to return to that debate.

I am pleased to say that one objection to those amendments has been removed. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) has perhaps realised that his assertion that he was "not wholly persuaded by the argument that listening cannot encompass reading."—[Official Report, 15 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 1435.]

is not really sustainable. I accept that today's amendments from the Opposition parties do at least seek to remedy the weakness that we reflected in the debate that we had last time, but the reference solely to "listener" was not the only thing that was wrong with the amendments.

The amendments from the other place are defective because instead of containing an exemplary description of what "indirect encouragement" could be, they provide an exhaustive description. In other words, the offence is limited so that it is committed by making available to the public a statement directly encouraging terrorism, or a statement indirectly encouraging it but only by actually describing it in such a way that the listener will infer that he should emulate it. To put that simply, the use of the word "describing" in the Lords amendments means that the Bill would not catch, as the original wording would, glorification, praise or celebration of an act of terrorism that does not actually describe the act. Although the amendments that have now been tabled by the Opposition parties do not rely on the word "describing", the same type of objection still applies to them. The use of the word "comprises" makes them exhaustive.

[Mr. Charles Clarke]

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Instead of using the word "describe" our amendment uses the phrase "referring to terrorism". Can the Home Secretary give me an example of when glorifying terrorism would not have to make a reference to it as an activity?

Mr. Clarke: The point that I was making is that the amendment seeks to provide an exhaustive description, which, in my opinion, does not meet the original position put forward by the House. That is precisely why we think that the amendments made in the other place and the amendments tabled by the Opposition should not be accepted here.

The removal of the reference to glorification, which appears to be the purpose of the amendments made in the other place, appears to be the position of the official Opposition, although it is difficult to be sure. On Tuesday, the official Opposition tabled amendments jointly with the Liberal Democrats that included the word "glorifying", but by yesterday those amendments had been replaced by Conservative amendments that do not make reference to glorification. In the other place, those on the Conservative Front Bench urged their colleagues not to vote against the Commons on those points. No doubt we will receive some clarification on that from the Opposition spokesman.

Mr. Grieve: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will, but I warn the hon. Gentleman that I will not give way to him again in this speech because he will be making his own speech later in this short debate.

Mr. Grieve: On the whole, I am genuinely trying to see whether I can reach a consensus with the Home Secretary. For that reason, I considered whether it would be possible, within the restricted ambit of the word "comprise", to give the Prime Minister his "glorifying" word, so that his ego would be satisfied, but after I had put the amendment down on the blues—I take responsibility for this—it seemed to me, for the very reason that I gave to the Home Secretary, that I could not think of a single example of when glorification would not involve a reference to terrorism. One cannot glorify something without referring to it. In fact, in lawyers' language, the word was otiose and surplusage and I have no business tabling an amendment that includes something that is completely unnecessary and serves no purpose whatever.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for that explanation. Trying to help the Prime Minister's ego is a new task for Opposition spokespeople. I am delighted that they are diverting their energies to that.

What of the Liberal Democrats? No one—including them, probably—has any idea where they stand. On Tuesday they were with the Conservatives in accepting "glorifying". On Wednesday they had parted company from the Conservatives, but today they are back with the Conservatives and opposing "glorifying". It is such typical behaviour from the Liberal Democrats that perhaps it is not worth considering.

The case for including glorification is strong. It is a clear and well understood English word that captures better than any other word some of the conduct that we are trying to deal with in the Bill. As I have said, I imagine that that is why the press have picked up and focused on the word. They know what it means and they know that their readers understand it. It was and, I hope, will be perfectly clear in the Bill for the sake of the courts. It is also a word that the nations of the world were prepared to accept last September when they voted to adopt UN Security Council resolution 1624, which features that word. We should uphold it in Parliament.

As I have also pointed out before, in light of the attention given to the issue of glorification, if we were now to remove it from the Bill the courts would be fully justified in reaching one obvious conclusion—that Parliament did not intend glorification of terrorism to fall within the scope of the encouragement offence. If any hon. Members doubt that, they might like to read a judgment given by the Lords of Appeal only last week. In the course of his remarks, Lord Bingham of Cornhill said:

> "There is no warrant for treating Parliament as having meant something it did not say".

That clarification, given in the case Regina on application of Gillan and another v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis and another, which was given on 8 March, should cause all of us to be clear that if we take out the word "glorification", there will be understanding of that in the court when the legislation comes through.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, not at the moment.

The reason the Government believe that we need to deal with glorification in our law is clear. People who glorify terrorism help to create a climate in which terrorism is regarded as acceptable. They help to persuade impressionable members of their audiences that they have a moral duty to kill innocent people in pursuit of whatever ideology they have espoused.

In recent times, we have seen threats from extremists who claim to represent Islam. Leaders of the Muslim community in the UK and elsewhere have quite properly and very strongly made it clear that such views do not represent true Islam. However, there are, nevertheless, people who may be influenced by those who glorify terrorism and conclude that they have a duty to kill and injure innocent bystanders in the misguided belief that they are bound to do so.

I should also remind the House that glorification features in the Bill as an example of what is encompassed by the concept of indirect encouragement. It is not self-contained. Glorification as an offence is a subset of indirect encouragement as an offence, and can be committed only if the conditions surrounding the main offence are met. Key among those conditions is the requirement that there must be an intention that others should be induced to commit terrorist offences or subjective recklessness on this point. Glorification without intention of emulation or subjective recklessness cannot constitute an offence.

Mr. Grieve: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not give way.

That is a very important safeguard and gives the lie to some of the fanciful claims that have been made about perfectly innocent statements falling foul of this legislation. In part we can have such confidence because of the requirement in the Bill, as this House passed it, for the glorification to relate to conduct that could be emulated in existing circumstances. The amendments from the Opposition parties remove this requirement. I am quite willing to believe that the proposers did not intend to extend the scope of the offence in this undesirable way, but they must speak for themselves, as I am sure the hon. Member for Beaconsfield will do in a moment, and justify their own drafting.

Another important consideration in this debate is that the creation of an offence of glorification was a specific commitment in the manifesto on which my party fought and won the general election less than a year ago. That goes hand in hand with the question of which House should prevail in any dispute between the two Houses. In Committee and on Report the House voted explicitly on the question of whether this Bill should contain references to glorification. It endorsed the proposition by majorities of 16 and 25 respectively. The Bill then had an unopposed Third Reading and proceeded to another place.

The other place is a revising Chamber and can invite this House to think again. That is precisely what happened in respect of glorification, and other aspects of the Bill as well. Although I disagreed with the views of another place, I made no complaint as to its conduct up to that point. However, the Bill then returned to this House. On 15 February we had a lengthy debate on the whole issue and voted by a majority of 38 to include glorification in the Bill. We thought again, as the other place requested, and reaffirmed our original decision. At that point, I would have expected the unelected House to concede, and I am disappointed that it did not do so.

The elected House must prevail and I hope that the motion standing in my name will pass by the largest possible majority, so that it is clear to Members of another place what form Members of the elected House want the legislation to take.

Mr. Grieve: I rise to respond to the Home Secretary and to speak to amendments (b) and (a) to his amendment in lieu.

The Home Secretary has failed to explain the scope of his proposal, from which flow a large number of the problems with which the House is grappling. He came close to touching on that matter a moment ago, but whenever he comes close to it, he veers off, because an explanation would make nonsense of the Government's entire argument.

The glorification of terrorism is not being made an offence, thank goodness. If the glorification of terrorism on its own were made an offence, it would mean, as we have said on many occasions, that anybody who celebrates Robin Hood, the peasants revolt or Spartacus would be liable to prosecution. Furthermore, the poor old Taoiseach would be liable to prosecution when he comes over here after celebrating the Easter rising next month in Dublin, which he intends to do. Mercifully, that is not the Government's objective.

The Government's approach must be based on the Prime Minister's ego, because there is no other rational explanation. Having produced a Bill that contains draconian and powerful provisions to criminalise the indirect encouragement of terrorism—something that we support—the Home Secretary has insisted on including in clause 1(4) a most extraordinary subsection, which suggests that the courts should have particular regard to an example that he is offering: the possibility that glorification falls within the scope of indirect encouragement. At the same time, he has provided the suggestion that members of the public would reasonably be expected to infer that what is being glorified is being glorified as conduct that should be emulated by them in existing circumstances—I think that the Taoiseach would still be in some difficulty, because quite a few people in Northern Ireland think that any celebration of the Easter rising does exactly that.

The key point is that every single judge and lawyer to whom I have spoken has highlighted the fact that including such a concept is woolly, opaque and unclear, that the word, "glorify", is not known in our law and that the definition of "glorify" as praise or celebration is very poor. The provision appears to be deliberately aimed at people who might wish to celebrate as part of their culture episodes that would fall within the Government's catch-all definition of terrorism. Above all, it is entirely unnecessary in meeting the Government's objective, and the Home Secretary has said nothing this afternoon to explain why it needs to be included in the Bill.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Surely the Home Secretary's claim that judges will take it as a signal if this is cut out has no merit. The judges will know perfectly well that it was cut out because it is unnecessary given that any offence that it would catch would be caught under existing legislation.

3 pm

Mr. Grieve: There is no doubt that in many respects the Bill is a belt and braces job. As we pointed out to the Government, the truth is that there are perfectly good laws on the statute book that could be used instead of clause 1 or many other clauses. I must admit that I will probably not lose a huge amount of sleep over that, provided that the legislation that we enact is rational, fair, makes sense and, if I may say to the Home

[Mr. Grieve]

Secretary, does not provide a lawyer's field day of casuistic arguments whereby every person who is prosecuted under the glorification clause will take the courts up hill and down dale day after day, and eventually be acquitted, probably on the direction of a judge, because it is all completely unintelligible.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Does my hon. Friend know whether, following the Danish embassy demonstrations, the police have requested any additional powers that they do not already have?

Mr. Grieve: The police certainly do not need additional powers to deal with a demonstration outside the Danish embassy. I was rather depressed to read today that although some prosecutions have been started, there are problems in identifying some of the people who participated because, of course, nobody was arrested at the time or shortly thereafter. That is a policing matter, but it is not exactly encouraging for those of us who wish to see that sort of behaviour stopped—something that I suspect is true of every single hon. Member.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): ID cards might have been quite useful.

Mr. Grieve: If nobody knows who is holding up the placard because that person is wearing a dish dash in such a way that all that can be seen is his eyes, what possible use would an identity card be? I am afraid that Government Front Benchers are living in fantasy land as regards terrorist offences, and one need only engage in any sort of debate for the fantasies that are besetting them to become increasingly apparent.

I say this to the Home Secretary: we have genuinely been trying to see whether we can reach agreement with the Government on the problem that has been posed by the Prime Minister's ego and his slavish adherence to the word "glorification". If one is French, that word does not feature in the debate at all, because the equivalent word is, "apologie", which means "vindication" and is entirely different. For those in the international community, the failure of this House to enact the glorification clause would not be the most seismic event ever, because what they actually want to see is terrorists and those who encourage terrorism brought to justice. That is the matter on which the House should be concentrating.

Mindful of that, we tried to see whether we could reach some measure of agreement. That is why the amendments that I have tabled, on which, I am glad to say, we will be able to vote before voting on the Home Secretary's proposition, would provide the framework for doing that. The Home Secretary's suggestion that the word "listening" might not encompass viewing or reading struck me as having force. Indeed, if there had been an opportunity for a full debate and vote in the House of Lords, it might have been possible to do something about that there. That classically illustrates how our parliamentary procedure does not work very well. Here we have an opportunity to remedy that minor criticism.

On top of that, as the Home Secretary will have noted, we have removed the word, "describing", in relation to terrorism because he said that it is possible to glorify terrorism without describing it—I think that it is quite difficult, but I can see that it is a drafting argument—and replaced it with the word, "referring". Can the Home Secretary give me any example of where it would be possible to glorify something without referring to it? I have to say that I do not think that that argument would get very far.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I have examined the amendments that the hon. Gentleman tabled. Will he assure us that, if they were carried, became part of the Bill and subsequently law, they could not lead to the same sort of perverse prosecutions, which, as he rightly said earlier, are possible under the glorification clause?

Mr. Grieve: I believe that they will be a great improvement because they focus on what Parliament wants to achieve. My judgment is that Parliament wants to prevent people from indirectly encouraging terrorism by referring to it in such a way that the listener, reader or viewer, who heard, read or saw whatever was said would infer that he should emulate it. I have always accepted that glorification could constitute an offence if a reference to terrorism was made in such a way that a listener, reader or viewer inferred that he should emulate it. Our amendment removes the focus from a concept that should have no part in our law. People should be allowed to celebrate the Easter rising in Dublin without thinking that they are beginning to fall foul of the measure. They celebrate it not only in Dublin, but, for all I know, in west London.

Jeremy Corbyn: And in north London.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman may be right—there could be more such celebrations. In my part of London, celebrations of the Easter rising will undoubtedly take place. The Irish centre is within a few hundred yards of my home.

Let me reassure the hon. Gentleman. If he accepts that indirect encouragement of terrorism should be criminalised, he should have no fear about supporting our amendment. It gets round the problem of the Government's concept.

The clause that covers proscribing organisations specifically focuses on glorification. Again, the amendment would remove that focus and provide that, if an organisation referred to terrorism in a way that made people infer that they should emulate it, it would fall foul of the proscription provision. However, simply glorifying something would not fall foul of the provision. Some glorification will undoubtedly constitute a reference to behaviour and terrorism in a way that encourages emulation but some will not. The amendment would get rid of the concept of glorification. That is a great improvement.

I am waiting for the Home Secretary to intervene because no coherent argument has been advanced for the Government's reason for getting so hooked on the inclusion of glorification. I do not know what will happen when the Bill returns to the other place. I note that, for something that has become so intimately bound up with the Prime Minister's ego, when it previously returned to the Lords, only 156 out of 208 Labour peers turned up to support the proposals, even in the Government's great heave to show their mettle. Indeed, some Labour peers supported us.

Mr. Charles Clarke: What was the position of Opposition Front Benchers in the Lords in the debate? What were the reasons for their position?

Mr. Grieve: The Home Secretary can read what my noble Friend Lord Kingsland said. He took the view that the Government's slavish adherence to glorification was unproductive. He and many other peers on the Front and Back Benches criticised that. However, he said that the Opposition believed that the argument might have been exhausted and they therefore abstained on the vote. So many peers of all parties, including the Labour party, took objection to "glorification" that they defeated the Government despite the Government's turning out their troops in large numbers. That is a telling indication of the independent mindedness of the other place. For that reason, when the Bill returned here, I went to much trouble to ascertain whether there is a way in which we can square the circle.

At one stage, I drafted an amendment that made use of the words "referring or glorifying". I try to apply a bit of logic to what I do, and I hope that the Home Secretary will forgive me for saying that I could see no basis on which the word "glorifying" in that context would add anything at all to the legislation.

This is what worries me about the Government's approach. When we read the Bill, we see that the Government have created an offence and then, in a bizarre way, put in a subsection that draws specific attention to an activity that they want to criminalise or condemn. That is very bad law. It would have made sense, had the Government persevered—I am glad that they did not—and said that glorifying terrorism was in itself an offence. Mercifully, they did not go down that road, because enough people pointed out to them that that would have been a completely loopy proposal. What we have here, however, is a remnant of that loopiness. The House should not be in the business of encouraging loopy legislation.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments closely. What comfort does he draw from the clear statement by Baroness Scotland, who speaks for the Government on this issue in the other place? When she was asked by my noble Friend Lord Clinton-Davis whether there would be an opportunity to revisit this matter soon, she conceded that there would be "bound to be" such an opportunity. What comfort does the hon. Gentleman draw from that?

Mr. Grieve: A pretty limited amount. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government have said that at some point—probably not in the next parliamentary Session, but possibly the one after that—there could be a huge terrorism Bill to bring together all the many terrorism and anti-terrorism Bills that the Government have enacted in the past five years. We seem to move between terrorism Bills and anti-terrorism Bills. We have heard about the possibility of such a Bill in the context of control orders. I hope that, in the course of producing such a Bill, some of the loopier things that we have done will disappear down the plughole. That would include allowing people to be deemed to be members of a proscribed organisation on the basis of the hearsay evidence of a police officer. That measure has never been used since it was introduced. There are an awful lot of added-on bits that we could get rid of. However, we are in the hands of the Government, and I can easily envisage the circumstances in which the Home Secretary—despite having been completely honest when making the point in relation to control orders—could come to the House in 18 months' time and say, "I'm sorry, but there is insufficient parliamentary time. We'll have to put this off for another two years."

In the meantime, the House should not put on the statute book a measure that is plainly idiotic and wrong. This problem could so easily be cured. If we were to cure it by adopting my amendment, the Bill would have every bit as much bite. It would be able to deal with those whom we wish to prosecute, and it would be able to help to uphold the rule of law without making us a laughing stock for having adopted a concept so opaque that it will be unintelligible when presented in court.

Hon. Members should also bear in mind the important point that certain law-abiding sections of society feel that they are being targeted by anti-terrorist activity. That is an almost inevitable consequence, but we must keep it in mind. It is my view—I wish it were the Home Secretary's view—that, in using terms such as "glorification" when they are not necessary to achieve our objective, we do ourselves no favours in the battle for hearts and minds that we have to win. That battle will have to go together with everything else that we do, if we are to curb the terrorist threat in this country.

For those reasons, I invite hon. Members to support our amendments in lieu of the Home Secretary's proposition. If we do not succeed in that regard, my colleagues and I will stand by the Lords amendments and vote against the Home Secretary's proposition.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): In this debate, as in the earlier one on the Identity Cards Bill, the Government have revealed a curious attachment to a single, ill-defined word. The debate on identity cards highlighted their somewhat spectacular redefinition of the word "voluntary". Now we are dealing with a Government—or more precisely a Prime Minister—who appear to be absolutely insistent on another word, "glorification". A petulant insistence on the use of a particular word does not make good law.

The Government's position is weak on three counts. First, as was said earlier, there is no legally understood definition of the word "glorification". It confuses the law, creating unnecessary imprecision and fluidity. That should not happen to a law that deals with such an important issue as tackling terrorism. The Joint Committee on Human Rights objected to the term on exactly that ground—legal imprecision—and we have still not heard a compelling argument from the Government to refute that view.

Secondly, the provision adds nothing other than confusion to existing laws that are deployed effectively to tackle many of the problems that it is supposed to address. The arrest yesterday of a number of protesters who used sickening and inflammatory language on their placards when demonstrating against the anti-Islamic cartoons published in Denmark shows that current laws against incitement appear to be working fairly well, although there was some delay in that case.

[Mr. Nick Clegg]

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Surely the hon. Gentleman agrees that the enormous delay in the effecting of those arrests and the very small number of people who were arrested, given the large number who were protesting, show that action has not been taken as expeditiously as we would expect—and, indeed, as we saw in the case of the counter-demonstrators who were arrested there and then, and in that of the people who protested in support of liberties in the countryside a few months ago outside the House.

Mr. Clegg: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point about the curious delay in the action taken by the police in arresting the placard protesters, but that is not really relevant to the fact that a law is already available to allow such prosecutions and arrests. There is no obvious loophole that the offence of glorification, even as a subset of indirect encouragement, is required to fill.

Thirdly and most important, the insistence on the term "glorification" will have a chilling effect on freedom of expression. It will lead, in effect, to self-censorship. Its application to any events—I think that this phrase in clause 1 is in parentheses, but it is important none the less—

"whether in the past, in the future or generally"

casts the net extremely wide. Muslim communities in particular, who have an understandable interest in debating and speaking out about conflicts on the west bank or in Gaza, or in Iraq, Chechnya or Kashmir, will find themselves especially vulnerable to the loose application of a poorly worded law. Is that really what we want at a time of heightened sensitivity between Muslim and other faiths?

Of course acts of terrorism, in those places as anywhere else, are abhorrent and must be condemned; but freedom to discuss them should not, surely, be threatened by such loosely worded legislation.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is it not bizarre that while the Home Secretary seems to think that the exclusion of the word "glorification" from the Bill will send a signal to judges—who ought to know better—that the House of Commons thinks that it is okay for people to glorify, he is not worried about the possibility that the inclusion of the word will send the communities to whom the hon. Gentleman referred a misleading signal that they should not dare to mention such subjects in a legitimate debate?

Mr. Clegg: That is an excellent point. The heavy-handed indifference to the effects on our culture of freedom of speech, and particularly the effects on certain communities, is both cavalier and dangerous. We are simply not going to win the battle against terrorism by driving debate underground. That is the fundamental problem with the Government's approach, and their insistence on the use of the word "glorification".

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): My hon. Friend is right to say that the measure will lead to self-censorship. Those of us who have debated the issue at length know that the Government accept that. It is not that they are indifferent; they want us to be censored and self-censored. We see that in many Government proposals. It would be legitimate for the Government to take that view if they had any evidence that sacrificing a freedom would help rather than being counter-productive. There is no such evidence, and we are in danger of losing our freedoms to a Government who do not care about the importance of freedom of expression.

Mr. Clegg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his observations. They strike at the heart of the imbalance in the Government's approach to tackling terrorism, which is sacrificing our cherished freedoms in the way described.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clegg: Yes, but I am keen to make progress.

John Bercow: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman, in the circumstances, for his generosity. He will be aware that a significant number of people from Darfur are in this country seeking asylum or exceptional leave to remain. Would it not be an abomination if such people—in expressing support for the Sudanese People's Liberation Army, or strong opposition to the Government of Sudan or the Arab militias—were held up as supporters of terrorism when what they really want is the opportunity to enjoy civil rights and to live in a free Darfur?

Mr. Clegg: Indeed, and the grotesque effect of poorly drafted legislation that the hon. Gentleman describes is also retrospective. Those who celebrate the Easter uprising or write about the American war of independence could be scooped up by the law in a way that no reasonable person would consider desirable. That is why the amendments before us to clauses 1 and 3, on "indirect encouragement", deserve support from all parts of the House. Their wording is more precise in law, easier to read and more clearly understandable than the convoluted and garbled text on glorification.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clegg: If I may, I shall now address my remarks to the Home Secretary, who referred to the Opposition parties' attempt to find a way to satisfy the rather petulant insistence on the use of the word "glorification" by qualifying and defining it in a way that neuters its ill-judged effects. It was a serious, concerted and sincere attempt to secure agreement in all parts of the House, and if his only reaction to it is to make crass debating points, it will discourage further attempts in other situations to achieve cross-party consensus.

Mr. Charles Clarke: First, the hon. Gentleman should think carefully before describing the United Nations Security Council as petulant in its use of the word

"glorification", particularly given that he represents a party that has a strong tradition of internationalism and of support for the UN. Secondly, such efforts to reach agreement involved the two Opposition parties; they did not involve the Government at all.

Mr. Clegg: With the greatest respect to the Home Secretary, his reaction to our sincere and, as it happens, rather open attempts to reach agreement, as revealed by the amendment, will discourage us the next time that we wish to achieve cross-party agreement on such matters. My recollection is that the UN's use of the word "glorification" was heavily qualified by legal understandings of intention and purposeful activity in the act of glorifying—understandings that have been excluded from this Bill. So the read-across to the UN understanding of "glorification" is not entirely valid.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Surely the Home Secretary's point does not stand up, given that the word "glorification" appears nowhere in the statute book and has never been clarified by the courts. So there is a difference between what happens in diplomatic negotiations and what should be in British law.

Mr. Clegg: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I think that it was addressed to the Home Secretary, and I look forward to his providing clarification.

The Government and the Home Secretary claim that they do not intend the term "glorification", as a sub-clause to the definition of "indirect encouragement", to be used in an unduly lax or imprecise manner, so there appears to be agreement on that, at least. If so, the amendments before us deliver precisely what they want. They also include the refinements described by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), which extend the wording to encompass listener, reader or viewer. There is simply no reasonable reason or excuse left for the Government not to abandon the Prime Minister's stubborn, ill-judged obsession with the word "glorification".

Jeremy Corbyn: I shall be brief, for obvious reasons. I want the Lords to continue to oppose the inclusion of the word "glorification" on the face of the Bill. I am no more a supporter of criminal terrorist acts than is any other hon. Member, but using such loose wording in legislation could be very dangerous. It could lead to some very dangerous and perverse prosecutions.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) gave some examples of how that could happen. Over the years, I have been to many meetings when the virtues of the Easter rising have been extolled, and the speeches made at those meetings could well be construed as glorifying what some people would call a terrorist act. In my part of London, Sir Roger Casement is a figure of veneration, rather than of condemnation, and there is no doubt that that is true in many other places. I have also attended celebrations of India's independence day, when speakers have extolled the virtue of the various figures who played a part in bringing about that independence. In certain circumstances, I am sure that those speakers could be prosecuted under the Bill.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that celebrations of certain parts of Irish history could include readings from the poetry of W.B. Yeats, which could also be caught by the definition in the Bill?

Jeremy Corbyn: I always read Yeats' great poetry to myself, quietly at home, and never in public. However, I take the point: plenty of writings extol things that could be caught by the Bill. Indeed, history is full of accounts of the dreadful things done by British forces abroad—such as massacres in India and elsewhere—that I would argue could be interpreted as terrorist acts. I am not in favour of prosecuting anyone for talking about such matters, but that is the danger of the Bill.

The Home Secretary said that the leaders of the Muslim community in this country have condemned the language used in the demonstration outside the Danish embassy. That is true, but as far as I know, they have not supported the use of the word "glorification" in the Bill, because they see the dangers that would ensue. It does not take a huge imagination to work out that utterly ridiculous and perverse prosecutions could be brought under the Bill. However, it is also possible that a very serious prosecution could be brought—for example, in respect of what an imam might have said after Friday prayers. The matter would be dragged through the courts for months. The prosecution case might collapse, or the imam might be declared innocent, but a cause célèbre and a martyr will have been created in the meantime, and community relations will have been damaged. That is the danger of having such loose wording in the Bill.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the House might be being too kind to the Government by assuming that they have a rationale for the use of the word "glorification" in the Bill? Is it not possible that the Government's aim has been to create an entirely artificial division in the mind of the public? The argument makes the Government appear to be strong on terrorism, while leaving everyone else who oppose the Government—on the Conservative, Liberal Democrat or even Labour Benches—looking somehow weak on the matter. Does he agree that this dangerous legislation could have been introduced for such cynical reasons?

Jeremy Corbyn: No. I always want to be kind to the Government. I am sure that they would not want to promote any such cynical thoughts, although I admit that cynicism sometimes does creep into politics.

A person who plants a bomb that kills people is committing a criminal act, and I remind the House that 12 people from my borough were killed on 7 July last year. Obviously, those responsible should be prosecuted, as it was a criminal act. We already have a law under which such people can be prosecuted for such acts, but I do not understand how loose wording such as "glorification" can help anything. I believe that the use of that word is damaging, and that the perverse prosecutions that I mentioned earlier could create a dangerous situation in community relations.

Jim Cousins: Does my hon. Friend not see that the problem with which the House is now grappling is not that there will be more than a maximum of one prosecution using this concept of glorification—because it will fail at the first hurdle—but rather that the impact of the concept on what I might call the "Holbeck Faults" of our society might be very grave indeed?

[Jim Cousins]

Jeremy Corbyn: Absolutely. The point is that this creates an atmosphere that becomes perverse and dangerous. As has been indicated in earlier debates, my constituency, like many other London constituencies has been the home of many people who were exiled leaders of revolutionary organisations in other countries. We had the leadership of the African National Congress, the SWAPO leadership, people from the Congress party in India and many others who have been condemned for terrorism. In public meetings from time immemorial through to the present, they would make speeches about liberation struggles in other parts of the world that could be construed as glorifying terrorism. I would probably argue that that was not the case, but as has been said, it only takes the failure of one prosecution to damage the law and create martyrs.

The Bill creates an atmosphere in which people feel constrained from speaking out or discussing anything in a rational, political way. It is important that we defend the right to free speech and to discuss history. It is important for teachers and professors to deal in detail with what may or may not have happened in a historical context. Free speech is a precious and important thing.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I agree with the hon. Gentleman. He made the point that the person who placed the bomb that affected his constituents was committing a criminal offence. I think that he will agree with me that the person who caused that bomb to be placed should be committing a criminal offence. That is the case because we have the incitement laws. Does he understand why the incitement laws are suddenly felt to be entirely inadequate for the purpose for which they were passed, and why they are not used to prosecute people who should be prosecuted?

Jeremy Corbyn: I can only agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is clear that placing the bombs on the bus and the train, which killed my constituents and many others, was an illegal, criminal act. The same is true of supplying the material and planning the attack. I fail to understand how putting the word "glorification" on the face of the Bill makes anybody more secure. I think that in reality it creates a more divided community. The police say privately that what is important for security is co-operation between communities. If we reduce that co-operation by criminalising sections of the community, we are on a slippery slope.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): To pursue the intervention by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), does my hon. Friend understand any way in which the word "glorification" will strengthen the situation that the hon. Gentleman has described? As far as I can see, it will do nothing of the sort. It does not add to the situation at all. As my hon. Friend suggested, it can only lead to fraught and unhelpful situations.

Jeremy Corbyn: There is a feeling in Government—it is the same in all Governments—that when something awful happens, they have to be seen to be doing something. The only thing Governments can do, apart from making statements and providing resources for the forces of law and order, is to pass new legislation. So that is what they do, and I suspect, to some extent, that is what we are doing here today. I hope that the Lords stick with it on the issue of glorification. I think that the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) wants to intervene, or maybe he is just waving at me. I am not sure—[Interruption.] Oh, he is just drowning! I give way to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris).

Dr. Evan Harris: In partial, but only partial, defence of the Government's intention, it is fair to point out that while terrorist acts and incitement offences occur, the convention against terrorism requires the Government to introduce a measure against indirect encouragement or incitement, which is what the Bill does. However, as the Joint Committee on Human Rights pointed out, the convention does not require the inclusion of the word "glorification" for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman and other Members have given, which is that it is too vague and too broad.

Jeremy Corbyn: I can but agree with the hon. Gentleman. If the wording is vague and too broad, we will end up with a dangerous situation.

We are all concerned about many issues in the UK and around the world. We want an inclusive society, where people feel able to express their political point of view and to represent causes all over the world. The Bill has international reach; indeed, it has global, even intergalactic, reach—it knows no limit. So let us suppose that we invited elected Members of the Palestinian Authority to address a meeting in the House, as many of us have done over the years. Their speeches describing the situation could be construed as glorifying terrorism. I do not necessarily think that would be the case, but it could happen.

We are moving into dangerous, uncharted waters with the Bill. Perverse prosecutions will bring about serious breakdowns in community relations, and I urge the Government to think carefully and seriously about such a vague and sloppy word as "glorification", when a much closer definition would meet the need for decency and security and deal with people who commit criminal acts, because that is what we are talking about.

Mr. Cash: I have been listening to the debate for some time, and if there has been any serious examination of the meaning of the word "glorification" it has escaped my notice. One might be forgiven for assuming that there was no reference to its interpretation in the Bill.

In earlier debates on the measure, I pointed out that I thought it would be extremely difficult for courts to construe a meaning. The definition in clause 20 notes that glorification

"includes any form of praise or celebration".

Mr. Grieve: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cash: I think not, and that is not because I suspect that my hon. Friend will raise a point that I had not thought of.

With respect to the context of the use of the word "glorification", I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's view that the Prime Minister is on a bit of an ego trip. The Prime Minister has stuck closely to the assumption that the word has to remain in the Bill. The word is defined in various dictionaries and that, after all, is the only basis on which the courts can make a construction.

For people who are concerned about the connection between glorification and terrorism in the Islamic context, the rather dangerous first definition—from the point of view that things could spin out of control—is that the word means to praise and worship God. Those who know and understand something about the meaning of Islam and the proper reverence attached to the word "Allah" will realise that it could mean that anybody who was found to have glorified God in that context would automatically find a conflation between God on the one hand and terrorism on the other. That is an extremely difficult area.

I notice that the Home Secretary is chuntering and saying "Ridiculous". If he thinks that that was ridiculous, he should look at the dictionary. The courts will have to construe those words and that was the first definition given.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. Friend is making an important point. As he is showing, one of the things that the Home Secretary has done is to give constant illustrative definitions but no comprehensive definitions, so the scope is wide. As my hon. Friend says, glorification could be much more than praise and celebration, even though praise and celebration are singled out in the Bill. Does he agree that that is part of the mischief of passing such opaque legislation? It leaves people in uncertainty, which is a bad principle on which to legislate.

Mr. Cash: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend, and I go further and say that the second definition that is given is to "reveal the glory of God by one's actions".

Even the Home Secretary, even the Prime Minister, cannot ignore the definitions that are given, for example, in the "Oxford dictionary". When we are dealing with words, as Lewis Carroll said, words mean what we choose them to mean.

"The question is"

who is

"to be master—that's all."

In that context, we know from the "Parkinson" interview where the Prime Minister puts himself in this case. He raises his eyes to heaven; he invokes God for guidance. So we are moving into very deep water here.

My next point relates to the alternative definition that is given, which is to "describe or represent as admirable, especially unjustifiably".

If that is the definition that the Government want—I am amazed that they have not attempted to define the word "glorification" more precisely—they could have chosen that definition, which might have helped them out of some of the difficulties, but no, they insist that the only definition that they want is the one that I started off with, which merely includes any form of praise or celebration. They have moved into dangerous territory; they are actually inviting those of the Islamic fundamentalist disposition to make the worst of this when it crops up. The courts will be forced into a definition. The Government are negligent in not having provided a more precise definition. If the Government cannot come up with a precise definition, they should abandon the words and go back to the wording that has been suggested by the Conservative Front Bench.

It is perfectly simple. The Home Secretary is in a trap—the trap that has been laid for him unwittingly by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister should take note of what is being said. I have no doubt that, as a result of the lack of a definition, the Bill is seriously defective and the Lords have every right to reject the amendment if a majority in the House sends it back to them.

David T.C. Davies: I shall try to be briefer than some of the speakers this afternoon, but we should think carefully before we pass a clause that is so open to misinterpretation, as hon. Members have pointed out. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said, anyone celebrating the Easter rising could be subject to prosecution under the terms of this clause. Slightly closer to home and within the United Kingdom, a few years ago in Cardiff a pub opened called "The Cayo Arms", named after the leader of the Free Wales Army; I presume that under the scope of the clause, anyone who was inside, celebrating the action of the Free Wales Army, would also be subject to prosecution.

John Bercow: Nor is the list as narrow as some might suppose. Would my hon. Friend not accept that it is not simply a question of forming a view and commenting on particular events? People could be trapped under the provision if they were, for example, to express admiration or general support for the activities of the Karen National Liberation Army in perfectly properly resisting the oppressive state apparatus in Burma.

David T.C. Davies: My hon. Friend makes an important point and he is renowned for his interest in human rights. But I think that we have a right to ask ourselves how confident we can be that a measure that will impinge on freedom of speech should be passed by a Government who have probably lost the confidence of members of the public. Two days before the Queen's Speech in 2004, which was when this Bill was first mooted, the front page of the Daily Mail contained a headline about a hijack attempt on Canary Wharf by al-Qaeda operatives. I have looked in vain ever since for any evidence of arrests or of people being charged, but there has been absolutely none.

I suggest to the Home Secretary that that article was deliberately placed into the Daily Mail before the Queen's Speech in a shoddy attempt to stoke up public opinion to get people to support this measure in the first place. [Interruption.] The Home Secretary laughs—so perhaps when he sums up, he will tell us whether or not the security services were briefed to talk to the Daily Mail. If the security services were briefed to talk to the Daily Mail, perhaps the Home Secretary could tell us why. If they were not briefed to do so, perhaps he could tell us why he did not order the same sort of investigation to hunt down the mole in MI5 or MI6 who spoke to the Daily Mail in exactly the same way as the Government shamefully hunted down—

It being one hour after the commencement of proceedings MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour, pursuant to Order [15 February 2006].

Amendment proposed: (b), in page 2, line 1, leave out subsection (4) and insert—

'( ) for the purposes of this section, "indirect encouragement" comprises the making of a statement referring to terrorism in such a way that the listener, reader or viewer would infer that he should emulate it.'.—[Mr. Grieve.]

The House divided: Ayes 230, Noes 298.

Division No. 195] [3.45 pm

AYES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Conway, Derek
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Duddridge, James
Duncan, Mr. Alan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Ellwood, Mr. Tobias
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Galloway, Mr. George
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Mitchell, Mr. Andrew
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rosindell, Andrew
Rowen, Paul
Ruffley, Mr. David
Russell, Bob
Salmond, Mr. Alex
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Short, rh Clare
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Williams, Mark
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wiltshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Ayes: Andrew Selous and Mr. Roger Williams

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret

Begg, Miss Anne
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Blunkett, rh Mr. David
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Diamond, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Elman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
Jackson, Glenda
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Knight, Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Malkaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, David
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Ussher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Ward, Claire
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David
Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Vernon Coaker and Tony Cunningham

Question accordingly negatived.

Amendment disagreed to.

Question put, That the motion be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 296, Noes 237.

Division No. 196] [4 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Ainger, Nick
Ainsworth, rh Mr. Bob
Alexander, rh Mr. Douglas
Allen, Mr. Graham
Anderson, Mr. David
Anderson, Janet
Armstrong, rh Hilary
Atkins, Charlotte
Austin, Mr. Ian
Austin, John
Bailey, Mr. Adrian
Baird, Vera
Balls, Ed
Banks, Gordon
Barlow, Ms Celia
Barron, rh Mr. Kevin
Battle, rh John
Bayley, Hugh
Beckett, rh Margaret
Begg, Miss Anne
Benn, rh Hilary
Benton, Mr. Joe
Berry, Roger
Betts, Mr. Clive
Blackman, Liz
Blackman-Woods, Dr. Roberta
Blears, rh Hazel
Blizzard, Mr. Bob
Borrow, Mr. David S.
Bradshaw, Mr. Ben
Brennan, Kevin
Brown, rh Mr. Gordon
Brown, Lyn
Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas
Brown, Mr. Russell
Browne, rh Mr. Des
Bryant, Chris
Buck, Ms Karen
Burgon, Colin
Burnham, Andy
Butler, Ms Dawn
Byers, rh Mr. Stephen
Byrne, Mr. Liam
Campbell, Mr. Alan
Campbell, Mr. Ronnie
Caton, Mr. Martin
Cawsey, Mr. Ian
Challen, Colin
Chaytor, Mr. David
Clark, Ms Katy
Clark, Paul
Clarke, rh Mr. Charles
Clelland, Mr. David
Clwyd, rh Ann
Coffey, Ann
Cohen, Harry
Connarty, Michael
Cooper, Rosie
Cooper, Yvette
Crausby, Mr. David
Creagh, Mary
Cruddas, Jon
Cryer, Mrs. Ann
Cummings, John
Cunningham, Mr. Jim
Cunningham, Tony
Curtis-Thomas, Mrs. Claire
Darling, rh Mr. Alistair
David, Mr. Wayne
Davidson, Mr. Ian
Dean, Mrs. Janet
Denham, rh Mr. John
Devine, Mr. Jim
Dhanda, Mr. Parmjit
Dismore, Mr. Andrew
Dobbin, Jim
Dobson, rh Frank
Doran, Mr. Frank
Dowd, Jim
Drew, Mr. David
Eagle, Angela
Efford, Clive
Ellman, Mrs. Louise
Engel, Natascha
Field, rh Mr. Frank
Fitzpatrick, Jim
Flello, Mr. Robert
Flint, Caroline
Flynn, Paul
Follett, Barbara
Foster, Mr. Michael (Worcester)
Foster, Michael Jabez (Hastings and Rye)
Francis, Dr. Hywel
Gapes, Mike
Gardiner, Barry
George, rh Mr. Bruce
Gerrard, Mr. Neil
Gibson, Dr. Ian
Gilroy, Linda
Godsiff, Mr. Roger
Goggins, Paul
Goodman, Helen
Griffith, Nia
Griffiths, Nigel
Grogan, Mr. John
Gwynne, Andrew
Hall, Mr. Mike
Hamilton, Mr. Fabian
Hanson, Mr. David
Harman, rh Ms Harriet
Harris, Mr. Tom
Havard, Mr. Dai
Healey, John
Henderson, Mr. Doug
Hendrick, Mr. Mark
Hepburn, Mr. Stephen
Heppell, Mr. John
Hesford, Stephen
Hewitt, rh Ms Patricia
Heyes, David
Hill, rh Keith
Hillier, Meg
Hodgson, Mrs. Sharon
Hoon, rh Mr. Geoffrey
Hope, Phil
Howarth, rh Mr. George
Howells, Dr. Kim
Hoyle, Mr. Lindsay
Hughes, rh Beverley
Humble, Mrs. Joan
Hutton, rh Mr. John
Iddon, Dr. Brian
Illsley, Mr. Eric
Ingram, rh Mr. Adam
Irranca-Davies, Huw
James, Mrs. Siân C.
Jenkins, Mr. Brian
Johnson, Ms Diana R.
Jones, Helen
Jones, Mr. Kevan
Jones, Mr. Martyn
Jowell, rh Tessa
Joyce, Mr. Eric
Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald
Keeble, Ms Sally
Keeley, Barbara
Keen, Alan
Keen, Ann
Kelly, rh Ruth
Kemp, Mr. Fraser
Kennedy, rh Jane
Khabra, Mr. Piara S.
Khan, Mr. Sadiq
Kidney, Mr. David
Knight, Jim
Ladyman, Dr. Stephen
Lammy, Mr. David
Laxton, Mr. Bob
Lazarowicz, Mark
Lepper, David
Lewis, Mr. Ivan
Linton, Martin
Love, Mr. Andrew
Lucas, Ian
MacDougall, Mr. John
Mackinlay, Andrew
MacShane, rh Mr. Denis
Mactaggart, Fiona
Mahmood, Mr. Khalid
Malik, Mr. Shahid
Mallaber, Judy
Mann, John
Marris, Rob
Marsden, Mr. Gordon
Marshall, Mr. David
Martlew, Mr. Eric
McAvoy, rh Mr. Thomas
McCabe, Steve
McCafferty, Chris
McCarthy, Kerry
McCarthy-Fry, Sarah
McCartney, rh Mr. Ian
McDonagh, Siobhain
McFadden, Mr. Pat
McFall, rh Mr. John
McGovern, Mr. Jim
McGuire, Mrs. Anne
McIsaac, Shona
McKechin, Ann
McKenna, Rosemary
McNulty, Mr. Tony
Meale, Mr. Alan
Merron, Gillian
Michael, rh Alun
Miliband, rh Mr. David
Miliband, Edward
Miller, Andrew
Moffat, Anne
Moffatt, Laura
Mole, Chris
Moran, Margaret
Morden, Jessica
Morley, Mr. Elliot
Mountford, Kali
Mullin, Mr. Chris
Munn, Meg
Murphy, Mr. Denis
Murphy, Mr. Jim
Norris, Dan
O'Brien, Mr. Mike
O'Hara, Mr. Edward
Olner, Mr. Bill
Osborne, Sandra
Owen, Albert
Palmer, Dr. Nick
Pearson, Ian
Plaskitt, Mr. James
Pope, Mr. Greg
Pound, Stephen
Prentice, Bridget
Prentice, Mr. Gordon
Prescott, rh Mr. John
Primarolo, rh Dawn
Prosser, Gwyn
Purchase, Mr. Ken
Purnell, James
Rammell, Bill
Raynsford, rh Mr. Nick
Reed, Mr. Andy
Reid, rh John
Riordan, Mrs. Linda
Robertson, John
Robinson, Mr. Geoffrey
Rooney, Mr. Terry
Roy, Mr. Frank
Ruane, Chris
Ruddock, Joan
Russell, Christine
Ryan, Joan
Salter, Martin
Sarwar, Mr. Mohammad
Seabeck, Alison
Shaw, Jonathan
Sheerman, Mr. Barry
Sheridan, Jim
Simon, Mr. Siôn
Singh, Mr. Marsha
Skinner, Mr. Dennis
Slaughter, Mr. Andrew
Smith, rh Mr. Andrew
Smith, Ms Angela C. (Sheffield, Hillsborough)
Smith, Geraldine
Smith, rh Jacqui
Snelgrove, Anne
Southworth, Helen
Spellar, rh Mr. John
Starkey, Dr. Phyllis
Stewart, Ian
Stoate, Dr. Howard
Strang, rh Dr. Gavin
Straw, rh Mr. Jack
Sutcliffe, Mr. Gerry
Tami, Mark
Taylor, David
Thomas, Mr. Gareth
Thornberry, Emily
Timms, Mr. Stephen
Tipping, Paddy
Touhig, Mr. Don
Trickett, Jon
Truswell, Mr. Paul
Turner, Dr. Desmond
Turner, Mr. Neil
Twigg, Derek
Usher, Kitty
Vaz, Keith
Vis, Dr. Rudi
Walley, Joan
Waltho, Lynda
Watson, Mr. Tom
Watts, Mr. Dave
Whitehead, Dr. Alan
Wicks, Malcolm
Williams, rh Mr. Alan
Williams, Mrs. Betty
Wills, Mr. Michael
Winnick, Mr. David

Winterton, Ms Rosie
Woodward, Mr. Shaun
Woolas, Mr. Phil
Wright, Mr. Anthony
Wright, David
Wright, Mr. Iain
Wright, Dr. Tony
Wyatt, Derek

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Vernon Coaker and Claire Ward

NOES

Afriyie, Adam
Ainsworth, Mr. Peter
Alexander, Danny
Amess, Mr. David
Arbuthnot, rh Mr. James
Bacon, Mr. Richard
Baker, Norman
Baldry, Tony
Barker, Gregory
Baron, Mr. John
Barrett, John
Beith, rh Mr. Alan
Bellingham, Mr. Henry
Benyon, Mr. Richard
Bercow, John
Beresford, Sir Paul
Binley, Mr. Brian
Blunt, Mr. Crispin
Bone, Mr. Peter
Boswell, Mr. Tim
Brady, Mr. Graham
Brake, Tom
Brazier, Mr. Julian
Brokenshire, James
Brooke, Annette
Browne, Mr. Jeremy
Browning, Angela
Bruce, Malcolm
Burns, Mr. Simon
Burrowes, Mr. David
Burstow, Mr. Paul
Burt, Lorely
Butterfill, Sir John
Cable, Dr. Vincent
Campbell, rh Sir Menzies
Carmichael, Mr. Alistair
Carswell, Mr. Douglas
Cash, Mr. William
Chope, Mr. Christopher
Clappison, Mr. James
Clark, Greg
Clarke, rh Mr. Kenneth
Clegg, Mr. Nick
Conway, Derek
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cormack, Sir Patrick
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Mr. Geoffrey
Crabb, Mr. Stephen
Curry, rh Mr. David
Davey, Mr. Edward
Davies, David T.C. (Monmouth)
Davies, Philip
Davis, rh David (Haltemprice and Howden)
Djanogly, Mr. Jonathan
Duddridge, James
Duncan, Mr. Alan
Duncan Smith, rh Mr. Iain
Dunne, Mr. Philip
Evans, Mr. Nigel
Evennett, Mr. David
Fabricant, Michael
Fallon, Mr. Michael
Farron, Tim
Featherstone, Lynne
Field, Mr. Mark
Fisher, Mark
Forth, rh Mr. Eric
Foster, Mr. Don
Francois, Mr. Mark
Fraser, Mr. Christopher
Gale, Mr. Roger
Galloway, Mr. George
Garnier, Mr. Edward
Gauke, Mr. David
George, Andrew
Gibb, Mr. Nick
Gidley, Sandra
Gillan, Mrs. Cheryl
Goldsworthy, Julia
Goodman, Mr. Paul
Goodwill, Mr. Robert
Gove, Michael
Gray, Mr. James
Grayling, Chris
Green, Damian
Greening, Justine
Grieve, Mr. Dominic
Gummer, rh Mr. John
Hague, rh Mr. William
Hammond, Mr. Philip
Hammond, Stephen
Hancock, Mr. Mike
Hands, Mr. Greg
Harper, Mr. Mark
Harris, Dr. Evan
Harvey, Nick
Heald, Mr. Oliver
Heath, Mr. David
Heathcoat-Amory, rh Mr. David
Hemming, John
Hendry, Charles
Herbert, Nick
Hoey, Kate
Hollobone, Mr. Philip
Holloway, Mr. Adam
Holmes, Paul
Hopkins, Kelvin
Horam, Mr. John
Horwood, Martin
Howard, rh Mr. Michael
Howarth, David
Howarth, Mr. Gerald
Hughes, Simon
Huhne, Chris
Hunt, Mr. Jeremy
Hunter, Mark
Hurd, Mr. Nick
Jackson, Glenda
Jackson, Mr. Stewart
Jenkin, Mr. Bernard
Jones, Mr. David
Jones, Lynne
Kawczynski, Daniel
Keetch, Mr. Paul
Kennedy, rh Mr. Charles
Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Kramer, Susan
Laing, Mrs. Eleanor
Lait, Mrs. Jacqui
Lamb, Norman
Lancaster, Mr. Mark
Lansley, Mr. Andrew
Laws, Mr. David
Leech, Mr. John
Leigh, Mr. Edward
Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver
Lewis, Dr. Julian
Liddell-Grainger, Mr. Ian
Lidington, Mr. David
Lilley, rh Mr. Peter
Llwyd, Mr. Elfyn
Loughton, Tim
Mackay, rh Mr. Andrew
MacNeil, Mr. Angus
Main, Anne
Malins, Mr. Humfrey
Maples, Mr. John
Maude, rh Mr. Francis
May, rh Mrs. Theresa
McDonnell, John
McIntosh, Miss Anne
McLoughlin, rh Mr. Patrick
Miller, Mrs. Maria
Milton, Anne
Moore, Mr. Michael
Moss, Mr. Malcolm
Mulholland, Greg
Murrison, Dr. Andrew
Newmark, Mr. Brooks
O'Brien, Mr. Stephen
Öpik, Lembit
Osborne, Mr. George
Paice, Mr. James
Paisley, rh Rev. Ian
Paterson, Mr. Owen
Penning, Mike
Penrose, John
Price, Adam
Prisk, Mr. Mark
Pritchard, Mark
Pugh, Dr. John
Randall, Mr. John
Redwood, rh Mr. John
Reid, Mr. Alan
Rennie, Willie
Rifkind, rh Sir Malcolm
Robertson, Angus
Robertson, Hugh
Rogerson, Mr. Dan
Rosindell, Andrew
Rowen, Paul
Russell, Bob
Sanders, Mr. Adrian
Scott, Mr. Lee
Selous, Andrew
Shapps, Grant
Shepherd, Mr. Richard
Short, rh Clare
Simmonds, Mark
Simpson, Mr. Keith
Smith, Sir Robert
Soames, Mr. Nicholas
Spicer, Sir Michael
Spink, Bob
Spring, Mr. Richard
Stanley, rh Sir John
Streeter, Mr. Gary
Stuart, Mr. Graham
Stunell, Andrew
Swayne, Mr. Desmond
Swinson, Jo
Swire, Mr. Hugo
Syms, Mr. Robert
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Mr. Ian
Taylor, Matthew
Taylor, Dr. Richard
Teather, Sarah
Thurso, John
Tredinnick, David
Turner, Mr. Andrew
Tyrie, Mr. Andrew
Vaizey, Mr. Edward
Vara, Mr. Shailesh
Viggers, Peter
Villiers, Mrs. Theresa
Walker, Mr. Charles
Wareing, Mr. Robert N.
Watkinson, Angela
Webb, Steve
Weir, Mr. Mike
Whittingdale, Mr. John
Wiggin, Bill
Williams, Mark
Williams, Stephen
Willis, Mr. Phil
Willott, Jenny
Wilshire, Mr. David
Wilson, Mr. Rob
Winterton, Ann
Winterton, Sir Nicholas
Wishart, Pete
Wright, Jeremy
Yeo, Mr. Tim
Young, rh Sir George
Younger-Ross, Richard

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Roger Williams and Mr. Tobias Ellwood

Question accordingly agreed to.

Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill

Lords amendments to be considered tomorrow.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Have the Government given you, and through you the House, any explanation of their extraordinary behaviour in pulling the business at about two hours' notice? Have the Government Whips had such a bad week that they need to go home early to lie down? It is virtually unprecedented in my experience of the House that an important Bill coming to its final stages is suddenly hoicked from the Order Paper for no reason, and the Government do not have the courtesy to give the House an explanation.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Ashford (Damian Green) makes a point that I made a couple of hours ago. May I add to that—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman is making a point of order to the Chair.

Mr. Heath: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Has there been any indication from the Leader of the House that he anticipates making another business statement on Monday in order to correct the incorrect business statement that he made earlier today, which made no reference to further consideration of the Bill at any time during the next couple of weeks?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received no such indication from the Leader of the House. Returning to the original point of order, it is, of course, the prerogative and responsibility of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill or motion to decide whether to proceed. I am not aware of any other explanation, but I have no doubt that the Bill will return at a later stage.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. On Friday 3 March I raised a point of order with the Second Deputy Chairman in relation to an incident that took place at Nottingham East Midlands airport on 4 March. In response, the Second Deputy Chairman quite properly said that that was not a matter for him, but that he felt sure that the relevant Minister, namely one from the Department for Transport, would read what was said and would no doubt respond. I raised that point of order two weeks ago, and I have heard nothing since then, apart from noisy night flights out of that airport. Is there any way in which you can encourage the Minister with responsibility for aviation or one of the more senior Ministers in that Department to apply their mind to what is a serious problem and have the courtesy to this House and to a MP to respond?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I can only repeat to the hon. and learned Gentleman what my colleague, the Second Deputy Chairman, has already said—there is nothing that I can do. However, he may want to consider another way of getting a response to his question other than a point of order.

Water Shortages (West Sussex)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Claire Ward.]

4.16 pm

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise what is becoming one of the most serious issues for local people in West Sussex, which is the shortage of water. The past two years have been the driest period in the south-east since 1922, surpassing even the most serious post-war drought, which many of us remember, between 1974 and 1976. Many parts of the south-east have experienced less than three quarters of their long-term average rainfall in that period, and last winter was the second driest in Sussex since 1904. Only four of the past 16 months have seen rainfall reach average levels, and research commissioned by the south-east counties leaders group in 2004 found that less than half of the rainfall experienced in the region recharges water resources, which means that the south-east has less water per head than Syria.

Current water levels continue to cause concern. Despite some rainfall last month, river levels in West Sussex are at their lowest level for three decades—for example, the Ouse was flowing at only 41 per cent. of its long-term average last month. Almost 70 per cent. of water supplies in the south-east come from underground, so it is particularly worrying that groundwater levels are still below the long-term average for this month. On 9 March, the Bewl reservoir, which serves 400,000 people in Kent and East Sussex, was only 53 per cent. full, which is the lowest level that the reservoir has reached at this time of the year since it was built in 1974—for comparison's sake, the average level for this time of year is 84 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important Adjournment debate. He is aware, because he is coming to an infrastructure seminar tomorrow in East Grinstead in my constituency, that the Weirwood reservoir is even lower than Bewl. Is he aware that the Government have imposed on West Sussex county council a target to build 4,000 new houses at East Grinstead and that the requirement for extra water for those houses will be 6.75 million litres a day? Where does he think that that water will come from, and does he agree that that is not sustainable development?

Nick Herbert: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and agree with everything that he says. That is indeed the worry—where will the water come from in order to support the additional housing demand? I pay tribute to him for holding his infrastructure seminar tomorrow, at which leaders of the county councils and others will discuss the problem of the infrastructure deficit. That was also addressed by the private Member's Bill promoted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), which West Sussex Members were delighted to support and which suggested that there should be a proper audit of the infrastructure requirements of a development before it goes ahead.

The Weirwood reservoir is at about half its normal level, and the Environment Agency has confirmed that only one of the seven reservoirs serving the southern region is at normal levels for this time of year. That has a serious impact in several ways. First, it affects farming. The south-east is one of England's most important regions for arable farming and horticulture, which takes place in the south of my constituency. The drought is already causing concern as the key growing season looms. The Environment Agency's report, "Drought Prospects", published last month, set out three possible scenarios for the summer: average rainfall for February to April, 80 per cent. of the average during that period, or 60 per cent. of the average. The report stated that if the south-east were to receive only 60 per cent. of the average for this time of year,

"Farmers would find groundwater and surface water sources to be very unreliable and could expect restrictions on spray irrigation".

That will have a direct impact on the supplies of the food that they produce and on their profitability, which is already being challenged.

Secondly, there is an environmental impact, including on local wildlife. Some of the finest wetland nature reserves in England are located in the south-east, such as Pulborough Brooks in my constituency. I suspect that the Minister may know about that. The ground is increasingly dry for the hundreds of pairs of lapwings and redshanks that traditionally breed in the south-east, and as flood plains dry out there are ever fewer places where these birds can breed and nest. At Pulborough Brooks reserve, just one pair of lapwings produced chicks last year, compared with 10 pairs in a normal year. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds believes that that is because of the drought.

In terms of the prospect now confronting us, the Environment Agency has warned that water companies in the south-east, such as Southern Water, which largely serves my constituency, will need to do several things, all of which I wish to discuss. They include maintaining hosepipe bans, educating the public further about the severity of the drought, increased leakage control, and ensuring that drought plans are taken in good time. What worried me, and was one of the reasons why I called the debate, was the Environment Agency's comment that "Any delay increases the risk later in the year of extreme steps to manage public water supply, such as the introduction of standpipes and rota cuts".

That public statement by the Environment Agency has begun to worry people who already face hosepipe bans in their households. I understand from a meeting that I had with Southern Water this week that it hopes that standpipes will not have to be introduced. However, the fact that the agency has warned of that underlines the need for further measures to deal with the problem.

A hosepipe ban has already been in place in West Sussex for eight months. It is extraordinary to impose a hosepipe ban during the winter months. The current hosepipe bans affect more than 3.4 million people in the whole of the south-east. Following Thames Water's announcement of a hosepipe ban, that extension will affect another 3.5 million people. Folkestone and Dover Water has applied for water scarcity status and has become the first water company to be successful in being given the go-ahead to install compulsory water meters, under the Water Industry Act 1999. I should like to explore the extent to which the Government are willing to see a further use of water meters and what impact they think that that will have on consumption and on some of the poorer households who may be adversely affected if there is a further move towards water metering.

I want to deal specifically with the issue that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) raised about population growth in the south-east.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. People watching it may be confused because, only a few years ago, there were television images of villages that were almost washed away. Barrels from the brewery in Lewes in another part of Sussex were seen floating down the river and the city of Chichester was severely damaged. However, we have long-term water shortage problems in the south-east, which will be compounded for reasons that my hon. Friend will outline. Does he believe that there is any scope for designation as an area of water shortage, as is possible under the Water Industry Act 1999, to draw attention to our long-term problems?

Nick Herbert: I should like to ask the Minister precisely that question. Perhaps such a measure is necessary but we need to understand its implications for local people and the move to compulsory water metering.

A big population increase is projected in the south-east. That is set to happen against a background in which, nationally, household water use has increased by more than half since 1971. Just over 8 million people currently live in the south-east but that population is projected to grow by more than 1 million in the next two decades. The South East England regional assembly, at the behest of the Deputy Prime Minister, said that it wants an additional 578,000 homes built in the next 20 years. That is an annual average of 28,900 across the south-east. Fifty-eight thousand homes will be located in West Sussex—a build rate of 2,900 a year. Yesterday, a report in The Daily Telegraph highlighted Government projections and estimated that, on top of those figures, up to 5 million new homes will be needed in England in the next 20 years. Ironically, a subsequent report in The Daily Telegraph ran a feature on the hosepipe bans and water shortages in the south-east. There is a clear connection between the increase in population, the projected increase in house building and the current scarcity of water. It is important that all concerned take that connection on board and plan properly for it.

The Water Resources in the South East group concluded in September 2004 that "increased demand from new development in the South East can only be accommodated through a combination of demand and supply side activities."

That was based on a forecast that, by 2025, more than half the households in the south-east would be on meters. The group states that, unless that takes place, we will not be in balance in 20 years. It is therefore important for the additional number of households to be on meters. The question is whether we will hit the target.

[Nick Herbert]

Last year, WaterVoice, which is now the Consumer Council for Water, stated:

"Adequate water and sewerage services are a fundamental requirement and development/growth cannot proceed until robust water and sewerage infrastructures are in place to meet the demands placed on them . . . Water resources in the South East are already closely balanced with current customer demand. Any significant increase in population, as forecast in the plan"— the housing plan, to which I referred—

"will place an unsustainable pressure on existing water resources. Improving water efficiency and minimising leakage are essential components of the plan . . . The intention to promote water efficiency in new homes through the planning process is supported but it remains unclear how existing housing stock can be made more water efficient without some form of financial incentive."

The current planning, which the Bill that my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham presented tried to tackle, puts water companies under a statutory duty to provide the water only when planning permission is granted for house building. It does not provide for any formal water consultation process to involve water companies in the planning system. When we are considering house building on the scale suggested in the south-east, such formal consultation would be a good idea.

The Environmental Audit Committee of the House of Commons concluded last year:

"No proposals to further increase housing supply should be taken forward without ensuring that there is a strong evidence base to support them."

I have mentioned the Infrastructure Audit (Housing Development) Bill, which was introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham and given a First Reading in the House. Last year, I also asked the Deputy Prime Minister to what extent he had assessed the infrastructure improvements that would be necessary to meet the house building targets in the south-east. I received a reply that simply stated that the Government were committed to "exploring" the infrastructure needs. Given the serious water shortage in the south-east, exploring is not going to be good enough.

At Prime Minister's questions two weeks ago, I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he accepted that the Government had a responsibility to deal with the infrastructure deficit before putting in place the additional homes in the south-east. He replied that

"that is what we are doing."—[Official Report, 1 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 253.]

I want to be sure that that is the case in regard to water, roads, health care and so on—all of which are under great pressure in West Sussex. I remain to be convinced—indeed, I am far from convinced—that that infrastructure investment is going ahead before the housing programme begins.

There is also a possibility of an extension to the proposed hosepipe ban, which would involve a ban on non-essential use. That idea has been floated in the local media, and I understand from meetings with Southern Water that there is every likelihood that such a ban will be introduced in its part of West Sussex shortly. A non-essential use ban would mean not only that people could not use a hosepipe to wash their car, but that they would not be able to wash their car at all. Under such a ban, people could not even wash their car using a bucket and a sponge. As the public become increasingly aware of the severity of these measures—which will be put in place at the beginning, not the end, of the summer—they will quite rightly make further demands to find out what is being done to ensure that a proper water supply is available.

I understand that the water companies plan on the basis that there will be a drought once every 10 years, and that measures such as those bans are therefore acceptable. I believe that that planning scenario should be revisited. It is unacceptable to work on the assumption that there will be hosepipe bans once every 10 years. That is not the case in other parts of the world, and I do not see why people living in the south-east—and in West Sussex in particular—should have to live under that presumption.

There are two ways of dealing with this situation. First, there should be an increase in supply. Local people will want to know what the water companies are doing about investing in new reservoirs, for example. Secondly, and more contentiously, we could moderate demand by introducing water meters. I fully accept that there is a case for that, but if metering is to be extended, the water companies must address their leakage problems first, in order to maintain public confidence in their actions. If the public were being asked to pay the price of the shortages through water metering, but the water companies were not meeting their responsibility to deal with leaks, that could lead to a breakdown in relations between the water companies and the public. I am sure that the water companies are alive to that risk.

Water meters are now on the agenda, following the application for water scarcity status in Folkestone by Folkestone and Dover Water. The number of metered households in the country has increased, and more than a fifth of properties in Sussex now have metered water. That is partly as a result of meters being installed automatically in new homes. Also, as someone who is about to purchase a new home in West Sussex, I have discovered that simply transferring ownership within the county means that I shall have to install a water meter. People can also volunteer to have a water meter. I appreciate that it is intended to increase the numbers of homes with water meters by those means, and Southern Water aims to increase the take-up to 44 per cent. by 2010. However, that is some way short of the target that will be necessary to ensure that we have adequate demand management measures, in concert with supply, to supply the additional housing over the same period.

It is clear that water metering has a beneficial impact. Consumers cut their consumption by some 10 per cent. on average when meters are installed. It is significant that the Isle of Wight, where more than 90 per cent. of the 65,000 homes are metered, has not had a hosepipe ban since 1976. One has now been introduced, but much later than the bans introduced in other parts of the south-east. That suggests that metering is a successful part of the formula for dealing with that problem, but it is only a part.

On international comparisons, as so often in relation to environmental matters, we are behind many of our peer group countries. There is 100 per cent. water metering for the supply to the six Scandinavian cities of Oslo, Copenhagen, Helsinki, Stockholm, Gothenburg and Malmö. There is 100 per cent. water metering in urban authorities in Australia and very high levels of water metering in the Netherlands. As politicians, we have to decide the extent to which we recognise our responsibilities to take decisions that might be unpopular but are in the interests of the environment.

It has also been suggested that we should have a national grid for water. However, it would be prohibitively expensive. Because 1 cu m of water weighs a tonne, it would require enormous amounts of energy to pump the water from the north of England to the south. The water would also have to be clean. It would not be possible to pump untreated water and put it into rivers, because of the environmental impact of shifting wildlife from one part of the country to the other. It is important that if such measures are to be put aside, the Government and the water companies tell us precisely what will happen to ensure that every household has a water supply in parts of the country such as West Sussex, especially given the huge increase in housing that is expected. We may disagree about the merits of that housing and its location, but it is perfectly reasonable of local people to request that it should be accompanied by an adequate water supply. There is plainly insufficient water at present, which undermines public confidence that supplies will be available in the future.

I am grateful to the Minister for replying to the debate and I hope that he will be able to offer some reassurance to our constituents, who are genuinely concerned about this matter.

4.38 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): I offer my sincere thanks to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) for allowing me to contribute to his Adjournment debate on this important issue. Members who represent West Sussex are not divided politically about the difficulties that we face, although we might not agree on how to tackle the problem and the factors that contribute to the water shortage in the area.

I note from parliamentary questions that many Members with constituencies in West Sussex have taken a deep interest in the problem and have been keen to ensure that Ministers are pressed on it. Owing to the very dry periods that we have experienced lately, our area is being described as semi-arid, which may shock our constituents but is entirely accurate.

We should recognise, however, that such periods are cyclical, occurring—as the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs pointed out—every 10 years. We need a measured and reasonable response to what is a sad state of affairs, especially in our part of the world. Our reservoirs present a picture that makes us all feel incredibly concerned.

Mr. Soames: The hon. Lady is right to say that this is not a political matter. She is also right to say that there is a cyclical element in climate changes of this sort. Nevertheless, the cyclical element has occurred at a time when the Government have imposed massive house building targets on West Sussex. In mid-Sussex alone, an infrastructure deficit of over £1 billion has been necessary to cope with the projected new building. How does the hon. Lady think the Government will deal with that?

Laura Moffatt: I was about to say that this is probably where the divide occurs. I do not consider it responsible to say that because of water shortages we should not have the houses that our area needs so desperately. The hon. Gentleman, who knows the constituency of Crawley extremely well, is aware of the pressure for new housing. I believe that we can accommodate the building of houses for people in desperate need, while developing a sense of self-awareness among those who are lucky enough to have homes already, with access to fresh potable water.

A series of parliamentary questions and letters to, in particular, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have asked what is considered when new housing is proposed. It is important to ensure that a precious resource is taken properly into account before any new building takes place. I have found the advice I have received extremely useful, and I make sure that my constituents receive it as well.

I was interested by the hon. Gentleman's proposition that the water company should be a statutory consultee. I have spent quite a bit of time with the water companies, particularly South East Water. I was impressed by the work that South East Water is doing to reduce leakage, improve supply and ensure that people think carefully about how they use their precious resource, but I do not think that making the company a statutory consultee is the answer. The water company's business is to supply water, and I suspect that no matter what question it is asked, it will say, "We can supply water." The guidance from the ODPM is therefore an important element in ensuring that that is so. I do, however, firmly believe that the water companies are playing a significant role, as are local authorities, in making us understand our responsibility as tenants and home owners in West Sussex.

Interesting measures have been taken in Crawley to ensure that we conserve our precious water supplies. Recently, my constituents were able to buy water butts for their gardens at an incredibly low price, subsidised by the local authority. It understood that people are keen to take such steps and the service was very heavily used. In fact, we had a really jolly weekend. Some of the people who came to get a water butt decided to come back for a second one when they discovered another drainpipe on their roof that could enable them to save even more water. There was also an education centre, which gave advice on saving water. We know that we could accommodate more house building if more people took such steps. Putting just one brick or "hippo" in our cisterns can enable others to access fresh water. We should share much of that advice.

Mr. Soames: This debate is of course about water, and the hon. Lady is rightly telling us about the excellent and admirable things that Crawley borough council is doing. I do not want to interrupt this cosy consensus, but the problem is not just water. In fact, as she rightly says, water can be produced and it can be pumped from Wales, Scotland or anywhere. The problem is the overall infrastructure package, which includes not just water, but sewerage, roads and railways. All of that requires enormous investment if Crawley or anywhere else in West Sussex is to cope with the demands being imposed, which will come under the heading of sustainable development.

[Mr. Soames]

Laura Moffatt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention and I do not disagree one bit. I am simply trying to ensure that water is included in that very important overall infrastructure package, because it is sometimes forgotten about.

Many steps can be taken. Personal responsibility should extend not only to our own homes—we should also take steps to help others. Self-awareness and self-promotion for home owners is very important, and we can create a much better infrastructure if we make sure that people understand that water is part of it.

There have been some fantastic campaigns, such as Water Wise. South-east water companies have taken a very active role, alongside Government officials, in examining all aspects of water supply. Importantly, a statutory duty will be placed on the Environment Agency to ensure that it properly examines the water supply in a particular area. That follows on from the Water Act 2003, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for helping me to understand how that duty will impact on future consideration of water supply.

So much is being done on this crucial issue. We should not alarm people to the point where they feel that all future house building should be rejected because of possible water shortages. We should ensure that we take a responsible attitude to this issue, which the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs certainly did in his speech. Labour Members will want to ensure that water metering does not result in water being a scarce resource for low-income families. My son is an environmental health officer and his entire reason for becoming one was to help ensure that people have decent living conditions. He would be absolutely horrified if we tried to impose water metering on everyone, although it is a good idea for many. People who have meters find it very upsetting to watch others on relatively high incomes wash their cars and then aim the hosepipe down the drain when they have lunch.

Finally, we can tackle the problem in other ways. A young man in Crawley, who was educated in Crawley school, has developed a no-water car-cleaning product. I hope that such technologies will help to ensure that we in West Sussex keep our precious resource of water.

4.50 pm

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) on securing this very important debate. I also want to thank the Minister for allowing me to speak at short notice.

We have had problems in Roehampton in my constituency that tie in with what has been said already in the debate. I want to give a view of the problem as it appears in a part of Greater London that is well developed and increasingly heavily populated. About two weeks ago, Thames Water decided to reduce the water pressure at the Putney pumping station, partly as a result of the increasing population in Wimbledon. There has also been a big problem with leaks locally, with two having to be fixed in my road in the past month.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs said, it is incumbent on water companies to tackle leakages when they happen, but reducing the pressure at Putney pumping station has had a negative impact on some of my most disadvantaged constituents living on the Alton estate. They occupy very high council tower blocks, but the lower pressure means that the highest flats cannot get water pumped up to them.

As a result, Thames Water has proposed to install what it calls a water booster pump in each of the tower blocks, at a cost that I believe will be in the region of £50,000. The council is being asked to meet that cost, but the flats' leaseholders will also have to pay their share. Some 300 people in my constituency have received bills of between £800 and £2,000, with the money going to pay for the water booster pumps in their tower blocks. Other taxpayers—myself included—are also contributing to that payment, as we are paying for the council tenants' contribution.

I am especially worried about this matter. As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs said, the water companies must be careful to protect their relationship with their customers. The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) said that water companies will never say that they cannot supply water, but I wish that she was right. In Roehampton and Putney, we are facing the problem that the water companies are saying exactly that—that they cannot supply water to some homes. Ironically, it is people on lower incomes who live in affordable housing or council stock—they may have managed to buy their own council property several years ago—who now have to pay huge bills of up to £2,000. I have written to Thames Water and to Ofwat about the problem, but unsustainable development in the south-east or West Sussex will ensure that the constituents of other hon. Members soon face problems similar to those that my constituents face. It is often the people who can least afford to pay who are being charged in the way that I have described.

I hope that the Minister will be able to give advice or guidance to Ofwat and the water companies about the appropriateness of their behaviour, given that Thames Water made an after-tax profit last year of nearly £200 million. A great deal of that profit is distributed to shareholders, but the company would do better to invest a little more in local pipe infrastructures before it asks tenants to pay for its inadequacies.

4.54 pm

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) on securing this debate and raising a series of important issues in relation to water supply. Water supply, which is heavily regulated, is a crucial part of the infrastructure of this country. We have had some bad droughts, and the hon. Gentleman referred to the last serious one, which affected Yorkshire Water badly. It was at the time when people were being urged to shower with a friend and take similar steps. I do not think we are quite in that situation yet.

Measures have been introduced, particularly since the water summit of 1997, which was chaired by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. The 1999 legislation and the Water Act 2003 were designed to make sure that we do not have the major problems of severe water shortages that we have had in the past. That is not to say that we should be complacent. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we have had some of the lowest rainfalls since 1921 in the south-east of England and we are facing what may be one of the worst droughts for nearly 100 years. There are serious issues, and water companies have a duty to put drought plans in place—I shall say a few words about those—and they have been responding responsibly.

I want to touch upon a point raised by the hon. Gentleman and by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt)—that of development. It is true that for development, it is necessary to have the infrastructure to go with it. I shall concentrate on water tonight, but that is not to say that I do not recognise that there are other issues, such as transport, roads, schools, and hospitals, that go with new development. They are addressed in the structural plans. However, whatever the argument about numbers, it is clear that there is an overwhelming need for more homes, particularly in the south-east. That desire for more homes, which is felt by the constituents of hon. Members who are in the Chamber this evening, is something that we as a Government, and local authorities, cannot ignore. It is also true that we have to approve new communities on the basis of sustainable communities. Planning for water is part of that.

The hon. Gentleman asked what steps were being taken in relation to development to ensure that there will be an adequate water supply. The South East England regional assembly is about to submit the complete draft of the regional special strategy for the south-east, the south-east plan, to the Government. The plan is on course for submission on 31 March. It will then go through consultation, independent testing and public examination before being approved by the Government in 2008. That plan addresses the issue of water supply. Water companies are statutory consultees in relation to structure plans and planning authorities will be statutory consultees on water company resource plans. It is a two-way process so that both know what is going on.

The Environment Agency, together with the water companies and the regional assembly, has undertaken modelling work on the impact of new house building on water supply. It has modelled six options based around the figures in the draft south-east plan and the impact of growth areas. It has concluded that a combination of supply and demand side interventions will mean that numbers can be accommodated. I want to make that clear. In relation to expansion of homes, numbers can be accommodated in terms of water resources.

Interventions include an assumption on increasing water efficiency, and the possible construction of new reservoir infrastructure. New homes are much more water-efficient than existing stock, because of improvements in building regulations. The hon. Gentleman might be interested to know that the draft south-east plan, policy NRM2, sets out policy for a number of reservoirs. There are five in the draft plan. I have a list of all the reservoirs that are planned for the south-east. New reservoirs are planned for Southern Water at Broad Oak, for South East Water at Clay Hill, for Portsmouth Water Ltd.—which supplies part of Sussex—at Havant Thicket and for Thames Water at Abingdon. There are proposals to extend existing reservoirs. The plans include raising Bewl for Southern Water and Mid Kent Water, where the proposal is to raise the banks and increase capacity significantly, the Bray enlargement for South East Water and Abberton for Essex & Suffolk Water. I was in Essex recently, talking to the local water company. I know that raising the banks at Abberton will increase the reservoir's capacity by 60 per cent. I am sure that the effect will be similar at Bewl. There is also provision for water transfers within regions.

I shall go through some of the measures introduced in the 2003 Act to manage future demand for water resources. They include time limits for all new abstraction licences; the facility to revoke without compensation abstraction licences where serious environmental damage has been caused, which relates to the point made by the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs about damage to river ecosystems; greater flexibility to raise or lower licensing thresholds according to local pressure on water resources; and the extension of licensing to abstractors of significant quantities who are not included in the current licensing system.

Water company drought plans are a statutory requirement. Each water company must have plans to deal with drought, which has been helpful in dealing with the current situation. Water resource management plans are to become a statutory requirement. Consultation on the regulations is in progress and ends in April 2006. They will require water companies to look at future demand on a 25-year time scale. The 2003 Act also introduces new duties on the Secretary of State, regulators, water companies and public bodies to further water conservation. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley made the important point that people can take simple measures to reduce water consumption: for example, not leaving the tap running or fitting water-saving devices such as spray taps, low-pressure shower heads and twin-flush toilets. None of those devices is particularly expensive and can be installed when modernising a bathroom or replacing fittings. We are also addressing such matters in new regulations on housing.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs mentioned water scarcity status. As he said, an application from Folkestone and Dover has been granted and the company's case was subject to a six-month examination. Any water company can apply for water scarcity status and such applications will be treated on their merits.

I was impressed that the hon. Gentleman had faced head-on the issue of water meters. They can be controversial, although the response from Folkestone and Dover was muted; 40 per cent. of the company's customers were already on meters, which may be part of the explanation. The company calculated that up to 70 per cent. of its customers would pay less on a meter, which is quite a significant number. Many people underestimate the benefits of water meters, although of course 30 per cent. will pay more because they are big users of water.

Meters may pose problems for vulnerable groups, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley pointed out. I can reassure her, because the vulnerable groups regulations are designed to protect large families on low incomes and people with certain medical conditions. A pilot scheme on water affordability is running in the south-west, which is helping us to understand how we might refine the regulations to improve them and make them more effective. We have an open mind about such things, but we want to make sure that water metering would not cause suffering for the most vulnerable.

[Mr. Elliot Morley]

There is an argument for metering; it reduces demand and is a fairer way of paying for water, but there is no water shortage in the north of England—the most severe pressure is in the south and the south-east—so there is not really a strong case for compulsory water meters nationally. We want an expansion in the use of water meters, but it should be undertaken as it is at present—by the combination of people volunteering to use them and installing them in new homes or when people move. That means that their use is constantly increasing, but people still have a choice. It also spreads the cost of fitting the meters, which has had to be borne by the companies. So I think that is going okay.

Where there is water scarcity, though, there is clearly an argument for compulsory metering, as one tool. It is not the only tool. Companies have a responsibility to ensure that there is proper supply management, which includes such things as addressing leakage; that is taken into account when companies apply for water scarcity status.

I must correct the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs. He had me worried for a moment when he talked about washing cars with recycled water. When there is a hosepipe and sprinkler ban, it is permissible to use the bathwater to wash a car, or to take water out of the bath with a bucket and put it on the dahlias; that is not a problem and people do that. And of course one can collect rainwater, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley rightly said. In fact, I also benefited from a promotion by my local authority, which was giving away water butts. I was very enthusiastic. When I collected my water butt I found a party atmosphere, as my hon. Friend did. I suppose that the idea of getting something free from the council is always popular, so that probably explains the party atmosphere. It must have affected me, because I was so excited about my new water butt that I sawed through next door's downpipe when I connected it; but never mind—it is connected now.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the range of measures that can be taken. She mentioned Water Wise, a group set up by the industry; I very much welcome that. We have also set up a water saving group, which I chair. It brings together the regulator, the Consumer Council for Water and industry representatives. The idea is to have working streams to look at ways of promoting water saving, in terms of demand and supply management, awareness and new technologies. That process is under way and I am grateful for the enthusiastic support that we have had from the entire industry. Water Wise is also represented on that group and I very much appreciate that.

The hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening) mentioned a constituency problem of reduced water pressure. I quite understand the point that she makes. Water pressure is sometimes reduced as a way of combating leaks, and leaks are a problem in the Thames region. Thames, like all water companies, has targets to reduce leakage, but it has been missing those targets in recent years. I am glad to say that currently it is on target and I very much welcome that, but it has much more to do.

Funnily enough, I had the opposite problem in my constituency. People had complained of low water pressure, and I asked the water company whether it could be increased. The company was very co-operative; it increased the pressure, with the result that the water main burst in the street concerned and no one got any water at all. My involvement in that was played down.

The hon. Lady asked for some advice on what she could do. I understand that there is an obligation and a duty on water companies to provide minimum pressure to pump water to the topmost storey of a block of flats.

Justine Greening: I am extremely grateful for that clarification, because I looked into the matter, and my understanding is that under the Water Industry Act 1991, the uppermost limit was 10 m. My flats were above that level, and there was no statutory duty to supply to any level above 10 m. Perhaps the Minister will clarify that. If I am incorrect, I shall be delighted.

Mr. Morley: I acknowledge that this is a local, constituency issue and an important one for the hon. Lady. I will find out exactly what the regulations are on that point, and I will write to inform her.

On Thames Water, I want to make it clear that while it has met its target for this year, it has not met its overall target for leakages, and I do expect it to get on track in that regard.

I do not want to say very much more, because I think that I have addressed the main points made by the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs. I recognise that those points are important, but the water supply in the south-east is not in crisis, although neither we nor the companies can ignore the fact that reserves are very low. Of course, the companies have a duty to ensure that they match demand and resource management and to look ahead for future management.

Some companies are also considering desalination. A small desalination plant is working in the southern region. Thames Water has also been talking about a desalination plant for peak management in the London region.

Companies can apply for drought orders to minimise water loss and if they have to manage water by taking it away from non-essential users. No application for a drought order has been made at the moment. It may well be that, between now and the summer, we have a bit more rainfall. It may well be that we do not have a dry summer. As I say, we cannot be complacent about these issues, and we must look at the long-term weather patterns. We must take into account issues such as climate change.

Droughts are not new—droughts come and go—but we need to be careful about whether we are seeing long-term trends. If we are seeing them, we must ensure that adaptations are made for them. That involves planning for water resource management, tackling issues such as leaking pipes and considering the powers available to water companies and their responsibilities in ensuring that water supplies are reliable.

This country now has one of the highest standards of drinking water quality, internationally. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley is quite right to say that people should not order bottled water in restaurants; they should order jugs of water. Not only is ours some of the best quality drinking water in the world, but it has not been dragged halfway around the country or sometimes across the continent in trucks to be sold in restaurants. So on grounds of sustainability, I would certainly encourage people to ask for jugs of water in restaurants, not for bottled water. In fact, perhaps we should do a bit more of that in the Committees of the House of Commons, rather using bottled water.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs has raised some important and serious issues. I hope that I have reassured him that not only do we have measures in place to deal with drought and with future water demand, but we are working closely with the companies on their legal obligations to ensure the security of water supply, so that his constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley and the other hon. Members present tonight can be assured of a top-quality, reliable and continuous water supply.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes past Five o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 17 March 2006

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

THE FIRST DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS took the Chair as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Orders of the Day

Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Clause 3

NATIONAL TARGETS FOR MICROGENERATION

Amendment proposed [10 March]: No. 7, in page 2, line 20, at the end, to insert the words

', and after consultation with such public and private sector bodies as he considers appropriate'.—[Mr. Forth.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I remind the House that with this we are discussing the following amendments: No. 8, in page 2, line 21, leave out 'national' and insert 'regional'.

No. 9, in page 2, line 27, leave out 'national' and insert 'regional'.

No. 10, in page 2, line 29, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales and the regions of England'.

No. 16, in page 2, line 29, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales or one of the regions of England'.

No. 17, in page 2, line 36, leave out 'number' and insert 'numbers'.

No. 18, in page 2, line 36, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales and the regions of England'.

No. 19, in page 2, line 43, leave out 'number' and insert 'numbers'.

No. 20, in page 2, line 44, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales and regions of England'.

No. 30, in page 3, line 6, leave out subsection (7).

Government amendment No. 36

No. 31, in page 3, line 9, leave out subsection (8).

Government amendments Nos. 37 and 38.

No. 12, in page 4, line 20, leave out 'appropriate' and insert

'efficacious, cost-effective and environmentally beneficial'.

9.34 am

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): —to acknowledge the potential role of the regions. [Laughter.]

On 10 March, the Minister said

"Regions will be able to set their own targets for microgeneration within any national target that we may set, and it would be more appropriate for them to do so, rather than central Government setting them. On those grounds, I oppose amendments Nos. 8, 9, 10, 16, 18 and 20."

That raises a number of important questions. I should like to hear from the Minister at some stage whether he intends to table amendments—probably not at this stage, but when the Bill goes to another place—to give effect to what I have just read out. We shall come to that shortly in another context.

The Minister may think that his words are sufficient, but not all of us are that trusting. We would feel more secure if such important matters were spelt out in the Bill. That, then, is the first question: should this not be subject to an amendment, probably tabled in the House of Lords?

There are a number of other questions to be discussed. By what mechanism would the regional targets match the national targets? If we are to have a bottom-up approach rather than just a national target, I am intrigued by the question that then arises. Has the Minister thought out the way in which regions will be able to set their own targets within any national target?

That gives rise to several further questions. The obvious one is whether the process is to be voluntary. Can some regions set targets while others cannot? If all regions set targets, what will happen if the sum of the regional targets does not match the national target? There are a number of potential difficulties. How far has the Minister—or, more accurately, his officials—thought this through, and how do they think it will work? We cannot have Ministers throwing statements into a debate without our having any idea what they mean and how they would be given effect. I am sorry that the Minister was not able to accept my amendments, and I hope that we shall hear some further explanation from him.

That brings me to amendment No. 12. On 10 March, the Minister said

"The word 'appropriate' is deliberately broad, whereas amendment No. 12, tabled by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), might be too prescriptive, as we may wish to consider other things when making such a decision."

That is followed by the key words—at least in this regard the Minister is entirely consistent:

"However, I assure him that when considering whether to use the powers in clause 6, we will, as always, ensure that we do so in a way that is effective and cost-effective, as well as environmentally beneficial."—[Official Report, 10 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1114–5.]

That is fine as far as it goes. It is a very reassuring statement of the Minister's good intentions. As we know, however, Ministers come and Ministers go. I am not sure that any succeeding Minister would necessarily be bound by what this Minister has to say. That is why

[Mr. Eric Forth]

I was disappointed that the Minister felt unable to accept my amendment, which I thought would add clarity and improve the Bill. I wanted to insert the words

"efficacious, cost-effective and environmentally beneficial"

because—we shall be able to discuss this in more detail when we deal with later amendments—wind power is sporadic and unreliable, as is solar power, while water power is unfortunately relatively rare and inaccessible in this country. I think that we should make very clear what contribution such techniques can make, and that was my intention.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): My right hon. Friend is making a controversial point. Is not one of the difficulties caused by the fact that this is a private Member's Bill, the procedure for which is primarily designed to deal with uncontroversial matters? I have a sneaking suspicion that I shall hear a fair amount from my right hon. Friend this morning, and perhaps from some of his colleagues. Would not the solution be for the Government to introduce measures as controversial as this Bill?

Mr. Forth: I could not agree more, and I have made that point many times over the years. I regard it as my duty as a Member of Parliament to pay particular attention to private Members' Bills precisely because they do not have the benefit of the same governmental scrutiny as Government Bills. My hon. Friend is right: if a Bill is substantial and has controversial elements, the private Member's Bill procedure is not ideal. If the Government wish to suggest that the Bill is essential or vital to the national good, they should be legislating and not leaving it to a Member. I shall not digress further, however, as I do not wish to test your patience this early, Madam Deputy Speaker. In fact, I hope that I do not do so at all.

If my hon. Friend thinks that this bit of the Bill is controversial, I hope that he will be here when we delve deeply into its planning and development aspects and try to tease out the relationship between the techniques known as microgeneration and the planning regime. It will be important to examine those matters later, including the size of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I took the right hon. Gentleman at his word when he said that he would not test my patience early on. I hope therefore that he will now address the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I was just trailing what is to come, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wished to forewarn the House about the exciting debates that we will have later. I am warming the House up a bit for those debates—if that is an appropriate term in this subject.

We were talking about the word "efficacious". Although claims are made for the benefit of microgeneration, it should not be assumed that simply to install something that provides power will be the right thing to do in all circumstances. That is why I think that we need a balanced approach, represented by the words

"efficacious, cost-effective and environmentally beneficial".

I am using the term "environmentally" in a much broader sense, because we must not forget that those pioneers who developed our planning laws and the regime that supports them saw environmental matters rather differently. Times change, but in my view "environmental" does not mean only matters to do with the climate. It must continue to mean matters of planning and development. In that context, I mean visual appearance, sound nuisance and intrusion into domestic and community life. Those subjects will arise again later, but in the wording of amendment No. 12 I was trying to set the scene for a much more balanced approach than has so far been suggested.

One of the difficulties that we have had throughout proceedings on the Bill is that—for the best of reasons—we have not really heard yet from its promoter, from the Minister or from its enthusiastic supporters how they see the crucial balance between the benefits that they claim for microgeneration and the planning difficulties that could arise. It will be important to be clear about that balance before we proceed much further.

On the issue of cost-effectiveness, we must be clear about the likely cost implications of such installations and on whom the costs will fall. Will it be the domestic or business premise owner, the generators or distributors of power or the taxpayer through the Government? That is not sufficiently clear from the Bill, although I would welcome clarification.

I do not want the Bill—or, to take up the point made by my hon. Friend, any other Bill—to float through the parliamentary process without our having an opportunity to hear about all its different aspects and to take a balanced view of it. That is the value of the parliamentary process. The Committee stage allows the Committee to consider certain aspects of the Bill, but on occasions on which there is an outbreak of consensus, especially between the main political parties, it is even more important that Bills are subjected to careful scrutiny. We need to ensure that the enthusiasts have not run away with themselves. There is a long history of legislation that has received so-called all-party support and has turned out to be thoroughly bad. The best example is probably the Child Support Agency, which we still have not got right, after all these years—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the amendment on which he is winding up the debate. It is amendment No. 7.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, and I am eager to get on to the very important debates that are coming up. I just wanted to warm myself and the House up and get people's minds thinking along the right lines. I wanted also to see if I could persuade the Minister to clarify his position on the regional-national balance, but he does not look as though he wishes to try to do so. That matter will remain unresolved and their lordships may have to look at it again, along with other aspects of the Bill.

9.45 am

I am disappointed by the Minister's response. It is not always good enough for a Minister, even one as good and decent as this one, to say, "Trust me. I have said the words so that is what will happen." I hope that he will forgive me if I would prefer to see the words on the face of the Bill. I do not seem to have persuaded him on this occasion, and therefore we can move on. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 36, in page 3, line 7, leave out third 'the' and insert 'a'.

No. 37, in page 3, line 13, leave out 'the' and insert 'a'.

No. 38, in page 3, line 13, at end insert

'(in place of the target which has been revised)'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Clause 6

SALE OF ELECTRICITY GENERATED BY MICROGENERATION: POWER TO MODIFY DISTRIBUTION AND SUPPLY LICENCES ETC

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 5, line 14, leave out from ' "plant" ' to end of line 16 and insert

'includes any equipment, apparatus or appliance;'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following Government amendments: Nos. 40 and 41, No. 33, Nos. 42 to 44, No. 34, Nos. 45 and 46, No. 80 and Nos. 51 and 52.

Malcolm Wicks: Good morning, Madam Deputy Speaker. I suspect that this will be one of the shorter speeches of the day. Amendments Nos. 33 and 34 ensure that an order made under clauses 12 or 13 cannot cover matters that fall within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament. All the other amendments in this group are drafting amendments.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): As the Minister said, these are drafting amendments. The Bill has our full support and we wish to make good progress this morning in getting it on to the statute book, so I do not intend to delay the House.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): The Liberal Democrats also regard the amendments as drafting measures. The Bill has our full support, and I shall leave it at that.

Mr. Forth: This is a very important group of amendments that deserves thorough scrutiny, although sadly there does not seem much stomach in the House for scrutiny so far. Someone has to do it, so it falls to me. The amendments will get some jolly thorough scrutiny, starting now.

Let us look first at the Government amendments. In passing, it is interesting to note that the Government now seek to amend the Bill substantially. If there is any lengthening of the process, it seems substantially to be due to the Government amendments. I have tabled some modest amendments, but this pretty substantial set of Government amendments deserves our attention. Those who have made some mild complaints about the fact that someone has dared to seek to amend such a wonderful Bill as this should concentrate on this group as much as on any other and perhaps take it up with the Minister.

Mr. Chope (Christchurch): Does my right hon. Friend realise that one of the amendments in this group—No. 80—has been produced by the Government since we adjourned last Friday?

Mr. Forth: I am glad my hon. Friend picked that point up, because I was going to mention it later on. It is significant that if we had rushed through the Bill last week, we would not have had the benefit of the Government amendment that has since been tabled. The Bill might therefore have been defective in some way. The world should be grateful for the fact that the House lingered over the Bill last week to enable the Government to come forward with their later thoughts in the form of amendment No. 80, to which I will come shortly.

The Minister seemed to want to nod through amendments Nos. 33 and 34 as though they were of little or no consequence, but I believe that we should ask at least some questions about them. I shall read out amendment No. 33 so that we know where we are:

"An order under this section shall not include provision made by virtue of subsection (2)(b) which would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament if it were contained in an Act of that Parliament".

Here we are touching, importantly and properly, on the relationship between what happens here at Westminster and the devolved powers of the Scottish Parliament. I always thought that environmental matters were without boundaries. I have been told over and again by Euro enthusiasts that one of the great strengths of the European Union is that it deals with cross-boundary—[Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) want to intervene?

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): No.

Mr. Forth: I am glad the hon. Gentleman is enjoying the debate. I hope that he will stay for the whole five hours.

One of the alleged benefits of our membership of the European Union, or, indeed, of the Union itself is that it deals with cross-border environmental matters. Yet, here we are, as I read this amendment, seemingly acknowledging that the approaches taken to these important environmental matters could be different, even within this tiny country of the United Kingdom or within the British Isles, and that the Scottish Parliament might well take a different view. That surely cuts right across all the arguments that I have ever heard about how it is vital that environmental matters are dealt with at not just a national but a trans-national level.

It would appear that we might have a problem here. If we take the amendment literally—and we can do only that because the Minister did not bother to explain it—we envisage that the Scottish Parliament could digress from this Parliament in its approach to climate change and microgeneration. That is doubly unfortunate, since I would have thought that one of the environmental benefits of having Scotland as part of the United Kingdom is that it is almost certainly much richer in the renewable resources to which we all aspire. Therefore, the idea that the Scots might head off in a different direction, courtesy of devolution and the Scottish Parliament, seems unfortunate. For that reason alone, I would have thought that it might be better not to have this amendment in order that we could maintain integrity.

[Mr. Forth]

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Scottish Parliament has already taken a different view? Its environmental targets are far superior to those set in this place.

Mr. Forth: That may well be the case; I do not dispute that. However, it illustrates the potential difficulty. What would happen if the Scottish Parliament set lower targets, for example, and we felt that that was a most unfortunate thing to do?

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I refer to the declaration of interest that I made last week.

I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the provision applies to a particular clause only. He can be reassured that where matters fall within the scope of a UK or GB-wide competence, they are not affected by the Bill, but where a matter is currently within the competence of the Scottish Parliament, it stays there. We are not changing the fundamental relationship in any way. I hope that he will be reassured by my understanding of the effect of the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I shall accept his explanation and move on as a small reward for his participating in the debate. I hope that we will hear a lot more from him as time goes on.

That brings us on to the string of amendments that the Minister sought to dismiss as somehow trivial or technical—Nos. 40, 42, 43, 44, 45 and 46—in which we are beginning to tackle, really for the first time, the definition of microgeneration and the relationship between the Energy Act 2004 and the Bill. This was touched on at col. 1088 of the Official Report for 10 March 2006, when there was an interesting exchange between my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and the Minister. We—that is the House, because I do not think we were being properly guided on that occasion—got a little confused about whether we were talking about microgeneration being solely concerned with renewables or whether it went beyond that. That subject will come up in a moment when we look at the relationship between the Energy Act and the Bill, but at that stage we were talking about targets and the Minister was helping to clarify matters. He said:

"The target of 10 per cent. is for renewables .... It is not a target for microgeneration"—[Official Report, 10 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 1088.]

That set the scene for what I want to explore in some of these amendments, which is how far microgeneration, as we now want to define it, is involved with renewables only or whether it can involve any other source of energy.

The Energy Act, to which the clause refers, comprehensively sets out an approach to microgeneration. That is one of the reasons why I have hesitated so far to give my wholehearted support to the Bill, Section 82 of the Act, to which the amendments refer, places a duty on the Secretary of State

"to prepare a strategy for the promotion of microgeneration in Great Britain".

It goes on to state that he "must publish the strategy within 18 months after the commencement".

We should have had sight of that strategy by now. Perhaps when the Minister responds on this group, which he airily dismissed as being merely technical, he will tell us where we stand on that.

Malcolm Wicks: The strategy will be published by the end of this month.

Mr. Forth: Is not this debate useful? Are we not starting to elicit some really useful information? Thank goodness for the parliamentary process, because the Minister has just reaffirmed that this matter, which is outstanding from the Energy Act, will come to fruition at the end of this month. I am grateful to him. It is important because before we embark on Third Reading we might want to have that document from the Government in order to set a proper context for that debate. That is another good reason why it would have been wrong to rush through a parliamentary stage ahead of the Government producing the document referred to in the Energy Act. I am grateful to the Minister, but we should all think a little about how far we want to rush things before getting that report, which must be relevant to the final consideration of the Bill in this House and in another place.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend realise that what the Minister said is no great deal, because under the terms of the provision to which he referred the latest date by which the report has to be laid before the House is 5 April this year? It will have taken seventeen and three-quarter months to produce the report against the 18-month maximum time scale.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I cannot understand the reason for the delay, especially as we have known about the Bill and the dates when it would be considered for a long time. I am not really a suspicious sort of chap, so I hope that I do not evince too much suspicion by hoping that the report was not delayed artificially because the promoter of the Bill and the Minister assumed that we would have completed our consideration. Things should have been the other way round. Fortunately, because the House has chosen to debate the Bill properly and in proper detail, our Third Reading may take place after we have the benefit of the report, which would be a huge advantage.

10 am

I come again to section 82 of the Energy Act 2004, where subsection (6) states:

"For the purposes of this section 'microgeneration' means the use for the generation of electricity or the production of heat of any plant ... which in generating electricity or (as the case may be) producing heat, relies wholly or mainly on a source of energy or a technology mentioned in subsection (7);"

and

"the capacity of which to generate electricity or . . . produce heat does not exceed the capacity mentioned in subsection (8)."

Those are important matters. We are starting to get to the heart of the definition of microgeneration, as originally set out in the 2004 Act and which would be affected by the measures we are discussing.

Subsection (7) gives the usual list of preferred sources of energy:

"biomass . . . biofuels . . . fuel cells . . . photovoltaics . . . water (including waves and tides) . . . wind . . . solar power . . . geothermal sources . . . combined heat and power systems".

and, crucially,

"other sources of energy and technologies for the generation of electricity or the production of heat, the use of which would, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, cut emissions of greenhouse gases in Great Britain."

I think, subject to correction, that the important distinction is that we are moving towards trying to establish whether microgeneration, in the context of climate change—which is, of course, the point of the Bill—is concerned only with renewables as such, or whether there should be a somewhat broader definition of sources of energy and technologies that would cut emissions of greenhouse gases. As I understand it, the two are not necessarily the same.

Subsection (8) of section 8 notes that capacity is "in relation to the generation of electricity, 50 kilowatts"

and

"in relation to the production of heat, 45 kilowatts thermal".

Given that the typical consumption of a household is between 1 and 3 kW at most, a 50 kW capacity is relatively large for a single domestic unit. That is something that we will have to come to in the context of a different group of amendments. In 2004, it certainly seemed clear not only that renewables were to be included in the definition of microgeneration, but that the definition could encompass sources that would cut emissions of greenhouse gases.

There seem to be important differences between those provisions and amendments Nos. 51 and 52, in the Minister's name. Amendment No. 51 repeats, in essence, the provisions in the Energy Act, noting that

"'microgeneration means the use for the generation of electricity or the production of heat of any plant (which, for this purpose, includes any equipment, apparatus or appliance)—which, in generating electricity or (as the case may be) producing heat, relies wholly or mainly on a source of energy or a technology mentioned in subsection (2)".

The following subsection repeats the point about capacity. The energy sources are listed in amendment No. 52:

"biomass . . . biofuels . . . fuel cells . . . photovoltaics . . . water (including waves and tides) . . . wind . . . solar power . . . geothermal sources . . . combined heat and power systems".

That is crucially and, presumably, deliberately different from the definition in the Act, so the question arises: why have we lost the previous definition that allowed for other sources of energy

"which would, in the opinion of the Secretary of State"

cut emissions of greenhouse gases in Great Britain? That is an important question, which touches on the definition of microgeneration for that purpose. If we are now talking only about the second list, it eliminates, presumably deliberately, other possible sources of energy, either present or future.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend accept that it was slightly disingenuous of the Minister to say that these were merely drafting amendments? Amendment No. 52 is substantive.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. What worries me about the approach that has hitherto been taken to the Bill is that it neither serves the Bill nor the cause it espouses well for the Minister and the promoter of the Bill not to give the House the benefit of proper explanations of what they are trying to do. They may think that by remaining silent they will somehow accelerate the Bill's progress and rush it through the procedure, because delay is unacceptable—a bizarre interpretation of the legislative process, to say the least—but in fact they are simply forcing us to try to elicit information through the tabling of amendments and the initiation of debate. They are missing the point that if they had given the House a proper explanation in the first place, it might have made our proceedings much quicker. Perhaps that lesson will be learned by Members, but so far I fear that the penny has not dropped.

I was interested to read a little item in a newspaper recently, headed "The £3,000 mini power station", which relates exactly to what we are talking about. I shall read from it, Madam Deputy Speaker; it will not take long:

"The traditional household boiler could soon be a thing of the past. Ceres Power, the Aim-listed group, has successfully designed and tested a 1kW fuel cell stack that generates sufficient power for the average home.

Fuel cell technology is typically powered by hydrogen but the fuel cell stack developed by Ceres can also produce electricity and heat from natural gas. The boiler, which fits comfortably into the palm of a hand, uses 'combined heat and power' technology. Unlike a conventional boiler that only produces heat, in Ceres's version a chemical reaction generates both heat and electricity. Any excess electricity can be sold to the national grid."

That is exactly what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) wants to do through the Bill. The article notes that the technology could "cost the same as a conventional premium boiler".

The company claims—they would, would they not?—that its technology

"could save between 30 and 40 per cent. of total electricity costs in the home"

and

"significantly cut down the emission of greenhouse gases".

When I read that, I wondered whether the chemical reaction in any way violates the principle that is being set out in the amendments, in the move—as I see it—entirely towards what we would broadly call renewables. I concede that it is heat and power technology, but will it, in all the different forms it could take, fit comfortably in the amendments?

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con) rose—

Mr. Forth: Ah, my right hon. Friend is about to help me.

Mr. Letwin: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend and I certainly do not intend to do so for more than 15 seconds, but paragraph (c) in subsection (2) of amendment No. 52 refers specifically to what he has described: fuel cells.

[Mr. Letwin]

Mr. Forth: Indeed. I was merely trying to clarify whether it was felt that the technology that I briefly described would fit into that provision. Although my right hon. Friend, who is of course a great expert, has helped the House, he is not the promoter of the Bill or the Minister—yet—but I certainly accept his explanation.

The good news and the saving of all is that subsection (4) of amendment No. 52 states:

"The Secretary of State may by order amend subsection (2)"—

the one that lists the now preferred sources of energy—

"by addition to the sources of energy and technologies for the time being listed any other source of energy or technology for the generation of electricity or production of heat if he considers that the use of that source of energy or technology would cut emissions of greenhouse gases".

Presumably, the argument is that the Secretary of State is to be allowed to broaden the original list in the 2004 Act, or to make it more flexible, by order.

It always causes some nervousness when we see the Secretary of State doing something by order, because I do not know what reassurance we can get that we would have an opportunity to scrutinise such a decision by a future Secretary of State in an area as vital as this. A Secretary of State might suddenly pop up and say, "I have been persuaded by experts that this new source of energy fits within the aspirations that were set out in the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill, and therefore I am going to add something to the list, under powers given to me by what is at present amendment No. 52(4), which had found its way into the Bill, which had become an Act. I am not entirely happy that we should be giving such powers to a Secretary of State without some sort of saving provision or parliamentary process, and yet that is the aspiration of the Minister.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that one of the problems, particularly with fuel cells, is that one of the by-products of fuel cell technology is water vapour—yet water vapour is the most extensive greenhouse gas, but for some reason it has been excluded from the provisions of the Bill?

Mr. Forth: I hesitate to get involved in technical details of the sort that my hon. Friend is suggesting, although that subject might come up on Third Reading because, as we all know, the big picture of climate change in terms of water vapour clouds, carbon dioxide—natural and man-made—and so on, will have to be considered, but not quite yet. However, if my hon. Friend should seek to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, he might, in the context of fuel cells, wish to explore that matter further.

My suspicions, originally aroused by subsection (4), were allayed when I read on, because it goes on:

"The power to make an order under subsection (4)—

(a) is exercisable by statutory instrument, and

(b) includes power to make such supplemental or consequential provision (including provision modifying this section) and such transitional or saving provision as the Secretary of State thinks fit."

It continues—this is the reassurance that I was seeking:

"No order under that subsection may be made unless a draft of the order—

(a) has been laid before Parliament".

In that respect we have proper provision. Here I pay tribute to the Minister, as he has given us proper provision for the House to consider the changes that the amendment envisages.

I would hope that, in the context of this group of amendments, at some point these matters will be clarified in terms of the change that has taken place between an Act as recent as the Energy Act 2004 and the Bill that we are now considering.

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps I may clarify that point now. Amendments Nos. 51 and 52 do replicate the definition in the 2004 Act—the only difference is that in order to add to the list of technologies, the Secretary of State has to lay an order before Parliament, whereas under the 2004 Act the Secretary of State could just designate other sources as microgeneration. Therefore, our amendment enhances the role of Parliament. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be satisfied by that explanation.

Mr. Forth: I am extremely grateful to the Minister. Again, we see the remarkable value of this process of debate and amendment.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Would it not have been more helpful to the House if the Minister had said that at the beginning?

Mr. Forth: Indeed it would; my hon. Friend is right. We are learning a lot of lessons today, which I hope will be promulgated outside the House. Those people who are in a rush to legislate do themselves a disservice, and not only because it is a bad way to legislate. There is the arrogance of people who say, "This is my Bill and we are all signed up to it and therefore it must not be questioned under any circumstances" on the one hand, and those who want to rush the process on the other—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the debate on how or how not to legislate is for another day. Today we are discussing the amendment.

10.15 am

Mr. Forth: Yes of course, Madam Deputy Speaker, but it is useful to make the point as often as possible because some people do not yet seem to have grasped it. However, I will leave that just for the moment.

We now come to this neat little amendment, No. 80, which has been slipped into our proceedings. As has been said, is it not lucky that we are still considering the Bill today? Would it not have been terrible if we had wrapped up the proceedings prematurely on the previous sitting day and the Government had not had the chance to table that amendment, which popped up only on Wednesday 15 March?

I freely concede that amendment No. 80 is not a significant or major amendment, but presumably, if this opportunity to amend the Bill had not arisen, the Bill, if the House agreed to it, would have gone to another place defective, and might have had to be amended by the House of Lords. As we all know, as time marches on in the private Member's Bill process, Bills have to go to the House of Lords, so it does become somewhat hazardous. Therefore, it is just as well, is it not, that we are able today to deal with this amendment—which I am sure is worthy, although the Minister has not bothered to explain it either—and therefore make some proper progress.

All in all, subject to what the Minister may choose to say if he seeks to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, as far as I am concerned at this stage, this group of amendments may well be satisfactory, but I await further words from the Minister and further debate on these important amendments.

Mr. Chope: Following what my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said in responding to the Minister, may I develop the point that I made on an intervention, which seemed to raise some eyebrows on the Front Bench and certainly did so on the Liberal Democrat Benches?

We welcome to the House this morning the new Liberal Democrat spokesman on this subject, the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne). He made some body movements and gestures when I suggested that one of the by-products of fuel cell technology is water vapour. I do not know whether he disputes that, but I have a note here that is relevant. I will not trouble the House with all the detail of it, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) will probably not need to be taught about this because he knows it already, but it says:

"What is a fuel cell? Fuel cells are devices that produce electrical power. They operate by using the chemical properties of hydrogen and oxygen to create useable electrical current, heat and water vapour. In some ways they can be considered to be a continuously fuelled battery, although unlike a battery they do not store energy; they convert it from one form to another."

The significant expression there is "water vapour", because if pure hydrogen is used as a fuel for these fuel cells, the only outputs are electricity, heat and water vapour.

Mr. Letwin: Again, I will not detain House for more than 30 seconds. Nobody was debating that fuel cells produce water; that is essential to the operation of a fuel cell. The problem with my hon. Friend's remarks is that water vapour is not a greenhouse gas.

Mr. Chope: I am surprised that my right hon. Friend should say that. If that is his view, I hope that he has written a letter to The Sunday Telegraph in response to the letter in the letters column of 12 March 2006. It is a short letter, headed "Carbon dioxide is not the culprit". It criticises The Sunday Telegraph for making a common error in saying that carbon dioxide

"is the main cause of global warming"

as reported in the News Review of 5 March. The correspondent says:

"It is an extremely small share of greenhouse gases and the anthropogenic (ie man-made) content is minuscule. If we take just the anthropogenic gases the percentages are: CO2 (carbon dioxide) 0.117 per cent, NHO2 (nitrous oxide) 0.047 per cent, CH4 (methane) 0.066 per cent, and CFCs and other gases 0.047 per cent"—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. Gentleman could relate those remarks in quoting that letter to the amendment under discussion.

Mr. Chope: I am relating the letter to the amendments, Madam Deputy Speaker. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset challenged me on whether water vapour is a greenhouse gas, so I am citing a letter from The Sunday Telegraph.

I have read the introductory paragraph to the letter, but the most important part of it says:

"The most prevalent by far of all the greenhouse gasses is water vapour, representing more than 95 per cent., and it is 99.9 per cent. non-anthropogenic."

Of course, water vapour that is produced as a result of fuel cell technology is anthropogenic.

Mr. Letwin: Again, I will not detain the House for long. The fact that there is a nut who writes to the papers does not mean that water vapour is a greenhouse gas—it is not.

Mr. Chope: I hope that the insurance policy that we all have against defamation will protect my right hon. Friend when he goes outside the House and says to Mr. Anthony Brookes, from Charlwood in Surrey, "You're a nut."

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are more nuts on this subject than on almost any other?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I bring the House back to the amendment under discussion?

Mr. Chope: This is an area of debate and, I submit, dispute. I certainly would not be so bold as to describe anyone who writes to The Sunday Telegraph as a nut. The correspondent says, and this is very relevant—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we have heard quite sufficient from the letter in The Sunday Telegraph.

Mr. Chope: The correspondent makes the point that there are large vested interests in climate change that are endeavouring to force us to spend billions of pounds on $CO_2$ reduction when the poorest nations of the world remain ill-served. Obviously we do not have expert opinion here, but the correspondent is saying that if water vapour is indeed a greenhouse gas—

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should spend large amounts on stopping cloud formation?

Mr. Chope: I know that the hon. Gentleman has many powers, but I do not suggest that he should stop cloud formation. Cloud formations would come under the category of non-anthropogenic. I am talking about anthropogenic water vapour, which is, in my submission, a greenhouse gas on the basis of what Mr. Brookes says.

[Mr. Chope]

Dr. Whitehead: All right, let us try again. Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that we invest large amounts to stop people from boiling kettles to make tea?

Mr. Chope: Obviously, if a household wants to be economical in its use of electricity, one of the best things to do is to boil a kettle in the morning and put the surplus product from the kettle into a thermos flask, which avoids the need for the kettle to be re-boiled later in the day. I fear that not enough people are carrying out that process, so an avoidable waste of electricity is occurring. The hon. Gentleman makes a significant point.

Malcolm Wicks: We are all enjoying this satire on some of the wacky ideas around the area, but the hon. Gentleman's research assistant has misled him. He will have to wait two more weeks for April fool's day.

Mr. Chope: I do not know whether the Minister's comment is directed to the letters editor of The Sunday Telegraph, who printed the letter.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I have already said? I think that we have heard sufficient from the letters columns of The Sunday Telegraph. Perhaps he will address his remarks more relevantly to the amendment.

Mr. Chope: Absolutely, Madam Deputy Speaker. The point is made on fuel cells.

We know that the list in Government amendment No. 52 sets out sources of energy and technologies that are not purely what we might describe as renewable or green. As a consequence, sources of energy will be allowed to be used as a substitute for nuclear power, which does not generate any $CO_2$ and thus greenhouse gas, although they are less efficient. I do not understand why the promoter of the Bill and the Government seem to have it in for nuclear, because if we used more nuclear energy we would be able to reduce $CO_2$ emissions.

Mr. Hollobone: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Proposed new subsection (2)(i) in amendment No. 52 cites "combined heat and power systems."

A lot of those systems use gas efficiently, but they are not renewable sources of energy. He is right to make it clear to the House that the Bill addresses not just renewable sources of energy, but the efficient use of fuel sources that will eventually run out.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend brings substantial expertise to the debate.

Mark Lazarowicz: That is precisely why the Bill's title is the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill, not the climate change and renewable energy Bill. The whole purpose of the Bill is to deal with not only renewables, but the most efficient use of several forms of energy.

Mr. Chope: But what is sustainable? Who is defining sustainable? The hon. Gentleman has declared an interest and had the Bill drafted for him by the Sustainable Energy Partnership. Why is nuclear energy not sustainable? I would not wish to refer again to lots of newspaper articles, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I read a fascinating article recently.

Mark Lazarowicz: May I make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that although I had assistance in the preparation of the Bill from the Sustainable Energy Partnership and drew on some of its ideas, it was not responsible for the detailed drafting?

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman will accept that one of the things that binds all the bodies in the Sustainable Energy Partnership is their hatred of nuclear generation and nuclear power, which is why they have defined sustainable energy as any energy coming from a non-nuclear source. That is one of the mischiefs that we are trying to expose.

There was an interesting debate in the columns of one of our national newspapers in the past week on whether the best Greens and environmentally concerned people supported nuclear as a solution to the problem, or preferred renewables. I will not go into that debate in detail, but we must be aware that the promoter of the Bill and the Sustainable Energy Partnership are coming at the matter from a position of self-interest and prejudice against nuclear generation and the retention and renewal of this country's nuclear capacity.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) said, combined heat and power systems are not renewable. The systems can involve the use of refuse-derived fuel. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset will know that there is quite a lot of controversy about such fuel because there must be a process of incineration and combustion before it can be created. That process can result in noxious emissions and is a controversial way of dealing with this country's waste. Gasification and pyrolysis are obviously other ways of turning waste into fuel.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I understand from my recent visit to Woking that provided that waste is combusted at a sufficiently high temperature, all those noxious chemicals can be burnt, and the residue is perfectly innocuous, with no serious gas emissions.

10.30 am

Mr. Chope: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman says based on his visit to Woking. All I can say to him is that if he had attended the big public inquiry in Dorset last summer, which went on for many weeks—we have not yet received the inspector's report so I suppose it is, in a sense, sub judice—he would have found that there was tremendous scepticism and public concern about the prospect of having RDF plants in parts of the urban area surrounding Bournemouth and Christchurch.

That stems partly from concern about incineration and the resulting noxious substances and partly from the fact that getting the waste to the place where it is burnt and made into refuse-derived fuel involves transport over long distances, storage and the building of substantial plants. That is a cause of great concern in my constituency and, I understand from reading articles, in many other parts of the country, although perhaps not in Woking. We should bear that concern in mind. Why does Government amendment No. 52 specify particular sources of energy but leave others out of the debate?

The main point that I want to make concerns capacity. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst referred to that. I have already commented on the use of "sustainable energy" in the Bill's title as basically meaning anything that the promoters of sustainable energy want—anything other than nuclear. Similarly, many people outside the House will have been misled by the references in the Bill to microgeneration. When people talk about microgeneration they probably have in mind the sort of generating equipment that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is to put on his premises in, I think, Notting Hill, where he still lives. That windmill will generate about 400W of power.

The Minister is doing better than that because I read in The Daily Telegraph on Monday, I think, that he is minded to install on his premises a windmill that will generate 1kW of power. It looks as though the Minister has not seen that article, but if it did not come to him in ministerial press cuttings, he needs to get a new supplier of ministerial press cuttings. The article said that the Minister is to have a generator on his premises which will generate a maximum of 1kW of electricity. Obviously, that shows that the Minister's household uses a lot more electricity than that of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. I will not cast aspersions because of that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope not because it is not relevant to the amendment that we are discussing.

Mr. Chope: I absolutely agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, but you will have noticed that subsection (3) of Government amendment No. 52 says that maximum capacity in relation to the generation of electricity is 50kW; in other words, the equivalent of a windmill 50 times the size of the one that the Minister is going to have on his house or of 50 windmills of that size in the Minister's garden. The Minister laughs, but in doing so he is probably trying to ridicule the notion that that amount of generating power in a domestic garden could be regarded as microgeneration, and that, of course, is exactly my point.

Why are we allowing the definition of microgeneration to include units that generate up to 50kW of electricity—more than 50 times what is needed for the Minister's house and more than 100 times, indeed 125 times, what is needed for the house of my right hon. Friend? When we start talking about microgeneration of up to 50kW, we are talking about very big developments—enormous windmills or whole series of windmills. Why should microgeneration be deemed to include electricity generation 50 times or more what an individual household needs? I cannot understand that. I support the principle of microgeneration and the idea of reducing the need for the national grid to operate and allowing more energy production to be, I think the expression is, decentralised. I cannot for the life of me see that if a household chooses to put up to 50kW of electricity-generating capacity in the garden or on the house that should be described as microgeneration.

I am disappointed that the Minister, when he came to look at the contents of the Energy Act 2004 and redrafted its provisions in the amendments that we now see before us, stuck to the figure of 50kW. I hope that he will explain how 50kW can genuinely be called, in popular parlance, microgeneration. I hope that my Front-Bench colleagues will think about this subject because if we are to get public support for decentralised power production, surely we need to gain the confidence of the general public. If somebody living, for example, in a seafront bungalow in Bexhill in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) could put up 50 windmills in their garden on the basis that it would be microgeneration and then sell almost all that surplus electricity into the national grid, and their neighbours could do the same thing, my hon. Friend would find that Bexhill, far from being a very attractive retirement area with south-facing views over the channel, would basically become an industrial landscape.

Mark Lazarowicz: If we get on to the next group of amendments, I hope that the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) will be reassured that the Bill will not allow people suddenly to put 50 windmills in their back gardens in Bexhill, and that is certainly not the intention behind it.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that remark so far as it goes, but I had hoped that he would explain why he feels that microgeneration needs to be defined as anything up to 50kW rather than, perhaps, 1kW, which would surely be much more consistent with the popular understanding of microgeneration. Perhaps when the Bill reaches the other place we will have to ask their lordships whether there is a possibility of introducing into the Bill something called mini-microgeneration, which could be up to 1kW rather than up to 50kW. Whatever the promoter of the Bill says—we will come on to the debate about the planning aspects in due course—the Bill will say that 50kW of electricity generation is regarded as microgeneration. That defies common sense.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share my worry that if we get this wrong, we will face difficulties similar to those surrounding another technology—telecommunications masts? If we get the exemption wrong, the level wrong or the capacity wrong, we will find that the equipment can be set up without sufficient local input or controls.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I warn the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) not to be tempted down the road of telecommunications masts.

Mr. Chope: I shall not be, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, when we discuss planning and development orders, analogies with telecommunications masts may well be in order. However, that will be a decision for you to make at the time.

[Mr. Chope]

There has been some levity and repartee, and I have seen letters from people who might be described as rather hysterical about the Bill, but there is a serious issue here. If we want public support for the principle of localised, decentralised energy generation, which is Conservative policy as I understand it, we should try to allay concerns by having a definition of microgeneration that is more in accord with what the ordinary person would regard as micro, rather than macro.

My comments on electricity generation also apply to the production of heat. Think of the size of the equipment, plant and apparatus that would have to be installed to capture enough solar energy to produce 45kW thermal. Can we really describe that as microgeneration?

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps it will help the hon. Gentleman if I make it clear that the provision is designed to cover not only households, but community schemes. That is why the 50kW threshold was considered appropriate.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention, but I am confused. Under clause 16, the maxima for the generation of electricity applicable to community energy schemes are not 50 kW and 45 kW thermal, but 20MW and 100 MW thermal.

Mr. Hollobone: My hon. Friend has stumbled across an important part of the Bill. If, for simplicity, we say that one house uses 1kW, amendment No. 39, in effect, provides that a group of 50 houses could be covered by a scheme; but clause 16 allows up to 20MW, or 20,000kW per scheme, which would supply 20,000 houses. Surely the point of the debate is to seek justification of the 50kW limit, when it would seem sensible to reduce the limit to 1kW or perhaps 5kW and thus seriously define the micro in microgeneration.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I hope that our combined forces will prompt a response from our hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle.

Gregory Barker: I think that everyone here is labouring under a misapprehension. I understand that the average household consumes about 10kW of electricity. The case that my hon. Friend is making is fundamentally flawed, the scale on which his argument is based is incorrect and the premise that he is advancing is nonsense.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is long on assertions; I hope that he can justify the assertion that he has just made. According to my information, average household consumption of electricity is in the order of 3.6kW. Obviously individual figures vary, and it may be that my hon. Friend's house uses much more than 3.6kW, but my understanding is that domestic energy use averages 4,700kWh per annum. I do not pretend to be an expert; those figures are produced by the British Wind Energy Association, and a document in front of me confirms them.

Gregory Barker: My hon. Friend continues to labour under a misapprehension. We are referring to heat and electricity.

Mr. Chope: I do not understand my hon. Friend's point. I am talking about 3.6kW of energy being used each year, yet under the Bill generation up to 45kW is described as microgeneration.

Dr. Whitehead: One is output, the other is capacity.

Mr. Chope: I am sorry, but because of the rustling of papers I could not hear what the hon. Gentleman said.

Dr. Whitehead: The hon. Gentleman is talking about household electricity use, which is output. In the context of the installation of microgeneration devices, he is referring to capacity.

Mr. Chope: Maximum capacity, rather than the amount that is actually produced?

Dr. Whitehead: The two should not be confused.

Mr. Chope: One could have a large power station with enormous capacity measured in gigawatts whose output is very small because it is being run at far less than capacity, but that does not answer my question: why allow capacity of 50kW when capacity of only 1kW or 3 kW is needed to produce the power for an individual household?

Our debate today is beginning to illustrate the fact that when we have a Bill that is the subject of a large degree of consensus, it does not receive in Standing Committee the proper scrutiny and examination that can be achieved on the Floor of the House or during the Committee stage of an ordinary public Bill, when those who are concerned about the Bill or sceptical serve on the Committee alongside those who are enthusiastic about it, with the result that a real debate is had. Perhaps we shall be able to resolve the problems by the time we get to Third Reading.

The British Wind Energy Association believes that its calculation is correct, and I find it hard to understand why it should be wrong. I am looking through "Calculations for wind energy statistics" to try to address the point that has been put to me. My intellectual understanding of the matter is being challenged and I do not want that challenge to go unanswered. My hon. Friend has asserted that the average UK household use of energy is much higher than I said. I do not know whether the figure of average domestic energy use of 4,700kWh per annum is incorrect, or what he thinks should be put in its place. As I understand it, if efficiency is close to 100 per cent. one needs less capacity than one would with less efficient generators such as wind turbines, which are only 0.3 per cent. efficient because of the inconsistent nature of wind. Most types of generators have a capacity of 0.5 per cent. If the average home uses 4,700 kWh a year, the generators can provide power, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering said, for 5,000 households. For example, a 1MWe wind turbine can supply energy to 559.1 homes.

The Minister defended himself by saying that the definitions of microgeneration in the Government amendments of 50kW and 45kW are set high to meet the provisions of clause 16. I hope that he accepts that the community energy schemes dealt with in that clause are subject to a much higher maximum, so Government amendment No. 39 should apply to domestic household microgeneration, not the promotion of community energy schemes.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): In his discussion of microgeneration my hon. Friend has referred to wind power. I declare my interest as president of Country Guardian, which opposes the littering of the countryside with wind turbines and, indeed, their siting in any other inappropriate place. What size of wind turbines are we talking about? Can they be placed anywhere, including rural areas?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying into the debate on the next group of amendments.

Mr. Chope: You have stolen my thunder, Madam Deputy Speaker, because I was going to say exactly the same thing. However, my hon. Friend has raised a pertinent issue for the next debate.

The Minister has caused a great deal of confusion, because he said that the maximum is designed to promote community energy schemes, and will apply to groups of houses or flats or small communities comprising large numbers of households. However, in the provision, microgeneration applies to individual households or households within the curtilage of a dwelling house.

Mr. Forth: That was my reading of the Bill. Clause 9(6) explicitly says that a dwelling house

"does not include a building containing one or more flats, or a flat contained within such a building", and it goes on to define a flat. It is not until clause 16, as my hon. Friend said, that community energy projects appear in the Bill. It is therefore important to maintain the distinction between the so-called microgeneration required for domestic dwellings and so-called community energy projects. I am sure that that distinction will emerge much more clearly as the debate proceeds.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right. I shall not press the point any further, because I hope that when we debate the amendment that I have tabled to clause 16 he will be able to explain that there is an even higher maximum for microgeneration under that clause than there is under Government amendment No. 52.

Mr. Hollobone: Would the Government not be in a better position to promote community energy schemes if they lowered the limit for individual residential householders? Householders would appear to be in a good position to receive permission for a wind turbine 50 times the size of the turbine covered by the amendments. If the limit were lowered there would be more incentive for neighbourhoods and communities to get together and establish their own neighbourhood generation.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is right. On 13 March, Ceres Power issued the following press release:

"Ceres Power, the AIM-quoted fuel cell group, announces that it has taken a major step in commercialising its technology with the achievement of a critical milestone. The Company has successfully designed, built and tested a 1 kW fuel cell stack (the 'Ceres Stack') generating sufficient power for the average home."

Ceres Power thinks that a 1kW fuel cell stack will generate enough power for the average home, but my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle asserted that we need 10kW. An AIM-listed company says that a small, lightweight fuel cell which, I believe, almost fits into the palm of one's hand, can deliver 1kW. Surely, it is not so out of touch as to underestimate by a factor of 10 the power needs of the average home? If my hon. Friend is right, one would have to buy 10 of those compact fuel cells to supply one household's fuel needs. I hope that we can get to the bottom of the matter because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering suggested, if we want to educate and encourage people to use microgeneration—my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has given a strong lead on that—we must ensure that the natives do not get restless.

We do not want people to think that they can engage in an industrial process in their back garden that would enable them to sell 95 per cent. of their output. Jam makers are subject to regulations that prevent them from selling surplus jam at Women's Institute markets. Why, then, should individuals be allowed to generate 49kW of energy and sell it to the national grid while they keep 1kW for themselves?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is rehearsing arguments that we have already heard.

Mr. Chope: I certainly would not want to rehearse any arguments again, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that, having listened to our debate, the Minister will explain the difference between the provisions of what he described as technical amendments and the much higher limits in clause 16. I hope that he will engage in constructive debate on the importance of not alarming the citizens of this country with the prospect of much larger generating units being sited in back gardens or elsewhere.

This has been a useful debate. I am glad that last week the Minister accepted that there was a defect in the Bill, which led to the introduction of Government amendment No. 80. When the Minister responds, I hope that he will address my concern that the definition of greenhouse gas emissions in the context of dynamic demand technologies in clause 15, which is the subject of amendment No. 80, is consequential on Government amendment No. 50, which we debated last week. That introduced a definition of greenhouse gas in clause 23 covering any of the six gases specified in the Kyoto protocol. Surely technology that increases one greenhouse gas but reduces another is not necessarily good technology. Do we not want the impact of technology on each greenhouse gas to be measured? My fear—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—is that amendment No. 80 would allow the Government to look at the overall impact on all six gases, rather than measuring the impact on each of the greenhouse gases separately. You will be pleased to know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that I do not propose to engage again in the debate about whether water vapour is a greenhouse gas.

[Mr. Chope]

11 am

Malcolm Wicks: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to one of the points that emerged in the latter stages of the discussion. I will not go into the sticky business of Women's Institute jam because we are focusing on global warming and the planet's chance to have jam tomorrow, so let us stick with that.

Questions were raised about the differences in the definitions of microgeneration and community schemes. Perhaps I can help the House. Microgeneration is for households and community schemes—for example, solar panels on church halls, or the wind turbine that I saw on the building at the Daventry country park when I was asked to visit it—whereas the community energy schemes referred to in clause 16 are intended to cover both small scale community installations that could be classed as microgeneration, and larger schemes such as district heating.

Mr. Forth: Can the Minister say a little more about what a large scheme might be in this context? We are talking about microgeneration, which would be understood by the layman in a particular way. Now that the Minister has spoken of a large scheme in the context of community projects, could he give the House some idea of the scale? What sort of size of building or installation does he have in mind when he talks about a large scheme?

Malcolm Wicks: The technology would determine which section applied to the scheme. It could be a new school. I was scheduled today to open the new Ashburton school in Croydon in my borough—the Ashburton learning village, which has extensive photovoltaics. I rather regret in some respects that I cannot undertake my duties in my own borough today because of the delays that have been caused. The scheme could be a new library, a big new community centre, a new church or church hall or a sports hall. I hope the House understands that those are the kind of developments that we are trying to cover.

Mr. Forth: It is important that we have this dialogue. Is the Minister saying that he believes that a photovoltaic installation, even on the roof of a school, would contribute to community energy in the sense in which I understand the Bill to refer to it?

Malcolm Wicks: I was talking about the range of possibilities. Some schemes could involve mini combined heat and power installations, for example. There is a range of heat technologies. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has had a chance to explore some of them in his constituency, just as I hoped to find out more today if I had been able to put principle into practice by helping to open the Ashburton learning village. I hope I have provided clarification.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

FUNCTIONS OF THE GAS AND ELECTRICITY MARKETS AUTHORITY IN RELATION TO MICROGENERATION

Amendment made: No. 40, in page 6, leave out lines 13 and 14 and insert

'the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006.".'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Mr. Chope: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 6, line 15, leave out clause 9.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 13, in page 6, line 25 [Clause 9], at end insert—

'(2A) In carrying out the review, the Secretary of State shall have regard to the desirability of—

(a) safeguarding conservation areas;

(b) protecting visual amenity;

(c) reducing noise; and

(d) avoiding risks to health and safety.'.

No. 70, in page 6, line 25 [Clause 9], at end insert—

'(2A) In carrying out the review, the Secretary of State must consult—

(a) such body or bodies as appear to him to be representative of local authorities;

(b) the Royal Institute of British Architects;

(c) the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors;

(d) the Campaign to Protect Rural England; and

(e) any other bodies or persons he considers appropriate.'.

No. 71, in page 7, line 3 [Clause 9], at end insert—

'"local authorities" has the same meaning as in section [Local authorities to have regard to information on energy measures in exercising functions].'.

Mr. Chope: In addition to speaking to my amendment No. 32, I shall say a few words about the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), which qualify clause 9 by requiring the Secretary of State to have regard to, among other things, four desirable outcomes when carrying a review of permitted development orders.

Before considering the detail of what is proposed, I shall set the matter in context. The Town and Country Planning Act 1990 contains important safeguards and restrictions on the ability of a landowner to carry out development on his land. Those restrictions are imposed on the grounds of amenity, and are a significant restriction on the principle that an Englishman's home is his castle and that he can do in it and on his land whatever he wishes.

Planning provides community protection for local people who are concerned about intrusive, insensitive and antisocial behaviour. It is reflected in Government guidance emanating in the form of policy planning guidance and appears in the latest manifestation of that—regional spatial strategies. The regional spatial strategy for the south-west of England, which is of interest to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) on the Front Bench, has been discussed. It is very controversial. It must be submitted to the Department by the end of March, and as I understand it—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Interesting and controversial the regional spatial strategy might be, but it is not relevant to the amendment under discussion.

Mr. Chope: I shall return to section 52(2)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990.

Mr. Hollobone: I am listening to my hon. Friend's words with interest. Last time we discussed the Bill, we had the benefit of the presence of a Minister from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to deal with development issues. Does my hon. Friend share my disappointment that the Minister is not present today?

Mr. Chope: I do, but perhaps the Minister did not expect us to reach this group of amendments so quickly. She may be on her way to the Chamber. I know from my own experience when I was a Minister with responsibility for planning matters that this is a technical area, and a Minister for Housing and Planning can speak with much more authority than the Minister for Energy, although I accept that the hon. Gentleman is very knowledgeable about most things.

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning is in her constituency, where many of us would like to be on a Friday. The fact that I am in the Chamber to represent the entire Government shows that we do not just talk joined-up, we do it.

Mr. Chope: I am glad that the Government make provision for Ministers to attend the House on a Friday, because the Government and the House decided that we should meet on various Fridays during the year. It would be rather bizarre if—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are meeting on a Friday and we are discussing a particular set of amendments proposed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chope: Section 52(2)(a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 refers to a development order, which "itself grants planning permission for development specified in the order or for development of any class specified."

In other words, the development order provides for planning permission to be granted without any notice having to be given, without any consultation with those who are or may be affected by it, without any need for a planning application, and without the involvement of any locally elected councillors—just like the planning-free environment which, to an extent, prevailed before the advent of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947.

A permitted development order can therefore be a very far-reaching curtailment of environmental protection.Clause 9 seems designed to facilitate further and far-reaching curtailment of environmental protection. That is why I am very concerned about the clause and have tabled an amendment seeking to remove it from the Bill. I recognise that the issue creates a dilemma for my hon. Friends. To what extent should we jeopardise one part of the environment, such as visual amenity, in order to benefit another part, perhaps by seeking to reduce global warming? Those are just the sort of issues that we should debate. They are not black and white, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst agrees that inherent conflicts and contradictions on environmental issues are best resolved locally, by locally elected representatives. Of course, that is what can be done under planning law, but could not be done under the general development order relaxation proposed in the clause.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share my unease about the danger of making a presumption in favour of the ability to install what are now rather loosely known as microgenerating plants? The danger is that that will enable more and more such installations to be established, perhaps even against the wishes of individuals or local planning authorities? It is that change of presumption that is key to the provisions, which is why we have now probably got to the crux of the Bill and of the effect that it could have on our communities and in our constituencies.

Mr. Chope: That is absolutely right; it is the dilemma that I am hoping the majority of Members of the House will agree should be resolved in favour of localism.

I should like to illustrate that point by referring to the recently published document "Built to Last", which was produced by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. That document, which I shall not quote extensively, sets out "Our aims" as follows:

"To improve the quality of life for everyone through ... a dynamic economy ... a strong society

and

"a sustainable environment where we enhance the beauty of our surroundings and protect the future of our planet."

We will not enhance the beauty of our surroundings if we allow monstrosities otherwise known as microgenerating plants to proliferate in our residential neighbourhoods without the need for individual planning consent.

Mr. Hollobone: This is a very serious issue. If a planning application for 2,000 houses were made in my constituency, for example, the Government might take the view that the best way of providing energy for the houses, on the basis of the figures before us today, would be a 25 MW community energy scheme. Presumably, such a scheme would require planning permission in the normal way. If permitted development orders are introduced, the alternative is that 400 wind turbines could be constructed on an estate of 2,000 houses. Such a development might be beneficial in terms of climate change, but in terms of visual amenity there would be many different views as to whether it was acceptable.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I hope that he will contribute further to the debate in due course, if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Forth: I hope that, as my hon. Friend develops his argument—indeed, our hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Forth]

Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) may wish to elaborate as well—somebody somewhere will give me an idea of the size of installation that we are talking about. It is in the context of the clause and amendments before us, in respect of which you, Madam Deputy Speaker, most helpfully guided us earlier, that we will properly consider the size of wind turbines, community energy plants and the like. If we do nothing else, we should make people outside this place aware of the direction in which we are going in the name of so-called microgeneration and what they may end up having in their communities in that context.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. I shall come to the size of some of the plants, although without the ability to use visual aids in the Chamber, I shall have to rely on the powers of description rather than on anything else.

As it stands, clause 9 is about circumventing the local planning system, despite the fact that planning is deemed by most of our constituents to be the most important responsibility of local government. That is why people argue for keeping local councils, because it is the local councillors who are in touch with people's concerns about planning issues in particular. The importance of planning as a local government function was borne out by all the research done by the Local Government Commission for England when we last looked at reorganising local authorities and considered whether we should abolish district councils in favour of unitary authorities or county councils.

11.15 am

I shall take the House rather slowly through clause 9, because it is actually very sinister. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who is assiduous in considering such matters, will try to follow the provisions with me. Clause 9(1) states:

"The Secretary of State . . . shall . . . carry out a review of the effect in England of development orders made by virtue of section 59(2) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990".

It says nothing about whether the Secretary of State has to consult anyone. Subsection (2) states:

"The purpose of the review is to enable the Secretary of State to form a view as to what provision (or further provision) such development orders should make"

about the installation of microgeneration equipment. There is no reference to what evidence, if any, should be considered by the Minister, and neither is there any requirement that he should publicise any evidence.

The most sinister and dangerous element of the clause is that the purpose of the review is not objective or neutral. As line 22 makes clear, the purpose is "to facilitate development in England . . . of equipment, apparatus or appliances for microgeneration", irrespective of whether such development has an adverse impact on the beauty of our surroundings or visual amenity. I can almost hear the promoter of the Bill or perhaps the Minister saying, "Don't worry; once the review is published, it will be possible for local authorities, the Campaign to Protect Rural England, the Wildlife Trusts and so on to give their input." Such a common-sense safeguard is, however, specifically precluded by subsection (3), which states that "the Secretary of State must lay before Parliament a report of the review, including his view . . . and the reasons for it."

There is no provision for consultation on his conclusions. Even worse, there is no provision to allow for modification of his view as expressed in the review report, because subsection (4) contains this requirement:

"The report must also set out what provision . . . if any, the Secretary of State proposes to make in development orders . . . in consequence of the review."

The clause goes on to state:

"Where the Secretary of State proposes to make provision . . . in development orders in consequence of the review, he must . . . exercise his powers under section 59 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990", and he must do so as soon as is "reasonably practicable". In other words, there is no provision for parliamentary discussion, public debate or consultation. That is all too familiar from this Government.

Mr. Evans: I have grave concerns about wind turbines for a number of reasons. In a number of countries where they have proliferated, rare bird species have diminished, because of birds being killed by flying into the turbines. Is my hon. Friend telling the House that there is no opportunity for bodies or individuals who care about rare bird species that may migrate into their areas or pass through them to make representations? Can there be no representations from anyone who is concerned about the placement of wind turbines?

Mr. Chope: I am saying that. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that concern. The clause makes it clear that there is no provision for parliamentary discussion, public debate or consultation on the issue.

Mr. Forth: I can give some reassurance to my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). If he looks at my amendment No. 70, he will find that I am attempting to provide exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch is asking for. Perhaps we should have a vote when the time comes. I think that the House should express its view at some point, as there is far too much cosy consensus breaking out. I hope that my hon. Friend will refer to my amendment, as I do not take sole possession of it.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that intervention. I will indeed refer to his amendment, but I thought it would be helpful to try to progress logically and start by debating the lead amendment, which would leave out clause 9 altogether.

One way of summing up clause 9 would be to say that under its provisions the Secretary of State is expressly prohibited from listening to anyone or modifying the outcome of his review in any way. That is rather reminiscent of the Labour slogan articulated by the late Lord Shawcross after old Labour got into office after the war—"We are the masters now." The Secretary of State is the master and it is not going to be possible for anybody to intervene in any process to say, "Hold on a minute—are you sure this is actually the right thing to do in terms of the environment?"

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that those in the environmental lobby sometimes claim that they are the masters now and resent even debating some of the policies that they advocate?

Mr. Chope: That is the case with some of them, but not all. If my right hon. Friend had read the open debate in the columns of one of the national newspapers within the past 10 days, he would have seen very different positions being taken on the subject by people all of whom would describe themselves as having the best possible environmental credentials. They can agree to disagree, or strongly disagree, with each other on these issues. That is why it is all the more important that there should be provision for somebody other than just the Secretary of State, whoever he happens to be at the time, to get involved in debating whether permitted development orders should be allowed to be used so that these very large generating plants can be constructed without the need for any planning permission or any chance for local involvement in whether they are a good idea.

What size or nature of development could be constructed under a permitted development order under the clause without planning consent? That is the question that several of us are concerned about, and I will try my best to answer it. I know that in due course the promoter of the Bill wants to enter into the debate to give us some assurances. We do not allow permitted development orders to deal with such things as bus stops, bus shelters, street cabinets or even telecomms masts, although we all know from our constituency casework just how controversial those can be. Not long ago, I attended a meeting of the Greater London authority, where no less a person than the Mayor of London answered a question about the location of a bus stop in Richmond. He took the view that he, as the regional authority leader, should be the sole determinant of where that bus stop should be positioned. Under the clause, we would not have that safeguard even for a large microgenerating plant, because it would all be dealt with under permitted development orders. What would our constituents have said in the past, before the health and visual amenity aspects became big issues, if any Government or Secretary of State said, "We think that all these telecomms masts should be put up without the need for any planning permission to be obtained, because it is a jolly good thing that people should be able to communicate by mobile phone"? There would have been an enormous outcry.

I suspect that at the moment people have not woken up to the exact implications of the Bill as regards microgeneration equipment, because they think of it as being on a very small scale. When they do wake up to it, it may be too late, because by then clause 9 will already be on the statute book and the Secretary of State, without anybody being able to constrain him, will have already passed the necessary orders under the permitted development process and these developments will be outwith the control of local people and their locally elected representatives.

Mr. Hollobone: I am very supportive of wind power. A new wind farm in Kettering, Burton Wold, is providing electricity for local people. However, it is affecting many local people's television reception. If the Bill succeeds and lots of these wind turbines are put up, people may become concerned about the effects on their environment. It is right that this House should debate these issues now before it is passed into law.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We normally find in terms of legislation that prevention is better than cure. It is no good coming back later to try to amend it, because it will be too late. Some of us have been receiving representations from constituents who are concerned about the contents of some recent legislation, and we are having to say to them that it is too late to do anything about it because it has already gone through. We should anticipate the concerns that will arise. I like to think that all Members, particularly those of us who attend on Fridays, are closely in touch with their constituents' concerns.

People are worried about how big these structures would be. According to the article in The Daily Telegraph of 13 March, the wind turbine that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is seeking to fit to his house has translucent rotor blades that are 1.1m in diameter, and it will generate just 400W of electricity. The same newspaper report referred to the Minister's house in Croydon being fitted out with a 1 kW turbine—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are discussing the amendment, which is about permitted development orders. We have already heard about the developments involving the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister.

Mr. Chope: If clause 9 remains in the Bill, under a permitted development order it will be possible for all these pieces of generating equipment, whether they, belong to a Member of this House or somebody outside, to be constructed without the need for any planning permission. That is why I was about to mention the dimensions of the turbine which, according to the press report, will be placed on the Minister's premises.

Malcolm Wicks indicated dissent.

Mr. Chope: The Minister is shaking his head before he has even heard what I am going to say. The article said that it will have blades that are 1.75m in diameter. In the old-fashioned language of the metric martyrs, that is about 5 ft 9 in. That is a fairly significant size. However, that is a very small capacity turbine compared with the maximum 50kW capacity that is permitted under the Bill. Under clause 9, microgeneration as defined in the Government amendment to the Energy Act 2004 could have a capacity to generate 50kW. If the Minister were to table an amendment to redefine it as relating to a maximum capacity of 1kW, that might allay many concerns. However, clause 9, coupled with the provisions about the maximum capacity being 50kW, will put our constituents in grave jeopardy and cause them enormous anxiety.

11.30 am

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): My hon. Friend has framed this important argument excellently. However, is not he guilty of presuming too much about the review's outcome? Having listened to him carefully, I have heard a solid case for improving the clause through the process that underpins the review, but I have not yet heard a case for removing the clause, which is the purpose of the amendment. Will he make that case?

Mr. Chope: I am making the case. If the clause was not part of the Bill, putting microgenerating plant in one's garden or attaching it to one's house would be a matter for planning and subject to the usual planning laws. In that case, one would make an application, fill in a form, pay a fee to the local authority and discuss it with the local planning authority, which in due course would develop a policy in its local plan process. That might cover the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) made about whether we should have many individual pieces of generating plant or whether one larger piece of community generating plant would be preferable. The planning process could deal with all those issues. If individuals wanted to install many pieces of plant, councillors could end up discussing the applications. They could ask questions, such as that asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) about the implications for bird strike, the butterfly population and so on. However, if the clause remains in the Bill, none of those opportunities would arise. The constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) is in an urban area, where proper protection under planning laws is even more crucial, because people live close to each other.

Mr. Forth: I hope that my hon. Friend has not left the subject of size. For the benefit of us non-metric people, will he please tell us not only the overall diameter of the allegedly small wind turbine that will be positioned on or near a dwelling house, but how high it might have to be? I presume that height and size are important when considering visual and possible sound intrusion. It would be helpful if we could get some of those facts on the record so that people are under no illusions about what the Bill asks us to do.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend asks about height. I am not sure whether I have much information about maximum height. However, I have a picture, which I cannot show hon. Members, but it depicts a 12.5MW biomass plant at a place called Westfield. It resembles the cement works at Westbury. I do not know whether hon. Members are familiar with the big cement works in the countryside at Westbury. It has an enormous chimney, which rises 100 m into the sky, and large warehouse-type buildings, which could, at a guess, be 50 ft to 100 ft high. There is another picture of a smaller, 5 MW plant—the Goosey lodge plant. That resembles a mini version of the Fawley refinery. I hope that that gives some visual impression of what such plant would be like.

Mr. Evans: The applications need to be considered before full planning, but not only for reasons of size, which is important. We worried about birds, but kids playing in backyards could be affected if the blades are large. There could be a problem, depending on where the equipment was sited. Let us ensure that there are proper rules and regulations. Local authorities can then consider where equipment will be sited. I must—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman making an intervention or a speech? Perhaps he could bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. Evans: I shall, Madam Deputy Speaker. Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most common problems that we encounter in our surgeries is neighbour disputes? When neighbours cannot—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. We know that neighbour disputes can end in violence and, indeed, death. I spent some time in a previous Parliament discussing the frustrations that people can experience living on each side of a hedge.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We do not need to hear about the hon. Gentleman's frustrations in a previous life.

Mr. Hollobone rose—

Mr. Chope: I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hollobone: We have heard that the diameter of a 400W wind turbine is 1.1m and that that of a 1kW wind turbine is 1.75m. [Interruption.] I do not know whether my hon. Friend has noticed that we are being gesticulated at from the other side of the Chamber. The promoter and seconder of the Bill and the Minister are present. Surely someone can tell us what the diameter of the blades of a 50kW wind turbine would be.

Mr. Chope: I hope that we shall get closer to an answer to that pertinent point. Whatever the size, we know that it will be pretty large—or there may be many wind turbines. That could amount to the same thing. I can envisage that, in order to generate 50kW, one might have to install photovoltaic tiles and erect a fence that was 15ft high and 30ft long next door to one's neighbours.

Mark Lazarowicz: The hon. Gentleman has invited me on a couple of occasions to give my views of what the Bill might allow. Allowing a fence of the size that he outlined or, indeed, a 12.5MW biomass power station to be included under the permitted development orders would not be the desired outcome of the clause. I intend to deal with the matter in my contribution. If he is satisfied with that, perhaps he would be prepared to let other hon. Members respond to his points at an early stage in the debate.

Mr. Chope: That is a helpful point and I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's contribution, to which I shall have the opportunity to respond. I believe that the best way of tackling the problem is by leaving out clause 9.

Clause 9 currently discriminates against installations within the curtilage of a dwelling house, but not buildings that contain one or more flats. I hope that the Minister will deal with that point. If one's neighbour lived in a flat, one would have no worries, but if one's neighbour lived in a bungalow or a detached, semi-detached or terraced house, there are potential problems. My home in London, where I stay during the week, is a terraced house and the impact on my quality of life if my neighbours began installing such equipment in their gardens could be significant.

Mr. Hollobone: If one were in favour of permitted development orders, would not it appear extraordinary if blocks of flats were excluded, because their roofs would be perfect, if one were so minded, for siting a wind turbine to provide efficient energy for the dwellers.

Mr. Chope: Again, my hon. Friend makes an excellent point, which I hope the Minister will tackle. Why are blocks of flats—or houses that are converted into two flats—excluded when ordinary houses with land attached are included? Of course, one can get big converted houses, which stand in substantial plots of land. Under the provisions, they could not take advantage of the permitted development rights, but those living cheek by jowl in small bungalows could.

Amendment No. 13 limits the clause in the sense that

"the Secretary of State shall have regard to the desirability" of four factors. The amendment, tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, would be better than nothing. However, I warn him that the expression "have regard to" is a weak phrase, as we discovered in the challenge to the Government requirements on school admissions. That is why the expression in the Education and Inspections Bill, which had its Second Reading this week, has been tightened.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We have debated the Education and Inspections Bill. We are now debating the hon. Gentleman's amendment to clause 9.

Mr. Chope: Absolutely, and I was addressing my remarks to the expression "have regard to" in amendment No. 13. That expression has been the subject of judicial decision making. As a consequence of that, I ask my right hon. Friend to think again about whether it goes far enough. One cannot ignore it and proceed as before, as the High Court recently ruled.

Mr. Forth: I plead guilty in that sense, but if we must have the clause—perhaps we will accept my hon. Friend's amendment—one decision that we might have to make, and we will have to make it on the hoof, is whether my modest and perhaps rather ineffectual amendment is at least a gesture in the right direction because it could improve the clause.

Mr. Chope: I certainly agree, but I have another reservation about amendment No. 13. By specifying some factors, it could be taken that others are excluded—for example, the need to safeguard the green belt, to preserve the setting of listed buildings and to protect wildlife, the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). By not including those provisions, it might be thought that they are excluded. Perhaps that is a slightly technical, whinging point that it ill behoves me to make, especially in respect of an amendment so ably drafted by my right hon. Friend.

What I like about amendment No. 13 are the specific references to visual amenity, noise and health and safety. We discussed visual amenity quite a lot in this short debate, but noise is a big unknown factor. Nothing in the Bill would limit the use of equipment at night. We know how sensitive our constituents are to night-time noise. I have personal experience of that. We once had a family house quite close to a farm that operated equipment late at night to dry bulbs produced in west Cornwall for the early English spring market. The noise was highly intrusive, but the equipment could run at night under permitted development powers because its use was related to agriculture. There was nothing that a concerned neighbour could do, except to plead with the farmer's common sense and to ask him to limit the use of the machines to daytime or to put in proper noise insulating material.

11.45 am

The other good thing about amendment No. 13 is the reference to health and safety. We are talking about big pieces of generating equipment, which may have quite high voltage, especially if they transfer energy to the national grid. All the electricity poles in my constituency have had little red signs put on them with a yellow marking that says, "This is dangerous", and barbed wire has been put around them to protect them against intruders. Do we expect the equipment to be put on land adjacent to the public highway? How will we ensure that children, vandals and so on do not trespass and endanger their health and safety?

Mr. Forth: In a sense, the discussion takes us back to the debate on sources of energy and the list that we considered. Up to now, my hon. Friend has rightly talked about the visual and noise effects of wind turbines. We have also touched on photovoltaics—solar panels—which are probably the least intrusive pieces of equipment. However, as he rightly explains, once we get into biomass, biofuels, fuel cells and other more exotic and esoteric sources of energy, the safety element becomes of great importance. Their location and the safety factors surely must be taken into consideration. That was partly what I had in mind when I drafted my little amendment No. 13.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is right, and it is why his amendment has more in its favour than it has against it. I do not mean to damn it with faint praise; safety is a significant element.

My right hon. Friend also tabled amendment No. 70, which was not on the selection list last week because it had not reached the daylight and been exposed for public discussion. It reflects the concern that I expressed that the clause as drafted does not make provision for consultation. The amendment spells out the requirement for that.

I said that I would not be too long on this group of amendments, so I sum up by saying that surely the best protection is provided by ordinary planning law, which requires consultation with neighbours, residents' associations, parish councils and town councils. It gives the decision-making power to elected local councillors. Surely that is what we should be urging on the Government. We want to increase the safeguards, rather than reduce the protections.

[Mr. Chope]

Mark Lazarowicz: I shall speak briefly. This part of the Bill originated in an amendment tabled in Committee, and was not included in my original version. I am pleased that both Ministers and Conservative Front Benchers have made suggestions that have been incorporated in the Bill, and I am pleased that it has proved to be a suitable vehicle for such improvements.

When I said that I would speak briefly, I did not use the word in the sense in which it was applied to the 44 minutes during which the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) made what was described as "not a long speech". The hon. Gentleman did, however, raise an important point. Clearly, clause 9 could have different effects depending on how it was applied. I would certainly oppose it if I thought that it would result in "monstrosities" in people's back gardens, with 12.5MW biomass plants being described as microgeneration plants.

I am aware that in the debate on renewable energy, and wind power in particular, there are extreme views on both sides. There are those who oppose any form of wind turbine, no matter how large or small or whether it is in the country or on someone's house; and there are wind power enthusiasts who would favour allowing any wind turbine anywhere, whatever its size and wherever it was located. I do not support either of those extremes. The clause is intended to make it possible, in the right circumstances, for microgeneration installations to be placed on people's houses without the unnecessary bureaucracy that is too often involved at present. That bureaucracy varies from authority to authority, which lessens the possibility of wider use of the technology.

The application will have to differ from community to community. What may be possible in some areas or communities will probably not be possible in conservation areas, or areas with particular historical significance. That is why I think that the review proposed in clause 9 is essential. We cannot possibly specify every single way in which the powers will apply in every single type of community. I therefore think that the permitted development order procedure is appropriate. I trust that the Minister will tell us how he will consult, how he expects the clause to be implemented, and what principles he will apply to its implementation.

I hope that the hon. Member for Christchurch will be satisfied with whatever the Minister says in his response. He is right to ask questions, and if he is not satisfied with the answers he will be able to vote in due course. I repeat, however, that if we are serious about allowing microgeneration to be used more widely so that people can take advantage of its benefits, we must not allow too many bureaucratic obstacles to interfere with that. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead), who tabled the original amendment in Committee, may speak from his own experience. However, given that the clause merely suggests that a review should be conducted and laid before the House, and does not allow development orders to be made independently, I hope that Members will reject the amendment if the hon. Member for Christchurch presses it to a vote.

Gregory Barker: Although my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) spoke at great length, he expressed sensible and justifiable concerns that might well be shared by anyone who approached clause 9 in a sceptical frame of mind. I have no doubt, however, that his worries are unconnected with the intention behind the clause. I welcome what I believe to be its true purpose, which—as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) said—is to permit the installation of domestic appliances, probably the size of a television aerial or satellite dish, which are unobtrusive in any normal sense of the word.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend has used the word "probably". Is that not part of the problem? Is it not better to establish clarity than to leave any doubt whatever? As my hon. Friend will know, we have sometimes passed legislation whose intention has been twisted out of all recognition in practice.

Gregory Barker: That is a good point, but this is not enabling legislation. The clause simply asks the Minister to produce a review, which would have to be laid before the House. That would be the proper time to engage fully in the debate on which we are embarking now, and to apply the necessary scrutiny and ask the questions that are being asked today. Once the review had been presented to Parliament, a statutory instrument would be required, which would have to be debated and, if necessary, voted on in the usual way. At that point I am sure that the sensible suggestions in the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) about the parties whom the Secretary of State should consult and the concerns that he should take into account in his review—such as safeguarding conservation areas, protecting visual amenity, reducing noise and avoiding risks to health and safety—will be properly debated. All we doing now is beginning the process, not reaching a conclusion, prescribing behaviour or forestalling in any way the sensible, rational debate that must follow. We believe that if microgeneration is to enter the mass market and become accessible to the domestic householder, a way must be found of making it just as easy to erect small domestic appliances as it is to erect a satellite dish or television aerial. Therefore, I do not believe that those of us who strongly support the Bill would be well served by the rejection of the clause.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind comments about some of the points that I made. However, can he spell out how the Bill would be made worse if the clause were omitted completely?

Gregory Barker: It would be worse because there would then be no compulsion on the Secretary of State to review the permitted development status, and it is important that that status is reviewed, for the reasons that I have set out. We need to streamline the process by which microgeneration technologies can be taken up and used by the domestic user. It is absurd that things the size of a television aerial are subject to the current planning laws. It is not the intention of anyone that a 50kW wind turbine be erected in the garden of a bungalow in Bexhill. As we are at the very beginning of the process, we cannot expect the Bill to prescribe every single outcome of the Minister's review. I accept that it is broadly drafted, but I hope that the Minister may be able to reassure us that the review will be conducted under sensible terms of reference and with a clear purpose in mind—to enable the fast-tracking of small domestic apparatus, not the nightmare scenarios that my hon. Friend has suggested.

Opposition Front Benchers do not oppose the clause, and we wholeheartedly support the Bill, but we are mindful of the considerations that have been raised.

Malcolm Wicks: I thought that it would be useful if I intervened at this stage. Amendment No. 32 would remove clause 9—an important clause that was added in Committee on 9 February. Clause 9 requires a review of permitted development rights. That will allow the Secretary of State to form a view about the need for any further rights to facilitate the installation of microgeneration equipment on houses.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): I wish to correct what the Minister has just said. Clause 9 would not "allow" such a review, because such a review could happen now, under existing powers in the planning legislation. Instead, clause 9 would require such a review, and that is the important advantage of it. But it does not change what could be done now.

Malcolm Wicks: Let me continue by saying that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has been conducting a review of householder development consents. The review was set up to address the problem that the planning legislation governing minor consents is unnecessarily complex, possibly too constricting and may be interpreted in different ways by local planning authorities across the country. The ODPM proposes to look at ways of simplifying the relevant sections of the secondary legislation, known as the general permitted development order, to make it easier for households to install microgeneration technology without the need for a planning application.

12 noon

The Government continue to support clause 9, as we want to make it easier for householders to install microgeneration equipment. That is its purpose. There is clearly some confusion, but this clause is about facilitating small-scale microgeneration, a kilowatt or two. We are not talking about a provision that would allow one of those 50kW jobs to be installed in a suburban back garden. We thought that was obvious, but I am happy to suggest that my colleague, the Minister for Housing and Planning, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), will write to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) setting out clearly the terms of the review so that there are no misconceptions.

Mr. Hollobone: Does the Minister not understand that there is concern because of the definition of the capacity of microgeneration? If the Minister had come to the House today and said that this provision relates to microgeneration up to 1kW or 5kW, we might not be having a debate of this length. However, because we are placing a capacity of up to 50kW in the Bill, under PDOs that could, despite the Minister's good intentions, lead to the establishment of wind turbines that local residents might find unacceptable.

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps foolishly, I was applying a common-sense test to this. No one can anticipate that, following the Deputy Prime Minister's review, such things would be allowed. If my judgment on common sense lets me down, I apologise to the House. We have to bring some sense of scale to this. It may be helpful if my colleague the Minister writes to the hon. Member for Christchurch on this point so that there can be no misconceptions.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister recognise that there are more and less controversial microgeneration plans? Small solar panels on roofs would be acceptable to the vast majority of people in this country, yet certain wind turbines, even of a small scale, might be controversial, particularly to neighbours. Does the Minister recognise that there are two aspects of microgeneration?

Malcolm Wicks: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. As colleagues are finding, progress and modernisation can be controversial, and there can be resistance. That is true for microgeneration, if the hon. Gentleman understands my meaning. These things are controversial, but the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will do a review to facilitate sensible-scale microgeneration. That is all we are saying. It is a red herring to think that we are talking about 50kW plants.

Mark Lazarowicz: An earlier intervention from the Opposition Back Benches suggested that the review might be carried out without any form of consultation. Is the Minister prepared to give an assurance that there will be consultation in any review, as one would expect to be normal practice?

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend encourages me to finish my speech. I have made the point that my colleague will write to the hon. Gentleman so that we can clarify these matters.

Amendment No. 13 specifies things to which the Secretary of State should have regard when carrying out his review of permitted development orders. It goes without saying that the Secretary of State would conduct a thorough review, so a prescriptive list, such as this, is unnecessary. The listing of various bodies as consultees in amendment No. 70 is also unnecessary. When there is a consultation exercise on a planning matter, the ODPM invites comments from a great many organisations, including those that represent local authorities, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Campaign to Protect Rural England and other organisations with an interest in planning. That will already happen, so the amendment is unnecessary.

I want to clarify a point that was raised about permitted development orders. Should the ODPM decide, following the review, that a new permitted development order is required in relation to microgeneration, the order will be tabled in the House. It will be subject to the negative resolution procedure, but the House will nevertheless have the opportunity to comment. That is in addition to the full consultation that will take place as part of the review.

[Malcolm Wicks]

In summary, amendment No. 71 is consequential on the incorporation of amendment No. 70. I oppose the inclusion of amendments Nos. 32, 13, 70 and 71.

Chris Huhne: I am certainly reassured by the Minister's answers, especially on the point about consultation. Members who raised that issue may have been unaware of the Cabinet Office code of practice on consultation, in which criterion 3 states clearly:

"Efforts should be made to bring the consultation to the attention of all interested parties."

I have no doubt that the Government will attempt to do that.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Chris Huhne: No, because I know that the right hon. Gentleman has a great interest in absorbing large amounts of time.

The key point is that no new powers for the Government are introduced by the clause. If the Government were minded to allow the building of monstrous wind turbines, biomass fuel plants or anything else under PDOs, they could do so already. The concerns expressed from the Conservative Back Benches seem completely unfounded. The clause introduces a requirement for a review of PDOs, which will then be brought to the House in the normal way—with a statutory instrument, which, as the Minister says, requires a negative resolution. That seems appropriate and is one of the reasons why we shall support the clause and the Bill.

Dr. Whitehead: The purpose of the clause, as the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) has already suggested, is to examine whether it is possible to ensure that small-scale microgeneration equipment of various kinds can be installed by householders without their necessarily having to go through the full bureaucracy of the planning process.

At present, authorities take a different view about the planning process for particular items of microgeneration; for example, in some local authority areas one may put solar tiles on one's roof without planning permission, while in others planning permission would be required, due to concerns arising from section 60 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990.

Similarly, if one erects a small wind turbine—we have heard about various people who are trying to do that, one of whom is me—some local authorities will say that all applications for miniature wind turbines on houses are subject to planning permission, but other authorities will not require planning permission, within particular constraints. The clause provides that if a review finds that a permitted development order is possible, after discussion in the House, the PDO will remove the requirement for the full planning process for a number of defined microgeneration devices.

We have heard the idea expressed—I am sure by inadvertence or misunderstanding—that a 50kW wind turbine might be installed on a roof in Bromley, which would be a monstrosity and insupportable—

Mark Lazarowicz: In every sense of the word.

Dr. Whitehead: Indeed, and might lead to other consequences.

The provision suggests that the PDO mechanism does not actually work at present because, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, the general permitted development order and section 60 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 limit the scope of development orders in terms of the extent to which they may be mediated by "the approval of the local planning authority with respect to the design or external appearance of the buildings".

The general permitted development order makes a number of points about the circumstances under which that may happen.

For example, in local authorities generally, if a householder adds less than 15 per cent. to the curtilage of their property, that is not regarded as requiring planning permission. I am sure that the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is well aware of that from discussions that he has had in his constituency. In addition, there is a range of other considerations that cause certain things that are not fundamental to the extension, or the change of the appearance of the property, to remain outside the planning regulations. If one thinks about it for a moment, that is a good thing because otherwise no one could do anything without being snowed under by the requirement to have planning permission, and local authorities could not operate because every time that someone put a porch on their house, or some such, they would have to apply for planning permission.

Mr. Chope: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, increasingly, local authorities will impose a condition on a planning consent which means that the applicant is not allowed in the future to rely on the provisions of the general development order?

Dr. Whitehead: Yes indeed, and that underlines my point that there is a boundary on permitted development orders that local authorities can apply, and also, through the general permitted development order, a boundary on the extent to which permitted development orders apply in any event. If one applies that logic, a biomass plant might extend the curtilage of a particular properly by more than 15 per cent., which would be outside the terms of the general permitted development order. Similarly, if a wind turbine went well above the roofline or beyond the building line, that would also be beyond the terms of the general permitted development order, so there are boundaries anyway.

The difference that is suggested is very modest indeed. It would simply clarify the terms under which microgeneration devices—which were not in existence when permitted development orders were first thought about in the Town and Country Planning Act 1990—might be attached by householders to their households, in the same way as, under other circumstances, they might introduce a roof extension or a porch to their house. The suggestion in clause 9 is that if a review agrees that that is a good idea, householders who wanted to put solar panels on the roof who, in other times and places, might have considered that it was necessary to apply for planning permission, would not after that general permitted development order was put in place have to do so in any local authority in the country, subject to all the conditions and the constraints that I have mentioned.

The result for microgeneration would be that there would be clarity throughout the country in terms of what one could or could not do. A person who was installing a modest device would not have to go through the red tape. Cost is also involved. The price of a small wind turbine, such as the Leader of the Opposition is considering for his house, comes to about £1,500. As things stand, the Leader of the Opposition would have to spend perhaps £300 or £400 of that £1,500 on seeking planning permission, with all that that entails, to get that device on to his house.

Our suggestion is both modest and economical. It takes out of the realm of red tape those modest devices within the overall constraint of permitted development orders that could aid microgeneration and thereby help householders to generate the power that they consume in their households without recourse to the national grid.

Mark Lazarowicz: Perhaps my hon. Friend would also confirm that special requirements under the procedure for permitted development orders, which apply, for example, to conservation areas and listed buildings, would in no way be set aside by the proposal.

Dr. Whitehead: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The same applies when we consider the safety of such devices. The hon. Member for Christchurch painted a picture of almost Frankenstein proportions of large swathes of white electricity fizzing across the landscape as people put power into the national grid. The truth is that if one had a solar panel on one's roof that produced electricity when it was not being used in the house, a two-way meter could place current completely safely—without danger to small children, pets, or anyone else—into the national grid. The same would be true for other forms of microgeneration.

12.15 pm

I regret that several wild misapprehensions have been raised today, perhaps because of a lack of clarity or understanding about the proposals in clause 9. However, with the benefit of any reasonable consideration of how permitted development orders work, how a review might be undertaken and the extent of what is proposed, no reasonable Member in the Chamber could oppose clause 9.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman has made a useful contribution to the debate and our understanding. To summarise, he has made a strong case that if the review is conducted sensibly and sensitively, it could result in a welcome anti-regulatory measure.

Dr. Whitehead: We could indeed have an anti-regulatory measure whereby the red tape behind something that could be of great benefit to many people and the country as a whole could be removed without in any way undermining people's rights to enjoy their houses in the normal way, subject to any concerns that they may raise with local authorities about how their amenities might be reduced. It is useful to see such a measure in the light of being anti-regulatory when considering the development of microgeneration.

Mr. Forth: I am sure that we are all grateful that it has been acknowledged that these debates have real use. Some of our parliamentary colleagues have finally accepted that these occasions have value, and I am glad that they are participating in them—that is at least a small step forward. However, despite the clarification that we have been given, I am not sure that we have all the reassurance that we might need.

The problem is that the environmental fanatics have a mysterious hold over the body politic and assume that whenever they produce a Bill, it cannot possibly be debated, questioned or in any way delayed in what they think should be its seamless passage through the parliamentary process. That is unfortunate, but at least some of us have not been taken in by all that yet and, indeed, believe that it is our duty to ask questions, even about something as allegedly worthy as the Bill. I hope that the process that we have undergone hitherto has demonstrated that. Our debates have elicited useful information.

Finally, the promoter of the Bill and the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) have done the House a real service by setting out several arguments about the Bill that were long overdue. Fortunately, the assumption that the Bill was so worthy that it hardly needed explanation, which several hon. Members tried to make, is behind us and we are getting proper debate and explanation, which is a real step forward.

Of course, both my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) and the Minister intended their comments to be helpful. My hon. Friend said with great bravura and confidence that we need not worry because the wind turbines would be the size of a television aerial. If my hon. Friend was the Minister and able to give such an undertaking, I am sure that we would all be reassured. If I could press him further to guarantee that that would be written into the Bill or the guidelines, the reassurance would be great indeed. However, I am not sure whether the Minister would be prepared to go quite as far as my hon. Friend. A range of possibilities has been put before us. On the one hand, we have my hon. Friend's television aerial, and on the other, we have the wording of the amendment that we agreed this morning which refers to capacity of up to 50kW. Perhaps the reality lies somewhere between the two extremes.

Mark Lazarowicz: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that earlier this week, in a Statutory Instrument Committee that he was chairing, I expressed some surprise at the speedy discussion of the matter before the

[Mark Lazarowicz]

Committee. Does he not agree that this is precisely such a matter of detail which could, if there was a review, be discussed in a Statutory Instrument Committee, and that he might be able to pursue his points in more detail at that time? That would be a very helpful way forward.

Mr. Forth: It would not be as helpful as the hon. Gentleman might think. I can tell him that if I had been a member of the Committee, rather than its Chair, the proceedings would not have gone nearly so speedily. The business would have been properly scrutinised instead of being nodded through. This is something of a red herring because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, statutory instruments are not amendable, and it is simply not good enough for the Minister—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the right hon. Gentleman addressing his remarks to the amendment to which he is presumably speaking?

Mr. Forth: I shall get around to it, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I should prefer it if the right hon. Gentleman addressed his remarks accordingly.

Mr. Forth: I was doing the Bill's promoter the honour of answering his question, Madam Deputy Speaker, but if you do not want me to do so, that is his loss.

I was saying that we are now presented with a wide spectrum of possibilities. I am now picking up the points made in this debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle, and I am about to pick up a point made by the Minister—I thought that that was what debates for. The Minister said that we have had a review of this important area of planning and development and referred to a kilowatt or two. He was trying to reassure the House, and that is very welcome, but I am not sure that his words here will be sufficient reassurance for people out there who might be worried about the potential intrusion of these microgeneration devices. It may not be enough simply for the Minister to say, "Don't worry folks. Although my amendment refers to 50kW, it won't really be anything like that; it will be a kilowatt or two."

Dr. Whitehead: What I attempted to explain, perhaps not as well as I might have done, was that it would not be acceptable to place a huge wind turbine of 50kW on someone's roof because the roof would not support it; it would not be within the permitted development order outline; and it would go above the roof line and outside the building line. A kilowatt or two would be about the limit for the size of a wind turbine to be placed on a person's house. With respect, the right hon. Gentleman's comments are a red herring.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his explanation, but are we not talking about the possibility of installations within the curtilage as well as on the building? I should think that we are then talking about a potential for much larger installations.

David Howarth: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House how clause 9 changes anything in planning law so that any of his remarks on the matter are relevant?

Mr. Forth: I am sure that if they were not relevant, Madam Deputy Speaker would see to that. She does not need the hon. Gentleman's assistance. We are discussing the potential in clause 9 for the whole regime to be altered in a way that we cannot predict.

David Howarth: But the point is that nothing in clause 9 changes planning law at all. There is no such potential.

Mr. Forth: I thought from what was said by the promoter and the hon. Member for Southampton, Test that that was the whole point—they want to see changes made that would remove what they see as the bureaucratic restrictions of existing planning provisions. I believe that the powers available to Ministers in clause 9 could go a lot further than is being suggested.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend think that the point being made by the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who is a distinguished lawyer, is that this whole clause is effectively a waste of time because there is nothing to stop the Minister now from consulting on a list of permitted development order changes? He does not need this Bill to do that. Why has he not done it in the past two years?

Mr. Forth: We have a difficult choice to make. Either everything is hunky-dory and we do not need the provision, or it is so ineffectual that we do not need to bother with it—or anything in between; take your pick.

David Howarth: The point of clause 9 is to place an obligation on the Minister to carry out a review that he already has a power, but no obligation, to carry out.

Mr. Forth: In that case, we need not have the clause at all. The Minister could give us an undertaking and we could all go home quickly.

Another of the criticisms that have been levelled at the Bill from the start is that it is in that dangerous area of gesture legislation or motherhood legislation. It is about making people feel good, especially some of the single-interest groups, which seem to influence so many Members of Parliament these days. Legislation should not be for such purposes: it should be for specific and clearly beneficial purposes. It should not be about making a gesture or making people happy, or pleasing this or that group. I am now being told that all the clause does is say to the Minister, "Do a review, old boy," but if the Minister were to say simply, "I'll do a review, don't worry," we could dispose of the matter very quickly.

The Minister said, "Don't worry, folks, wind turbines in domestic circumstances will be for a kilowatt or two." If I thought that the Minister would table an amendment—say, when the Bill goes to the Lords, as I am sure it will—that would be enormously helpful, but at present we are stuck with only one figure to work with—the famous 50kW in amendment No. 52. Apart from what the Minister said, that is the only guidance that we have had so far.

The Minister went on to talk about "sensible-scale microgeneration", but what is sensible is very much in the eye of the beholder. It is like our good old friend "reasonable". It sounds reassuring, but in the terms of what I believe we are discussing today—potential intrusion into people's lives, albeit for the best of motives—sensible is not good enough.

The dilemma that we face goes to the heart of the Bill. That is why I am so grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) for setting it out, and to the hon. Member for Southampton, Test for taking the trouble and deploying his expertise to spell out how he envisages the mechanisms working. However, as my hon. Friends indicated in their interventions, we are entitled to exhibit at least some unease about the process that the Bill invites to take place.

I hope that when we come to Third Reading, we shall have an opportunity to range much more widely over the concept of climate change, the United Kingdom's role in that, and the role of microgeneration within that, so that we can set the Bill in context. That is certainly for Third Reading, not for Report. In that part of the Bill, there is a tension or perhaps a conflict between, on the one hand, the environmentalists' desire to reap the alleged benefits of microgeneration and, on the other, constraints on planning, capacity and so on. If we do not get it right there is a danger that there will be a backlash such as the one against telecommunications masts which, although in a very different way, it was thought would improve modern communications and the quality of life in general.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already made a ruling on telecommunications masts. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would concentrate on the matters before the House.

12.30 pm

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Under the Bill, we face the prospect that devices such as solar panels would be installed. Little has been said about them, because they would not be intrusive, although I accept that others may take a different view. Other devices that would be installed include wind turbines, about which a great deal has been said, as many people are worried about their visual impact, noisiness and the risk that they pose to health and safety. A more difficult problem—I acknowledge that my hon. Friend faced a challenge in trying to use description when illustration would serve much better—arises when we try to envisage what a microgenerating plant, whether it runs on biomass, biofuel, heat and power or fuel cells, would look like or how big it would be. Again, we are taking a great deal on trust, because we have only my hon. Friend's assertion that a domestic wind turbine could have blades up to 6 ft long if it was located on the ground in a back garden rather than on a building. It would therefore be a fairly tall device, but it is difficult to imagine the size of a building or an installation that would house the domestic or, more particularly, the community microgeneration plants referred to in the Bill and the amendments.

Such things are unknown and uncertain, and we have been asked to take a great deal on trust. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) naturally says that we should not worry, as the proposals are modest and serve a terribly good cause. The Minister said that a kilowatt or two should be enough, so we should not worry. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) is a huge enthusiast for such power, but we have a duty to look at the measure from a different angle on behalf of people who are not environmental enthusiasts. They value their present quality of life and would prefer not to worry about the climate in 50 years' time. They are, however, worried about visual amenity and the effect of the devices on the value of their property—that has not been mentioned, but it is a valid consideration. All those factors should be taken into consideration.

That is the thrust of amendment No. 13. Instead of saying that we trust the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister and the parliamentary process to make sure that everything is okay in the end, I have attempted to ensure that the Bill includes a mechanism that will reassure people. Despite his mild criticism that I should have used another formulation in preference to "shall have regard to", my hon. Friend accepted that the amendment is a step in the right direction, as it refers deliberately and explicitly to the desirability of > "safeguarding conservation areas . . . protecting visual amenity . . . reducing noise; and . . . avoiding risks to health and safety."

None of the changes and mechanisms in the Bill or the amendments should compromise our highly valued conservation areas, whether they comprise buildings or amenities. Visual amenity, too, is important, not just in rural areas but in many urban areas as well. People value visual amenity, whether they are in their home or garden, or going about their daily business. My hon. Friend said the devices would not just generate daytime noise but intrusive noise at all hours, which should be taken into consideration.

My hon. Friend touched on health and safety. Labour Members made some unnecessarily derisive remarks about that, but we ought to pause and consider the implications of, for example, a wind turbine of considerable size in a back garden, or one of the more exotic generating plants located on the ground inside or outside a building. There must be a distinct safety element to such installations. We all know that existing gas central heating appliances, for example, are rightly subject to severe safety regimes.

With regard to some of the proposed new technologies, some still relatively untried and untested, I am not sure whether we can be comfortable with the thought of them being inside or in the curtilage of domestic premises and running 24 hours a day or on demand—we will come to dynamic demand technologies in the next group of amendments. I wanted an explicit reference to health and safety written into the Bill to provide some reassurance that in our rush to save the planet, we did not ignore such important detailed provisions.

Mr. Chope: Before my right hon. Friend moves on to his other amendments, will he address the concern that there could be several 1kW windmills in one site? For example, the owner of a property in the green belt, where no development is allowed, could decide to engage in the generation of electricity and put up 50 1kW windmills. That could create an enormous amount of noise, similar to the noise from the halyards at a marina.

[Mr. Chope]

Mr. Forth: Indeed. My hon. Friend makes an important point. Necessarily, this is all rather speculative. We have not had a chance—although we may get one on the next group of amendments or the one after that, or perhaps on Third Reading—to explore the intriguing idea of surplus energy generated for domestic requirements being sold back to the grid. If that could be made to work properly, if we could get the pricing relationships right and so on, there could be a temptation for people to put in much more capacity than they needed for their own family and domestic purposes to make some money.

I am all in favour of making money. I am still a capitalist. I know that that is out of fashion in this modern age, but I still believe passionately in profit, capitalism and even tax cutting. I am not criticising any possibility the Bill might give to the capitalist instinct in all of us, but the worry is that that incentive might induce people to install more potentially intrusive equipment and capacity than they might otherwise do. We have not considered that aspect and none of us is certain what the effect might be. That should give us some pause for thought.

I move on to my amendment No. 70. Here again, there is the conflict that has arisen a couple of times and always will when we are considering such Bills. The Minister tends to say, "Don't worry. Of course we'll consult all the right people. Of course we'll pay due regard to their views." To avoid all doubt and misgiving, it would be better to have in the Bill an obligation on the Secretary of State, in the context of the mechanisms in the clause and the aim of this part of the Bill, to consult any "body or bodies as appear to him to be representative of local authorities".

Local authorities play a key part in the Bill since in our sitting last Friday we agreed to insert the Minister's new clause bringing them very much into play. Having brought local authorities in, it would be a good idea if they were consulted on the important provisions in clause 9. The list that I propose is not intended to be limiting or exclusive. I put into the list the bodies that I thought were relevant to the sort of considerations that I hoped would be in play in the review and the process of looking at the relationship between microgeneration and planning. Obviously, the Royal Institute of British Architects sprang to mind as a group of people to whom it would be very useful to speak, to find out how they saw the relationship between the built environment, as I think we are now supposed to call it, and all this exciting new technology.

I think the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) was gently pulling my leg, for which I forgive him completely, when he spoke about windmills on roofs in Bromley. I can tell him that the roofs of Bromley are sturdy indeed. Whether my constituents want turbines on their roofs is a matter for them. Of course, there is also a serious point about the relationship between whatever form of microgeneration we happen to be talking about—it may be photovoltaics, solar panels, which do not have to be on roofs, as they can be mounted away from a building, wind turbines or some of the more exotic technologies—and building design and construction, on which they all have a bearing. That is why I thought it would be proper and indeed essential for architects to be brought into the matter.

Malcolm Wicks: I was at pains when I spoke earlier to say that the amendment was unnecessary, because all the bodies, including RIBA, would be consulted. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman missed that speech, but I wonder why he is labouring the point now, when I have reassured him that they will be consulted.

Mr. Forth: Of course I accept the kindness and integrity of the Minister, which are not in doubt, but Ministers come and go. Who knows? He may become the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in the next reshuffle, although the possibility of filling the post seems to recede ever more into the distance.

Malcolm Wicks: The temptation for going is quite a strong one at this moment, so I do not regard those words as a threat at this hour, I am bound to say. The serious point is a question not of Ministers coming or going, but of the established procedure whereby the bodies will be consulted. They will be consulted. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman should move on.

Mr. Forth: The Minister should not be so eager to move on all the time. Obviously I have not said this often enough, but I thought that we had finally learned the lesson that moving on is not the way we legislate in this country or in this Parliament. We legislate by careful consideration, scrutiny, debate and amendment. Those are the processes by which we try to make our legislation good and workable, rather than "moving on"—this pathetic desire that people have to rush through the legislative process because a very small and vocal number of people outside expect legislation to be introduced at their whim. We will decide the pace of legislation and what is proper, because this is Parliament scrutinising legislation, not the Minister getting his way.

Of course, I am very happy that the Minister has given his undertaking. All I am saying—it is the reason for this little debate—is that we must make a judgment as to whether we are prepared to accept his undertaking, which he gave in a kind way, or whether it is better for us to seek to include in the Bill provision to reassure not only us but people outside. It is those very people, our constituents, who may be uneasy about the process set out in the Bill. I am in the business of trying to give them a degree of reassurance. If the Minister does not want to give his constituents any reassurance, that is up to him, but I may see things differently.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the issues that the Minister has not addressed is the stage at which the consultation will take place? My right hon. Friend's amendment deals with consultation that will occur at the beginning of the process, but the Minister may have it in mind that consultation will take place much further down the track, just before the legislation comes to the House, which would be far from satisfactory.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. We know of many occasions on which so-called consultation has been carried out in such a peremptory way, or so late on, that it has had little or no impact. When I was drafting the amendment, I had in mind whether the consultation process was of any value at all. I am giving the Minister the benefit of the doubt in this case, because it may well give some added value to the legislative process and to the Bill.

12.45 pm

I mentioned the Campaign to Protect Rural England because many of the mechanisms, techniques and installations that we are discussing could have an enormous effect on our more beautiful rural areas. They will have different effects in urban areas, of course—that is a different consideration—but I thought that it was worth mentioning the rural environment.

The benefit of this part of our deliberations is that we have highlighted the difficulties that could arise if we fail to get absolutely right the balance between the desire of the promoter of the Bill, the Government and my Front-Bench colleagues to introduce microgeneration much more widely and the negative effect that it could have. I think that we have made some progress. We have teased out the issue and got it on the record and into the public domain. Ever with a mind to the legislative process in another place, I hope that we have given Members there something to think about as well.

I hope that the Minister will give us a definitive response as to how he sees the review developing and how he envisages the emergence of the constraints on such installations that we might expect. We can then go back to our constituents and say that we have obtained from him as much reassurance as is reasonable.

Mr. Chope: We have had an excellent debate in which almost a record number of right hon. and hon. Members have taken part. I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you were not in the Chair to hear the beginning of the debate, because you may find it more difficult to follow the stage that we have reached. We have made a lot of progress since the outset. The Minister started off with the view that there was no need to worry about something that was just a lot of hot air being blown from this side of the Chamber, but he, as well as the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Members for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) and for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) have all joined in and said, in effect, that it is a genuine issue and therefore an important debate.

An interesting backdrop to the debate is that if we had had before us the report that the Minister was going to produce before the end of this month giving his strategy for the promotion of microgeneration, we would have been able to see to what extent the difficulty of getting planning permission, or the need to get it, is a constraint upon the development of microgeneration and one that he would wish to overcome. It is disappointing that we have been unable to see that, because we do not know what the Minister's strategy is or what he has in mind.

We do know, however, that under existing planning law the Minister could bring forward proposals to change the general development order and increase the categories of permitted development without the need for this clause. Indeed, he could have taken that course any time in the past 18 months or two years. Why has not he done so? If, as has been suggested, it is such a burning issue, why have the Government not presented proposals to change the existing general development order and what is permitted under it?

The Minister has not allayed my concern that the clause is highly prescriptive. If he is happy to provide for consultation, he does not need the clause. When my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle is the Minister responsible—I hope that that will happen sooner rather than later—I am sure he will not be so slow in making the relevant amendments to the general development order. He will not need the Bill to do that.

There is agreement between Front-Bench Members of all three parties that microgeneration is a good thing and that it should be facilitated. If that can be done through relaxing the provisions of the general development order and allowing permitted development, there is nothing to prevent it from happening now. Indeed, the Minister could get on with it this weekend. He could put a note in his Red Box for Monday morning—so that his private secretary would see it—saying, "Get on with this." Perhaps he would have to consult the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs or even the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. However, I am sure that he could present such proposals.

The mandatory nature of the current formulation and the way in which the clause appears to exclude proper debate and consultation worry me. I shall not repeat my detailed argument that the way in which the subsections are linked results in an unnecessarily oppressive measure.

We have heard much about the amount of electricity generation that could be facilitated without the need for planning permission under the permitted development order. The Minister has assured us that he does not intend to go beyond what he and other contributors to the debate call "small-scale microgeneration". That is a good expression, but it does not appear in the Bill. If it had been incorporated, I am sure the measure would have received less detailed scrutiny because there would not have been so much concern about its intentions. People are worried about what the Bill describes as microgeneration but is, in common parlance, large-scale microgeneration, and its being carried out without planning permission.

I have considered whether we should accept the Minister's good intentions and not press the matter to a vote. I have also taken into account the assurances of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) that he has only television aerials and satellite dishes in mind. If that is all he has in mind, it can be done at the moment, pretty uncontroversially, through the Minister's current powers. The hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) made the point that the Minister already has the power and that the clause simply makes it use mandatory. Why do we need to make it mandatory when the Minister is such an enthusiast? What is holding him back? Surely he is being encouraged. [Interruption.] Unfortunately, I cannot respond to hand gestures. If anyone wishes to intervene, they are free to do so.

[Mr. Chope]

On a serious note, if we are just talking about television aerials or satellite dishes then fine, but we need to be alert to the possibility that someone might want the equivalent of 50 satellite dishes or TV aerials because they want to have 50 1kW generators.

Mark Lazarowicz indicated dissent.

Mr. Chope: But what is to stop someone bulk buying 50 generators, and then putting up 50 windmills? I accept that they may be no larger than a TV aerial, but I do not know of anyone who has more than one television aerial or, for that matter, more than one satellite dish. The hon. Member for Eastleigh is looking at me in a certain way; perhaps he is the exception to my proposition.

Dr. Whitehead: It is subject to current planning law.

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman comes at me with these short statements. He thinks that permitted development rights allow for one television aerial or one satellite dish without the need to get planning permission. That is fine, but unfortunately he has said nothing to suggest that the power would be used to prohibit the erection of more than one 1kW windmill generator on one particular set of premises. I am glad that I gave way to him because I recall our days in Southampton when we closely debated political issues, and it is good to renew that acquaintance across the Chamber, but he has not satisfied my concerns.

I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point about bureaucracy and bureaucratic obstacles. I also understand how unsatisfactory some people, in particular the enthusiasts for microgeneration, might find a situation in which some local authorities allow people to put solar panels on their houses or to erect windmills without the need for planning permission, but others do not. Surely, however, it is a virtue of the nature of our society that we believe in localism, which necessarily involves individuality and diversity. He seems to want to promote uniformity and stereotyping. That cannot be a good thing. The idea of putting up lots of new windmills or photovoltaic equipment may be thought of as a good thing in some parts of the country, but why should an elected local authority not be able to decide the policy for itself?

If we remove the clause, it will not prevent the use of permitted development orders to relax the planning regime for some parts of the microgeneration industry. It will not do that at all, and any suggestion that the clause is a vital part of the Bill is misconceived. However, the Minister has, I think, accepted that as drafted, clause 9 is open to misinterpretation. He says that it does not reflect his intention, but we are dealingwith legislation that has to be precise in its content. I hope that he will support me in the Division Lobby when I put the amendment to a vote. Removing the clause from the Bill will enable the Government to table a much better drafted version in the other place to make his intentions clearer and to put safeguards on the face of the Bill. I would welcome those, but at the moment they are articulated only in terms of expressions of intention by the Minister and the promoter, rather than being guarantees, which they would be if they appeared in the Bill.

1 pm

The debate has been constructive. The size of microgeneration plants causes a lot of concern. The Government have given us assurances about that. If we vote to remove the clause, they will be able to present clearer, fresh proposals that are more in tune with their real intentions.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 2, Noes 72.

Division No. 197] [1 pm

AYES

| | |
|---|---|
| Evans, Mr. Nigel | Tellers for the Ayes: |
| Hollobone, Mr. Philip | Mr. Eric Forth and |
| | Mr. Christopher Chope |

NOES

| | |
|---|---|
| Balls, Ed | Kaufman, rh Sir Gerald |
| Barker, Gregory | Keetch, Mr. Paul |
| Blunt, Mr. Crispin | Khan, Mr. Sadiq |
| Bottomley, Peter | Kramer, Susan |
| Brown, rh Mr. Nicholas | Ladyman, Dr. Stephen |
| Byers, rh Mr. Stephen | Lammy, Mr. David |
| Cable, Dr. Vincent | Lazarowicz, Mark |
| Carmichael, Mr. Alistair | Letwin, rh Mr. Oliver |
| Cash, Mr. William | Levitt, Tom |
| Challen, Colin | Linton, Martin |
| Clark, Ms Katy | MacDougall, Mr. John |
| Coffey, Ann | MacNeil, Mr. Angus |
| Corbyn, Jeremy | Marris, Rob |
| Cousins, Jim | McIsaac, Shona |
| Davey, Mr. Edward | McNulty, Mr. Tony |
| Dismore, Mr. Andrew | Merron, Gillian |
| Dowd, Jim | Norris, Dan |
| Duddridge, James | Ottaway, Richard |
| Foster, Mr. Don | Pound, Stephen |
| Galloway, Mr. George | Randall, Mr. John |
| Gapes, Mike | Reid, Mr. Alan |
| Gerrard, Mr. Neil | Rowen, Paul |
| Gummer, rh Mr. John | Skinner, Mr. Dennis |
| Hammond, Stephen | Slaughter, Mr. Andrew |
| Harman, rh Ms Harriet | Thornberry, Emily |
| Harris, Dr. Evan | Turner, Dr. Desmond |
| Hendrick, Mr. Mark | Vara, Mr. Shailesh |
| Hill, rh Keith | Watkinson, Angela |
| Hillier, Meg | Weir, Mr. Mike |
| Hoey, Kate | Whitehead, Dr. Alan |
| Horam, Mr. John | Wicks, Malcolm |
| Horwood, Martin | Widdecombe, rh Miss Ann |
| Howarth, David | Winterton, Ms Rosie |
| Huhne, Chris | Younger-Ross, Richard |
| Hurd, Mr. Nick | |
| Jackson, Glenda | Tellers for the Noes: |
| Jenkin, Mr. Bernard | Mr. Tom Watson and |
| Jones, Lynne | Claire Ward |

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 12

PROMOTION OF REDUCTIONS IN CARBON EMISSIONS: GAS TRANSPORTERS AND SUPPLIERS

Amendments made: No. 41, in page 7, line 39, after 'of' insert 'any of the following'.

No. 33, in page 8, line 13, at end insert—

'( ) After subsection (10) insert—

"(10A) An order under this section shall not include provision made by virtue of subsection (2)(b) which would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament if it were contained in an Act of that Parliament."'.

No. 42, in page 8, leave out lines 15 to 17 and insert—

'"(13) In this section—

"microgeneration" has the same meaning as in the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006;

"plant" includes any equipment, apparatus or appliance.'.

No. 43, in page 8, line 21, leave out

'subsection (7) of section 82 of the Energy Act 2004'

and insert

'section 23(2) of the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Clause 13

PROMOTION OF REDUCTIONS IN CARBON EMISSIONS: ELECTRICITY DISTRIBUTORS AND SUPPLIERS

Amendments made: No. 44, in page 8, line 34, after 'of' insert 'any of the following'.

No. 34, in page 8, line 47, at end insert—

'( ) After subsection (10) insert—

"(10A) An order under this section shall not include provision made by virtue of subsection (2)(b) which would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament if it were contained in an Act of that Parliament."'.

No. 45, in page 9, leave out lines 2 to 4 and insert—

'"(13) In this section—

"microgeneration" has the same meaning as in the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006;

"plant" includes any equipment, apparatus or appliance.'.

No. 46, in page 9, line 8, leave out

'subsection (7) of section 82 of the Energy Act 2004'

and insert

'section 23(2) of the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Clause 15

REDUCTION OF GREENHOUSE GAS EMISSIONS: REPORT REGARDING DYNAMIC DEMAND TECHNOLOGIES

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 72, in page 9, line 27, after 'Britain', insert

', and to the costs of installation of the equipment required, together with the likely resultant pay-back period.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 73, in page 9, line 38, at end insert—

'"equipment required" means the equipment which has to be installed to generate, connect and measure the electricity produced by dynamic demand technologies;'.

No. 74, in page 9, line 42, at end insert—

'"pay-back period" means the time over which the costs of installation of equipment required for dynamic demand technologies can be recovered by the resultant reduced electricity costs.'.

Mr. Forth: We are now getting to the exciting bit of the Bill: dynamic demand technologies. This is high-tech, futuristic, blue skies material. Therefore, my comments will probably be fairly limited. It is worth pausing over this clause because it explores one of the deeper, darker recesses of microgeneration, and we should try to tease it out a bit. That is the objective of my amendments.

Let us put on the record what dynamic demand technologies are. Under clause 15(4)

'"dynamic demand technology" means any technology which enables—

(a) the consumption of electricity, at a particular time, by a device connected to a network, or,

(b) The generation of electricity, at a particular time, by an electricity microgenerating system connected to a network, to be controlled or adjusted automatically by reference to, or matters relating to, the frequency of alternating current on the network at that time".

It is now clear to everybody what we are talking about.

Under clause 15(1):

"The Secretary of State must, not later than 12 months after this section comes into force, publish a report on the contribution that is capable of being made by dynamic demand technologies to reducing emission of greenhouse gases".

Interestingly, that is slightly redolent of the reference made earlier to the Energy Act 2004, in which a similar obligation was placed on the Minister. Although he has told us that he will fulfil that obligation by the end of this month, he did not meet the deadline. Here is another deadline that will be laid on him—the Minister is looking very surprised. Refreshed by his cup of coffee, he is obviously going to tell me something.

Malcolm Wicks: I am not sure what deadline I have not met. The micropower strategy will be published by the end of this month. That meets the deadline.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who has, as they say, done the maths, reckoned that the Minister has not made the deadline, but I am not going to fall out with the Minister over this. We have conducted these proceedings in a friendly manner so far, and I hope that that will continue, so I shall not labour the point.

Mr. Chope: I certainly did not intend to suggest that the Minister had not met his deadline. If he delivers by the end of this month, he will be just inside the 18-month maximum limit.

Mr. Forth: In that case, I unreservedly apologise to the Minister. I misconstrued my hon. Friend. I unreservedly withdraw any accusation I have made about the Minister.

1.15 pm

We can be optimistic that the 12 months mentioned in clause 15 will be met by the Minister, or, if he has been promoted by then, his successor. There will be an appraisal of the contribution that this exciting new technology may be able to make to the whole area of microgeneration and its relationship—real or imagined—to climate change. I thought that my amendments might stiffen the measure a bit. Subsection (3) states:

[Mr. Forth]

> "In forming the view mentioned . . . the Secretary of State must have regard, in particular, to any matters which would prohibit or inhibit the use . . . of dynamic demand technology in any circumstance in which its use could be expected to make a contribution to reducing emissions of greenhouse gases in Great Britain."

Through amendment No. 72, I want to add

> "and to the costs of installation of the equipment required, together with the likely resultant pay-back period".

Throughout our considerations, we have rather glossed over first, the possible costs of installing the various technologies to which we have referred and secondly, who would be expected to bear them.

This may be our opportunity to clarify the assumption—at least in my mind—that it will be the user, the consumer, who will install the equipment that is referred to in the clause and throughout the Bill. If it is not to be the consumer—I think that the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) is about to help me on this question—who will bear the costs and what are the implications of that? Will the hon. Gentleman help us or will he leave me to speculate for a little while longer?

Dr. Whitehead indicated assent.

Mr. Forth: Oh good, the hon. Gentleman will let me speculate for a while. In that case, I will.

We have the possibility that the consumer will pay for all the equipment. The only other two possibilities that I can imagine—my imagination is limited, as you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I shall try my best—are the suppliers or distributors of electricity, or our old favourite the Government, which usually means the taxpayer. It has to be one of those.

First, I want to identify what the costs will be. None of these measures will be cost-free; in fact, few environmental and climate control measures are cost-free—something that we can explore in much more depth on Third Reading. There will be a cost; it could be social—there could be all sorts of costs—but there is bound to be a cost for new technology and it is important that we identify it. That is why my amendment would make that a part of the process set out in clause 15, whereby the Secretary of State will on our behalf examine the new technology and report back on it. An important part of that examination would be an identification of the costs, because the technology sounds pretty expensive to me.

We have several resident experts—the promoter of the Bill, his hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test, the Minister and, on a good day, my Front-Bench colleagues—so an embarrassment of expertise surrounds me. I hope that at some point one of them will try to identify the possible costs—[Interruption.] Ah, I have had a nod and a wink from the promoter that his hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test will be the expert on this occasion. I very much look forward to what the hon. Gentleman has to say, because my modest amendment—I freely confess that it is modest—is intended to do something important: to bring an air of reality to the measure.

Bills such as this tend to express good hopes, good wishes, motherhood, aspirations, 50-year perspectives, saving the planet and global everything, but at some stage we have to get down to the realities on the ground, in the home and in the back garden. Who will buy the equipment? Who will install it? Who will pay for its maintenance? Who will ensure that in cases such as we have been discussing matters are recorded accurately? All those things are, or should be, relevant to any consideration of taking forward such technology. It does not come free, in money terms or many other terms, including environmental and social terms. So what my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and I are trying to do throughout today's proceedings is to show that we should bring greater honesty and clarity to the process involved in the Bill, and that it is not good enough to brush these things aside and say, "Don't worry, folks; it will all be very good indeed and we are doing our bit to save the planet, so let's get on with it." I believe that we should always have an eye to what is practicable, what is achievable and what is in this case acceptable in terms of costs.

This really is a modest but important series of amendments, to try to bring that perspective to this exciting-sounding technology, which—who knows?—may, if it works, and if the Secretary of State tells us in 12 months that he thinks it can work, make this idea of microgeneration even more effective. That surely would be something that everyone here would want to happen.

Dr. Whitehead: This is another clause that originated in a Bill that, as the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) will remember well, had a Second Reading a while ago, and has now been incorporated—I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) for assisting in that process—into the Bill.

I had always believed that it was a convention of the House that those who tabled amendments had some idea of what their amendment was about.

Mr. Forth: That is a very old-fashioned idea.

Dr. Whitehead: Clearly that is just a convention, not a requirement, and on this occasion it appears that the convention has been breached.

Dynamic demand is a system whereby a machine—be it a refrigerator, a freezer or a microgenerating device—that is not necessarily to be switched on all the time can detect the difference in the current that is coming into that device. That means, and it is potentially very important, that where a current fluctuates it indicates the extent to which there is a load on the circuit in general—that is, how much current is going around the grid and how much is therefore being supplied and used or not used. Where a machine is able to make use of current intermittently and switch itself off when it does not require that current, dynamic demand technology enables that device to do just that, and that would mean that if dynamic demand technology were to be made available on a widespread basis for machines such as that, it would enable the grid to operate much more efficiently. It would no longer be necessary, for example, to bring in coal-fired power stations for one hour in every three months to cope with a peak; that peak could be smoothed out as a result of dynamic demand technology judging by an intelligent device how that current is going and therefore whether that machine should draw that current off or not, or should export that current into the grid or not.

The cost of achieving that is absolutely minimal, inasmuch as all that is needed is to place in each device a small piece of electronic equipment, costing probably a few pence, which could be supplied with the device when it was installed. To all intents and purposes, therefore, it is not a serious cost in the way that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggested. However, the benefits, as I am sure he would agree, are enormous in terms of energy use, not just in terms of the use of the grid, but in terms of the use of energy by the specific device. So the net saving in the generation of electricity in general and the use of electricity by the device that the person has installed in their house would be enormous.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his explanation. If the technology is that simple, if he knows so much about it, and if it costs only a few pence, why do we need a 12-month review by the Secretary of State to establish how wonderful it all is? Why do we not just get on with it anyway? Why do we need a rather elaborate clause to achieve all the things set out in it when he seems to know about the matter already?

Dr. Whitehead: As the right hon. Gentleman will imagine from the account I am giving, if the system is to work well, it will require the widespread installation of dynamic demand devices into various machines that could collectively make the change to the way in which electricity is used from the grid, or exported to the grid, to achieve the savings that I outlined. A report that sets out, for example, the collective changes in manufacturing protocols that might be necessary to place the devices in machines would be a good way of going about things. I would imagine that standards, arrangements and protocols on the stage at which the devices come on stream would be part of a report to investigate the potential for dynamic demand technology and the savings that could result from it. It would be prudent and appropriate—partly because of several of the points that the right hon. Gentleman makes—to have such a report to ensure that the technology is implemented in a beneficial way, rather than a haphazard way that does not work at all. It is wise to suggest that a report making conclusions that would lead to the widespread establishment of the technology is produced in such a way.

Mr. Chope: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that such a report should include the provisions that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) cites in his amendments?

Dr. Whitehead: If the report was sensible, it would difficult for it to have no regard to such issues. However, it would, at the very least, be gilding the lily to provide in the Bill that the report should be written in a particular way—I am sure that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst does not intend to gild any lilies in any way. On the basis of the fairly full, but succinct, information about the way in which dynamic demand technology will work that I have given, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that the provisions in the Bill for a report would be the best way to proceed and that it might thus be appropriate for him to withdraw the amendment.

Gregory Barker: The whole House has benefited from the short talk on dynamic demand technology by the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead)—we are all enlightened. Likewise, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) made interesting and sensible points about the terms of reference of any possible report. If there is to be wide take-up of such useful technology, a report will be not only welcome, but necessary.

The technology would enable us to manage the relatively rare peaks that necessitate large generation capacity. In layman's terms, it would enable the fridges of the country to be turned off for a few minutes during the adverts in "Coronation Street" so that the nation could make its cups of tea, and thus negate the need for a large amount of electricity generation.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend think that only new appliances will be fitted with the device costing a few pennies, or does he envisage retrofitting, which, as I am sure that he will acknowledge, could cause complications?

Gregory Barker: I daresay that it would. I am sure that the question of new fit or retrofit costs—my right hon. Friend has raised that point—pay-back periods, methods of installation and the variety of manufactured installations would come under the scope of the sensible report that the Secretary of State would be required to commission under the terms of the Bill. I do not believe, however, that it is necessary to prescribe that in the Bill; nor do I believe that it would be consistent with the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, whom I have heard, Friday after Friday, lamenting the amount of prescriptive legislation that is brought to this House and put on the statute book. Like him, I believe in a light touch in this place, so that we legislate only for the absolute necessities of life.

Where it is possible for us to be anti-regulatory, we should be. Mindful of the good Tory principle that we legislate only where absolutely necessary, I am happy, on behalf of the Conservative party, to leave the Bill to direct the Secretary of State to commission the report. Given that these points have been fully aired by my right hon. Friend, I believe that they will be embraced in the report. I am mindful that we all need to keep our comments brief to ensure the Bill's passage.

1.30 pm

Malcolm Wicks: I will not comment on good Tory principles; it is hard enough to work out who are the good Tories in this debate. [Interruption.] It takes two to have a split—that is all.

The amendment would require the Secretary of State, when taking a view on whether it was appropriate to promote dynamic demand technologies, to have regard to the installation costs of those technologies together with the resultant pay-back period. When forming a view as to whether action in a particular area is appropriate, the Secretary of State will ensure that all relevant factors are taken into account, including costs, benefits and pay-back periods. Therefore, the amendment is unnecessary. Amendments Nos. 73 and 74 are merely consequential to the incorporation of amendment No. 72. I oppose all the amendments.

Chris Huhne: We, too, oppose these amendments, essentially because it seems to us that the clause already contains provisions that encapsulate them. There is no point, as the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) said, in gilding the lily.

First, clause 15(2) says clearly that the Secretary of State should deal with what steps are appropriate. That, I hope, would include cost—perhaps I am betraying my economics background. Subsection (3) says that "the Secretary of State must have regard, in particular, to any matters which would prohibit or inhibit the use of any dynamic demand technology in any circumstance", and I should have thought that cost is clearly a factor that could prohibit or inhibit the use of such technology. Certainly, before I buy something I usually like to know the cost of it. It is unnecessary to proceed any further with the amendments, and we should reject them.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has done the House a service in using the device of tabling an amendment to ensure that we have a debate. This provision was not in the Bill when it was considered on Second Reading; it was, as new clause 21, an amendment to the Bill on 9 February.

The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) was too modest to repeat in the full Chamber the joke that he made on that occasion, but like him I am a supporter of Southampton football club and I think that it is worth repeating it. He said that dynamic demand

"is not what despairing Southampton football club fans are demanding of their team".

It is important to put that on the record.

The other thing that needs to be put on the record is that during that short Standing Committee debate the Minister said, very frankly, that although the Government are committed to these climate change reduction technologies, they "have done very little proactive work in this area to date—I do not understand why—although we have kept up to date with developments. It is clear that these technologies deserve closer investigation, to establish whether they could make a significant contribution to reducing our carbon emissions." —[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 9 February 2006; c. 97–100.]

I hope that, following those remarks, the Minister immediately went back to his Department and said, "Let's get on with this job and write the report. Don't let us wait for the Bill to get on to the statute book before we start because there is considerable potential here."

That potential is recognised in all parts of the House, and the more information we can bring to bear, the better informed the debate will be. It is agreed that any meaningful report will have to have regard to the costs and the necessary equipment.

I take the same line as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), namely, that the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst would add unnecessarily to the Bill. I only wish that my hon. Friend's desire for the light-touch approach had been evident during the debate on the previous groups of amendments, when we had the chance to remove clause 9 and make the Bill no worse by so doing. However, it is good that we should agree as much as possible, and when we do agree we should be proud to say so. I therefore say that I agree with my hon. Friend on the amendments being unnecessary. However, I say also that had my right hon. Friend not tabled them, we would not have been able to have this short but important debate on a potentially impressive area of new technology.

Mr. Forth: Hon. Members present will know that there is a well worn technique called the probing amendment, and my intention was to do a bit of gentle probing. Look at the fruits that have emerged as a result: we have had a proper debate; we have had the benefit of the expertise of the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead); and we have had an outbreak of consensus, which is not normally appealing to me. I freely acknowledge that, as a result of all the contributions made to this little debate, my amendments are indeed otiose and that I do not need to press them. However, we have illustrated the value of debate and of the amending process, even if the amendments are only probing. How much richer will be the proceedings of the House that can be studied by people outside and how much more they will learn as a result of our debate than if we had just rushed through the Bill in an unseemly manner, without examining it properly.

For all those reasons and in the cause of making a little progress, which I am now confident we can make, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 80, in page 9, leave out line 39.—[Mr. Watson.]

Clause 16

PROMOTION OF COMMUNITY ENERGY SCHEMES

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 75, in page 10, line 13, at end insert—

'(2A) In the exercise of his duty under subsection (1) the Secretary of State must consult—

(a) such body or bodies as appear to him to be representative of local authorities;

(b) such distributors and suppliers of electricity as he considers relevant; and

(c) the Health and Safety Executive.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 76, in page 10, line 25, at end insert—

'"local authorities" has the same meaning as in section [Local authorities to have regard to information on energy measures in exercising functions].'.

No. 58, in page 10, line 41, leave out '20' and insert '4'.

No. 59, in page 10, line 42, leave out '100' and insert '20'.

No. 15, in page 11, line 1, leave out Clause 17.

Government amendments Nos. 47 to 49.

Mr. Forth: It is always a pleasure to have one's modest amendments grouped with Government amendments. It reinforces the point that the value of our proceedings is that the Government have been able to table many amendments to improve the Bill as they see fit. No doubt, the Bill will benefit from that in the long run. We shall judge the Government amendments in a moment, but their presence validates the process in which we are engaged in a useful fashion. Conscious of the clock, I shall keep my remarks fairly brief on this occasion and skip lightly through my amendments and the Government's.

Clause 16 raises the slightly shadowy concept of the community energy scheme. Even though a definition is attempted, it is not at all clear to me what a community energy scheme will be, of what it will consist, what its scale might be and—harking back to our earlier debate—what the size or scope of the required equipment might be. If I am not mistaken, it was in the context of community energy schemes that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and some of my other hon. Friends, including my good friend the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), voiced some reservations about the megawattage that might be required to power a community.

My concern is to ensure that when setting about the process of promoting the schemes the Secretary of State will have to consult what I consider to be the relevant bodies—local authorities, distributors and suppliers of electricity and the Health and Safety Executive. The aim is to ensure that the schemes are seen in the proper context. Although we might go into it on Third Reading, I shall not on this occasion explore in detail precisely what a community energy scheme might mean and how it might work, because the subject gets a bit complicated when we get into issues such as qualifying premises, the fact that there must be at least five dwellings, relevant plant, and so on.

However, if the concept is to be promoted we must tease out what it means. Clause 16 refers to investment and the provision of advice and assistance. Considerable commitments would be made by the Government, communities or electricity generators and distributors, but it is not clear how the balance would be struck. Amendments Nos. 75 and 76 seek to ensure that the Secretary of State consults the relevant parties before plunging into the attractive but unclear concept of community energy.

Mr. Hollobone: In my constituency of Kettering, major planning applications for thousands of houses are about to be submitted. The local rumour is that there will be two applications, each for 5,000 houses. If those applications were determined by the local authority but did not include a community energy project, under clause 16(1) could the Secretary of State insist retrospectively on the inclusion of such a scheme, which might meet with the approval of local residents, even it were not in the local plan?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct to ask that question, which is relevant not just to his constituency but to every other constituency. However, we can only speculate about the matter until the Minister helps us, as he has frequently done, by providing clarification.

Clause 16 refers to the Secretary of State's duty

"to take such steps as he considers appropriate to promote community energy projects."

That appears to have a wide application—in fact, it is almost unlimited. Given the clause's explicit aspiration to promote such schemes and projects we can assume that the presumption is in their favour, rather than against them. Amendments Nos. 58 and 59, which were tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, rightly deal with the need to limit such projects. The clause says that generation will not exceed 20 MWe. Earlier, there was a dispute about the typical consumption of a single household, but whatever it is to the nearest kilowatt, 20 MWe represents a considerable generating capacity.

Mr. Hollobone: I paid careful attention to my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), who helpfully clarified the fact that the consumption of a typical household would require a generating capacity of 10KW. A plant with a generating capacity of 20 MWe could therefore provide enough power for 2,000 houses.

Mr. Forth: That leads me to ask whether—and I make no apologies for the circular nature of our debate—a plant that can provide power for 2,000 houses can be considered to be engaged in microgeneration. We keep bumping up against that problem, which has led to unhappiness about the Bill, despite its laudable objectives.

Mark Lazarowicz: A great deal of debate and public comment on the Bill has focused on microgeneration. Although that is an important part of the Bill, may I reiterate that the measure deals not just with microgeneration, but with the wider encouragement of renewable energy? It is therefore wrong to view the clause as a microgeneration clause. Community energy may well be promoted by microgeneration, but the purpose is not microgeneration per se.

1.45 pm

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the promoter of the Bill for that explanation. Nevertheless, I think that he would concede that we are talking about potentially quite large generating plants of a capacity that would provide power for a community, however defined. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering gave us one definition. The 20MW figure mentioned in the clause suggests potentially 2,000 households or more, depending on—

Mark Lazarowicz: Indeed. The clause could facilitate district heating schemes, but it would not change the planning regimes that apply to such schemes. The planning measures that we discussed earlier are entirely separate or microgeneration-directed. The clause has no effect on planning regulations that would allow district heating schemes to be established. All it would do is encourage them.

Mr. Forth: Once again, I am grateful. I do not know whether that reassures my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering, but it moves us forward. That is helpful.

Mr. Hollobone: The explanation does not reassure me. The difficulty that I have is that the Bill will probably reach the statute book after major planning applications for thousands of houses in Kettering are determined. Local residents might want district heating schemes, but by the time the applications are determined there will not be the provisions in legislation to encourage the local authority to provide that.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend spells out the reality of the parliamentary process. With the best will in the world, let us assume that the Bill receives its Third Reading in June, which seems the most likely outcome now. It must, quite properly, still go to the House of Lords and undergo scrutiny there. We are talking about Queen's consent to such a Bill towards the end of this year. Even if it were to be implemented immediately—many of the provisions envisage a longer perspective beyond that—we should assume that the provisions are likely to start having effect some time in 2007, or more likely in 2008. That is a good thing for those who think the Bill is a good thing, but it would be no quicker than that. I cannot give my hon. Friend any comfort. That is the likely time scale for the Bill's progress.

My amendment No. 15 would remove clause 17 from the Bill. If I have time, I might mention the Government amendments. The problem that I have with clause 17 is that, on the face of it, it threatens to place additional burdens on parish councils, which are the bodies least able to do justice to the sort of duties that would be placed upon them. I have looked up a few figures, which suggest that a typical parish council has a population of about 1,700. They vary enormously, as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know better than most of us, given your constituency.

Gregory Barker: Can my right hon. Friend specify which part of the clause imposes a duty on a parish council? It states that a parish or community council "may encourage" various schemes.

Mr. Forth: The answer to my hon. Friend is probably a moral duty.

Gregory Barker: Do we in the House legislate for moral duties?

Mr. Forth: I am sure that we do, perhaps more frequently than I would like. By the very writing of such a clause, we are inviting parish councils to give greater priority to this sort of activity than they might do to other activities. My worry is that given that parishes are, by definition, modest organisations with modest resources, as soon as we start telling them in the law of the land that we would like or expect them to do various worthy things, that takes them into dangerous territory.

Chris Huhne: Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that clause 17(3) states:

"Nothing in this section authorises a parish council or community council to provide any financial assistance", and goes on to specify the various ways in which such assistance might be provided?

Mr. Forth: Of course, but the worry is that Government amendment No. 49 seeks to leave out subsections (3) and (4), although we will not know the reasons why until the Minister gets to his feet.

I think that what is proposed is a worrying development that exemplifies a degree of over-enthusiasm by people who are keen on the Bill. Courtesy of a Government new clause that we debated last Friday, we have already amended the Bill to bring local authorities generally into the process. Although some of us were not desperately happy with that, we envisaged that county and perhaps district councils could have a role to play; mysteriously, the Greater London assembly did not appear anywhere, and we are still wondering about that lacuna. Reaching out to parish councils as the clause seeks to do is a step too far. I am not sure what added value parish councils, excellent though they are, could bring to the complexities of the subject that we have dealt with today and last Friday.

I want to elicit more information about how a parish council can come anywhere near to doing the sort of things that are spelled out in clause 17, which refers to the encouragement and promotion of microgeneration of items such as efficiency in fuel use and reduction in energy use, as well as "production in their area . . . of biomass, or . . . any fuel derived from biomass".

I must admit that that is not quite what I thought parish councils were supposed to be all about. I would be very surprised if they were prepared to give priority to the activities set out in clause 17 over and above what we would normally expect them to do.

Matters become even more mysterious when we look at the amendments standing in the Minister's name. I struggled to understand his desire to insert the words

"whether offered or provided by public authorities or by any other persons".

That is an intriguing phrase. I do not know what he envisages in referring to "any other persons", but perhaps he will tell us in due course. Furthermore, Government amendment No. 48 states:

"Assistance provided under subsection (1) may, if the council giving the assistance think appropriate . . . be made subject to conditions, or . . . otherwise be provided on such terms as the council think appropriate."

Again, I am not sure what is envisaged, as the amendment could mean a lot or not very much at all. I look forward to hearing the Minister explain just what his amendments would mean on the ground, day to day, to a typical parish council, with the limited resources that parish councils necessarily have.

The most intriguing of the Minister's amendments is the one that I mentioned in reply to the intervention made by the hon. Gentleman—Government amendment No. 49, which seeks to remove the one reassurance that features in the whole clause. What are we to think of that? Subsection (3) states:

"Nothing in this section authorises a parish council or community council to provide any financial assistance by—

(a) making a grant or loan,

(b) giving a guarantee or indemnity, or

(c) investing by acquiring share or loan capital."

Initially, I thought, "Thank goodness for all that; it seems to make sense", as did the further provision in subsection (4), but now the Minister seeks to remove all that provision. The implications are intriguing. I assume that he is now content with the thought that a parish council could set out to make grants or loans, give guarantees or indemnities or invest by acquiring share or loan capital. That moves us into really bizarre territory.

Martin Horwood: The right hon. Gentleman is taking up a great deal of our time speculating on what the Minister might think or believe. Perhaps if he drew his remarks to a close, he might find out the answer.

Mr. Forth: No doubt the hon. Gentleman thinks that he is being very clever and helping the process, but he has not been here long enough to know that it does not quite work that way. Thanks to the excellent selection and grouping of amendments, my little amendment is the lead amendment in this group, so I get to speak first. If the hon. Gentleman would contain himself, we might just find that the Bill will make a little more progress than he may have anticipated, but being patronising and impertinent will not help his cause.

My amendment would remove clause 17 in its entirety, because it is wrong to direct the no doubt laudable aims of the Bill at the level of parish councils, which have much more relevant things to do with their very limited resources. We need to hear a lot more from the Minister about what his amendments mean and, in particular, why he wants to remove the reassuring element in subsection (3). I look forward to that.

Malcolm Wicks: I am sorry, but I am losing my voice; I trust that it is contagious.

Amendment No. 75 lists a number of bodies that the Secretary of State would have to consult when exercising his duty to promote community energy schemes. As part of the normal course of exercising any duty, the Secretary of State would consult relevant bodies. In the case of the promotion of community energy, such bodies would include local authorities, the energy industry and the Health and Safety Executive. I do not see the need to have a specific list in the Bill. Amendment No. 76 would be consequential on the incorporation of amendment No. 75 in the Bill.

Amendments Nos. 58 and 59 relate to the capacity limits that form part of the definition of a community energy project. I accept that limits of 20MW for electricity and 100MW for thermal energy may appear relatively large, but this is just one aspect of the definition. The key parts of the definition are those that ensure the schemes are for community purposes. The capacity limits were deliberately set high to ensure that the definition encompasses future community schemes that may be larger than existing schemes. I am content with the definition as it stands.

Amendment No. 15 and Government amendments Nos. 47 to 49 refer to clause 17. I tabled that clause in Committee in response to a similar clause drafted by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker). All levels of local government have a role to play in tackling climate change and alleviating fuel poverty. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) shakes his head, but I beg to differ. Clause 17 enables parish and community councils to play their part in encouraging or promoting energy-saving measures in a variety of ways. The measures listed are perhaps only a starting point, since the clause allows for further energy saving initiatives to be added in the future as new techniques become available.

There are of course differences between parish councils in terms of their relative population sizes, their resources, and the services that they offer. Notwithstanding that, offering advice and assistance on local energy-saving measures sits well alongside the initiatives that the Government are promoting on neighbourhoods and the existing advisory and information-giving roles of parish councils. I remain of the opinion that the clause should be part of the Bill. Indeed, I think that there is an especial connection between parishes and microgeneration.

Government amendments Nos. 47 and 48 make it clear that a parish or community council may on application provide information about goods or services offered or provided by other persons within their area for the purposes of clause 17. The intention of the amendment is to supplement the existing power under section 142 of the Local Government Act 1972, which deals generally with the provision of information by local authorities. During the discussion on the clause in Committee, I suggested that I would return on Report to the question of whether parish or community councils could make small grants or loans to assist with measures for saving energy in their areas. I hope that hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle, who spoke so eloquently on the issue, will be pleased to see that amendment No. 49 removes the restrictions in subsections (3) and (4) on the giving of grants or loans for local energy-saving measures.

Amendment No. 49 would allow parish or community councils to give financial assistance, when appropriate, to those whom they think would benefit from it. It would be for them to determine any conditions that they may wish to attach to it .

I therefore ask hon. Members to support amendments Nos. 47, 48 and 49 but, for the reasons that I have given, to oppose amendments Nos. 75, 76, 58, 59 and 15.

2 pm

Gregory Barker: The final group contains an interesting range of amendments. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) made sensible points, as usual. I share his concerns about the need for community consultation and participation in local decision making. He is right that the Secretary of State should pay due regard to those issues in drawing up his report. However, I take great comfort from and, indeed, endorse the Minister's comments and do not believe that my right hon. Friend's amendments need to be incorporated into the Bill.

[Gregory Barker]

I thank the Minister for tabling Government amendments Nos. 47 to 49. As he rightly said, an issue was raised not only by me but by other members of the Committee. If my right hon. Friend had read the reports of our Committee proceedings, he would have known about the extensive and useful discussion of the subject that we held Upstairs.

Much has been said about microgeneration but the measure is about a great deal more than domestic appliances. It is about decentralisation of energy. Although it constitutes only a modest step, I hope that it is the first step in a significant direction for the country's energy policy, which will encourage much greater decentralised energy. If we are to move towards a decentralised model, that will require more community schemes. In many, although not all cases, especially in rural areas, the most effective, efficient and cost-effective way of embracing the new model will not be individual householders adopting their own kit but an efficient, small community form of domestic heat and power generation. I do not mean windmills or even solar or photovoltaic technology but gas-fired, combined heat and power or biomass fuel technology. Those work best, economically and efficiently, if they are adopted by several householders coming together on a relatively small scale. They are especially applicable to rural areas. Surely it is best for those schemes to be brought together in a democratic forum, where everyone in a village could have a voice, feel that their concerns were incorporated and the result was a genuine community plan. It is important to have a facility—it is only a facility—so that, in some circumstances, there is an opportunity to give some sort of financial encouragement when there is community consent.

I am mindful of the time and I do not want to hold matters up. I thank the Government for their amendments and support them.

Chris Huhne: I agree with the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker). We are happy with the consultation arrangements. As I said earlier, there is already a general duty for consultation. There is a general Cabinet Office better regulation Executive code of practice on consultation. Doubtless the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is aware of that. It is relevant to the case that we are considering.

Mr. Forth: It is the second time that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned the code of practice. Does he have any more faith in that code of practice than in the ministerial code, which has been the subject of so much recent discussion?

Chris Huhne: The ministerial code is a little beyond the purview of the debate, suffice it to say that there is a considerable framework in both the statutory requirements for consultation and the code of practice. Whether Ministers practise what they are undertaking is a matter for the House to consider in a particular case.

The right hon. Gentleman had a good reply on amendments Nos. 58 and 59 in terms of the community projects and not microgeneration. I am happy to associate the Liberal Democrats with support for Government amendments Nos. 47 to 49, precisely because of the enabling provisions for parish and community councils to promote energy schemes, should they wish to do so.

Mr. Chope: I was disappointed with the Minister's response to amendments Nos. 58 and 59. He said that the figures in the clause are much larger than we need in the current climate, but that they will encompass future schemes. The figures are grotesquely large, especially when coupled with clause 16, the purpose of which is to promote energy schemes. Amendment No. 59 would reduce the figure by 80 per cent., so leaving 20 per cent. of what the Government want, which is 4MW in the case of plant for the generation of electricity. That would be a very large plant.

Renewables East says:

"One 1.8 MW wind turbine at a reasonable site would produce over 4.7 million units of electricity each year, enough to meet the annual needs of over 1,000 households, or to run a computer for over 1,620 years."

Amendment No. 58 would allow 4MW, which would be a large enough piece of plant to have for a community purpose, promoted by the Government under the provisions of the clause.

Malcolm Wicks: It may help if I give an example. I am advised that the university of Edinburgh halls of residence have a gas-fired combined heat and power plant. Clearly, a number of students will be in those halls of residence who should not be there at that time of night, but it is an indication of the scale that might be required under the heading of community energy.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the Minister for intervening. If the university already has such a plant, I cannot understand why we are saying that we need clause 16 to enable it to have one, but that is a separate debate. It goes back to the theme that has run through the last two Fridays—that there is a lot of stuff in the Bill which is exhortatory and not necessary, because most of the things that it promotes can already be done. I had the privilege of receiving a university education in Scotland, albeit not at Edinburgh, but at St. Andrews university. I doubt whether it would want to put up these large wind turbines, even if they are for the benefit of the students.

A 1.8MW turbine—about half the limit that my amendment would introduce—would have rotor diameters ranging up to 65 m and towers ranging from 25 to 80 m in height. The Government are asking for something that is 20 times as large as that.

Mark Lazarowicz: Of all the exaggerations, the idea of a 1,000 m rotor, which is the logical conclusion of the hon. Gentleman's argument, is the most ridiculous that we have heard. Does he accept that no planning legislation would be changed by the clause? All the planning requirements that will apply to such a "monstrosity", to use his word, would apply in such a case. Nothing would be changed by the clause as far as planning controls are concerned.

Mr. Chope: I accept that the clause would not affect the planning controls. What worries me is that it is entitled "Promotion of community energy schemes", and the scheme that I have described is precisely the kind that the Government would have a duty to promote if the Secretary of State thought fit.

It is absurd to suggest that wind turbines would have to be 20 times as large in order to generate 20 times as much as 1.4MW. I am envisaging, say, 20 1.4MW turbines, which would constitute a gross intrusion on any community. The Minister mentioned biomass. We do not need those excessive limits even for biomass. According to a helpful written answer published on 10 February 2005, the total output from the 11 biomass power plants operating in this country amounted to only just over 100MW. There is no need for such high limits to accommodate one biomass plant. I fear that we are talking not about community schemes, but about enormous schemes.

Mr. Letwin: I hope my hon. Friend will accept that those of us who support the measure do not just want biomass and wind turbines, although of course they are important. We also want to decentralise the electricity generation system, so that communities are served by smaller power plants rather than the country being served by 1,000MW or 2,000MW plants through a vast grid. In that context, surely, the limits proposed by the Minister are reasonable.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for that intervention, because it returns me to a major issue for my constituents. They will be expected to take most of the waste fuel from the whole of Dorset so that it can be converted to energy. What worries my constituents and me is that the proposed plants are so grotesquely large. It is causing a good deal of consternation. We think it would be better to have smaller plants in small Dorset towns—perhaps one in Dorchester, in my right hon. Friend's constituency—than to have waste transported across the county to those very large plants. I recognise the virtue of the plants, but a plant with a capacity of up to 20MW cannot be described as a modest plant. A 4MW limit would allow much more local combined heat and power, which is greatly preferable to the centralisation that we are experiencing in my constituency.

Mr. Letwin: I see the force of my hon. Friend's argument, but I understand that his favoured method of generation is nuclear. The lower of the two limits, 20MW, is approximately 1 per cent. of the likely size of nuclear power stations. We are talking about rather smaller stations than those that he is proposing elsewhere.

Mr. Chope: I am not suggesting that we should have nuclear power stations, although nuclear generation would be possible at Winfrith in Dorset. Unlike my right hon. Friend, I believe in a mix of energy from different sources, including nuclear. I should like the proportion of energy from nuclear power to increase beyond the present 20 or 21 per cent. level. I am certainly not suggesting that we should use this provision to set up the equivalent of nuclear power stations. That is a wild red herring. I wish to ensure that the principles of decentralised energy production are carried through, but I do not see that happening properly if we allow individual units of production to generate as much as 20MWe or 100MWt. That is why I tabled the amendment. I do not intend to press it to a Division, but unless the Bill is changed in the other place, it will cause much consternation in local communities. They may feel threatened by community energy schemes, not assisted by them.

The large figures are counter-productive for the purposes that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and I agree are worth while. We are not at odds with each other on that, but I think that it would be much better to include in the Bill provisions that would encourage community combined heat and power schemes in small towns in Dorset, instead of them all being concentrated in Ferndown, as is proposed at present. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend gave evidence at the public inquiry, but I did so and suggested that we should have fair shares across Dorset and I am pleased that he agrees with that proposition.

This is a useful group of amendments and I am sorry that the Minister has not accepted the reductions. I hope that we will have the chance to reflect on that in due course. We wait with bated breath for the Minister's report before the end of the month, which will inform our debate on Third Reading and mean that we may have a much more informed debate on the whole issue of climate change and sustainable energy.

I shall not comment further on the amendments relating to parish councils, except to say that I am very concerned that the Government amendments—tabled at the behest of my right hon. Friend—could result in parish councils, which have to raise all their money from people living in the parish because they do not get any grants from Government, being encouraged to go on a mad spending spree. Let us hope that that does not happen.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has parishes in his constituency, but I do not, because my constituency is in a London borough. Can he give me some idea of the staffing and resources that a typical parish council might have? What is his judgment on whether they could begin to fulfil the aspirations set out in this clause?

Mr. Chope: I cannot generalise, but Burton parish council, for example, has one part-time clerk and tries to meet once a month. Hurn parish council, which is much smaller, has probably fewer than 1,000 residents, although it includes Bournemouth international airport. It also has only one part-time volunteer to assist it. We delude ourselves if we think that clause 17 is of great significance, but it could lead to larger parish councils running up substantial bills.

Mr. Forth: Does that not mean that there is a risk that the alleged benefits of microgeneration will be unevenly spread? If some enthusiastic parish councils promote them as the clause suggests, but others do not have the resources to do so, someone somewhere will miss out.

Mr. Chope: As always, my right hon. Friend makes a fair point. We do not have parish councils in the metropolitan areas, so this is very much an issue for rural communities. Sometimes parish councils get together to develop policies on a co-ordinated basis across a county—there is an effective organisation called the Dorset Association of Parish and Town Councils which might be able to produce a collective response to the demands set out in clause 17.

[Mr. Chope]

I do not think that I can take the matter any further at the moment, without risking the possibility that we might not be able to complete the Report stage today. I have always made it clear to people who have discussed the issue with me that my concern is to ensure that the Bill is properly scrutinised, rather than that it should be wrecked. That is why I want to put on the record my concern that e-mails have been flying around suggesting that by speaking and participating in this debate one of my hon. Friends is guilty of something greater than denying the holocaust. One might describe that as a slight exaggeration. I am sure people will realise that there are people who could be described as eco-fascists, and we must not allow them to browbeat us into doing anything other than scrutinising this important legislation.

Mr. Forth: I assure my hon. Friend that I will not be browbeaten by eco-nuts, eco-fascists or any other odd people. I am always prepared to engage in serious debate and scrutiny of Bills, be they well-intentioned or otherwise. I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith on steering his Bill to this stage in its development. With a bit of luck, we might just be able to get started on Third Reading today, which would be a giant step forward and would reward the patience that the hon. Gentleman has shown, as well as his politeness and his courtesy—qualities not shown by some extraordinary, unpleasant people outside the House who, being either ill-informed or malicious, think that bombarding Members of Parliament with vaguely threatening material can somehow change the way we work. I hope this debate has demonstrated that that is not, and will not be, the case, no matter how strongly they may feel about this or that issue.

We have had a useful debate on this group of amendments. I am not sure that we have quite got to the bottom of the meaning and importance of community energy schemes and projects, or that we are completely satisfied that there will be sufficient protection against the development of what could be substantial generating plants. We have been given reassurances, and I hope that they are carried through in whatever way may be appropriate—in guidance and so on. I hope that one of the things that has emerged strongly from this debate is that we must get the balance right between the desire for good things such as microgeneration, sustainable energy and renewables on the one hand and people's quality of life on the other. It is one thing to attempt to look decades ahead and save the planet in the next century, but it is quite another to take care of the quality of people's everyday lives today, and that should concern us as much, if not more.

We will probably have to agree to disagree on parish councils. Few parish councils will have the resources available or will be prepared to give sufficient priority to this kind of work, over and above what they do day by day in their communities. There has obviously been some interesting to-ing and fro-ing between my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) and the Minister about how to get the pitch about parish councils right. My view, which I expressed in my amendment, is that it would probably be better to leave them out of it altogether. However, at this stage of the Bill, I will be content to let matters rest there.

We have had helpful explanations. The Minister has been helpful throughout. He has given us his explanations in his usual courteous way, and the promoter of the Bill has been much more helpful today than he was last Friday. He has been rewarded by some good progress on the Bill. I am very grateful that he brought along his hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead), who has put us right in his knowledgeable way. I am sure that the Bill will be that much the better for it. So, for all these reasons, I am not going to press my amendment to the vote. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 17

PARISH COUNCILS AND COMMUNITY COUNCILS: POWERS IN RELATION TO LOCAL ENERGY SAVING MEASURES

Amendments made: No. 47, in page 11, line 19, leave out from 'area' to 'or' in line 22 and insert

'(whether offered or provided by public authorities or by any other persons),'.

No. 48, in page 11, line 25, at end insert—

'(2A) Assistance provided under subsection (1) may, if the council giving the assistance think appropriate—

(a) be made subject to conditions, or

(b) otherwise be provided on such terms as the council think appropriate.'

No. 49, in page 11, line 26, leave out subsections (3) and (4).—[Gillian Merron.]

Clause 23

INTERPRETATION

Amendments made: No. 50, in page 15, line 30, at end insert—

' "greenhouse gas" means any of the following—

(a) carbon dioxide;

(b) methane;

(c) nitrous oxide;

(d) hydrofluorocarbons;

(e) perfluorocarbons;

(f) sulphur hexafluoride;'.

No. 51, in page 15, leave out lines 31 and 32 and insert—

' "microgeneration" means the use for the generation of electricity or the production of heat of any plant (which, for this purpose, includes any equipment, apparatus or appliance)—

(g) which, in generating electricity or (as the case may be) producing heat, relies wholly or mainly on a source of energy or a technology mentioned in subsection (2), and

(h) the capacity of which to generate electricity or (as the case may be) to produce heat does not exceed the capacity mentioned in subsection (3);'.

No. 52, in page 15, line 34, at end insert—

'(2) Those sources of energy and technologies are—

(a) biomass;

(b) biofuels;

(c) fuel cells;

(d) photovoltaics;

(e) water (including waves and tides);

(f) wind;

(g) solar power;

(h) geothermal sources;

(i) combined heat and power systems.

(3) That capacity is—

(a) in relation to the generation of electricity, 50 kilowatts;

(b) in relation to the production of heat, 45 kilowatts thermal.

(4) The Secretary of State may by order amend subsection (2) by adding to the sources of energy and technologies for the time being listed any other source of energy or technology for the generation of electricity or production of heat if he considers that the use of that source of energy or technology would cut emissions of greenhouse gases in Great Britain.

(5) The power to make an order under subsection (4)—

(a) is exercisable by statutory instrument, and

(b) includes power to make such supplemental or consequential provision (including provision modifying this section) and such transitional or saving provision as the Secretary of State thinks fit.

(6) No order under that subsection may be made unless a draft of the order—

(a) has been laid before Parliament, and

(b) has been approved by a resolution of each House.'.—[Gillian Merron.]

Clause 25

COMMENCEMENT

Amendments made: No. 53, in page 16, line 2, after '1,' insert

'(Local authorities to have regard to information on energy measures in exercising functions),'.

No. 54, in page 16, line 2, after '10,' insert

'(Building regulations relating to emissions and use of fuel and power: time limit for prosecutions), (Building regulations relating to emissions and use of fuel and power: report regarding compliance),'.

Clause 26

SHORT TITLE AND EXTENT

Amendments made: No. 55, in page 16, line 13, after 'Sections,' insert

'(Local authorities to have regard to information on energy measures in exercising functions),'.

No. 56, in page 16, line 13, after '10' insert

', (Building regulations relating to emissions and use of fuel and power: time limit for prosecutions), (Building regulations relating to emissions and use of fuel and power: report regarding compliance)'.—[Gillian Merron.]

Title

Amendment made: No. 57, line 3, after 'sources,' insert

'compliance with building regulations relating to emissions of greenhouse gases and the use of fuel and power,'.—[Gillian Merron.]

Order for Third Reading read.

2.25 pm

Mark Lazarowicz: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am glad that Members have co-operated to ensure that the Bill reached this stage. It received twice as much consideration on Report as most Government Bills, which may or may not be a good thing. If issues are raised on Third Reading, perhaps, with the leave of the House, I can respond to them through interventions, but I shall say no more at this point.

2.26 pm

Mr. Forth: This is the bit we have all been looking forward to, because I hope that with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we shall be able to range much more widely than when we were constrained by amendments and new clauses.

My remarks, sadly, probably will not be able to be concluded by 2.30, but I am sure that we can look forward to another full day of debate on Third Reading, to do the Bill proper justice. I should like to open with a quote from the Prime Minister's very good evidence to the Liaison Committee on 7 February. He said that

"whether the climate changes or not is not going to depend on the UK".

That sets a useful frame for Third Reading. By the way, the Prime Minister went on to say that climate change

"is dependent on those huge economic motors and in particular China and India".

That is one aspect that I hope we shall be able to explore on Third Reading, given the title of the Bill.

The long title of the Bill gives us some good guidance for framing our debate. It talks variously about

"the reduction of emissions of greenhouse gases", which we have to a large extent touched on today, in respect of the contribution that might be made by microgeneration and so on; "the promotion of microgeneration", on which we rightly spent a long time; and

"the use of heat produced from renewable sources".

There is a cornucopia of important issues that we can and should explore on Third Reading.

Mr. Hollobone: My right hon. Friend referred to the international context for the Bill. On 12 January, I received a response to my parliamentary question about carbon dioxide emissions, which stated that the UK would reach a total of 525 million tonnes by 2020 compared to 556 million tonnes at present, so there is likely to be a decrease. However, in the United States the amount is set to rise from just over 5,000 million tonnes to 6,763 million tonnes by 2020.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and later in my remarks I shall quote further from the Prime Minister on exactly that point. The Prime Minister spoke words of very great wisdom. He has a clear view of the realities of climate change, emissions and the like and I am sure that we shall want to explore that, too.

One of the things on which we may want to spend some time, and which has been somewhat neglected up to now—largely because nobody saw fit to table probing amendments or examine it—is the reference in the long title to "the adjustment of transmission charges for electricity".

That could be an important aspect of the Bill, should it become an Act, and of its impact on our everyday lives. We have not really explored that point and I do not think that it was really covered on Second Reading. I hope that Third Reading will offer us an opportunity to look at that part of the Bill in much more depth.

Mr. Weir: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that that wording refers to a change in transmission charges for renewable energy in the Scottish islands?

Mr. Forth: I look forward to hearing the hon. Gentleman seeking to contribute to the Third Reading debate and telling us a lot more about the Scottish islands—a subject that does not arise very often in the House. Perhaps he could discuss hydroelectricity and give us some inspiration about the contribution it could make to reducing emissions—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 12 May.

Remaining Private Members' Bills

VEHICLE REGISTRATION MARKS BILL

Order for Second reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 16 June.

FAMILY LAW (PROPERTY AND MAINTENANCE) BILL

Order for Second reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 7 April.

HUMBER BRIDGE BILL

Order for Second reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 16 June.

BOROUGH FREEDOM (FAMILY SUCCESSION) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 20 October.

LICENSING ACT 2003 (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 16 June.

BREAST CANCER BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [20 January], That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be read a Second time on Friday 24 March.

EU-Morocco Fishing Agreement

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

2.32 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I am very pleased that we have managed to hold this Adjournment debate on the European Union-Morocco fishing agreement, which has enormous significance for many people living in the Western Sahara region. I know that this is a complicated day for us all, so I am really grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs for being on the Front Bench to answer the debate. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who has taken an enormous interest in issues surrounding Western Sahara and Morocco. Unfortunately, he cannot be here today, but later in my speech I want to quote from something he sent me.

In 1974, the Spanish occupation of the Western Sahara ceased. Morocco then marched into that part of the Western Sahara and declared it to be Moroccan territory. There ensued a war that lasted some years, which was very brutal and resulted in many deaths and much destruction. The Polisario Front, which led the campaign for the independence of the Western Sahara, secured the support of the African Union and many people all around the world. It was ultimately expelled from the territory and 165,000 Sahrawi people live in refugee camps in Algeria at the present time. I have had the good fortune to visit those camps in the Western Sahara. [Interruption.] I think I am losing the attention of some Members of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, who appear to be having a meeting of their own in the Chamber while we should be discussing Morocco.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is quite right. Hon. Members will either listen to the debate or leave the Chamber.

Jeremy Corbyn: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was explaining that the Sahrawi refugees live in refugee camps in Algeria. They have created an effective and sustainable community. Illiteracy has largely been conquered and there are good education and health services. That is thanks to the support of Algeria, yes, but also because of a great deal of aid from the UN, the European Union and our Department for International Development.

The refugees' dream and hope is to return to Western Sahara. Part of the arrangements surrounding the 1991 ceasefire was that the United Nations, through its organisation MINURSO—United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara—would arrange for a referendum to be held on the basis of the 1974 census so that all the Sahrawi people could vote on whether they wished to achieve the independence to which they are entitled under the terms of international law. Tragically, the referendum has never been held because of disputes about the electoral roll and, I believe, Moroccan intransigence. The situation remains in a degree of stalemate.

Law is very much on the side of the Sahrawi people. The issue has been taken to the International Court of Justice. The Sahrawi claim, put by the Polisario, for the independence of Western Sahara is endorsed by a large number of countries and, especially, the African Union. It is worth mentioning that it is the only example in Africa of a border dispute involving an African country and what it claims is part of its territory—the Western Sahara—in which the African Union supports the independence movement. The situation is thus unique.

My hon. Friend the Minister is aware of many of those issues because he is a former Foreign Office Minister. He is well aware of the concern and support of many of us for the Sahrawi people and what we believe to be their legitimate claim. The arrangements that are made for agreements between international bodies such as the United Nations and the European Union, and representatives of the Sahrawi people, are thus highly significant. I therefore want to bring to the attention of the House and the Minister the fishing agreement between the European Union and Morocco.

Morocco, like any other country in the world, is entitled to conclude a fishing agreement with the European Union—about that there is no dispute. However, it is not entitled to conclude a fishing agreement that includes the waters to the south of the recognised border between Morocco and what I shall term for the benefit of this contribution "the occupied territories"—Western Sahara—which makes up a significant part of the coastline. The waters are rich in fish, and the area is also rich in minerals and phosphates, which is part of the reason behind Morocco's determination to hang on to its illegal occupation.

The purpose of the debate is to draw the attention of the House and the Minister to the agreement that is about to be ratified by the European Union and to ask what the British position will be. Let me quote from a group called Fish Elsewhere. In answer to the question:

"Did the EU Legal Opinion say that fishing in Saharawi waters was legal",

it says:

"The legal opinion then discusses under what circumstances would EU vessels be legally allowed to fish in the Western Sahara. It concludes that it would only be legal providing it was not 'carried out in disregard of the interests and of the wishes of the local population'. The legal opinion states that it 'cannot be prejudged that Morocco will not comply with its obligations under international law vis-à-vis the people of Western Sahara', hence we cannot be sure that the Agreement would be illegal."

There is thus an area of debate and discussion. Fish Elsewhere has done a great deal to draw the attention of EU member states to the situation.

I understand that the Minister cannot comment on the foreign policy implications of the situation because he is a Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Minister—I would not expect him to be able to do that—but will he inform the House what position the British Government intend to take? The EU is divided. France and Spain strongly support a fishing agreement and Morocco's claim that it has the right to fish in the waters off Western Sahara, but a number of other countries are very doubtful about the legality of the matter and do not want the EU to conclude an "illegal" agreement that would then be challenged in the International Court of Justice. Many of them also have a great deal of sympathy with the plight of the Sahrawi people.

I go back to the legal opinion that I just read out, which talked about the local people. Ever since the expulsion of the Polisario from Western Sahara in the 1970s, a large number of Moroccan settlers have been moved in. It could be argued that those settlers are the local people. I would argue that although they are obviously resident there, the legality of that residence is in question, and the local people are those who were expelled and who now occupy the refugee camps in Algeria.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

Will the Minister indicate to the House that the British Government are prepared to vote against the EU-Morocco fishing agreement if it includes the waters off the Western Sahara—those of the Sahrawi people? Will he do his best to ensure that as many other countries as possible vote accordingly?

There is an issue here of simple human justice. An area of land, which under the decolonisation procedures should have become a newly independent territory, was occupied. Since then the Polisario Front has kept the people together, campaigned for justice and the right of return, and gained a lot of international support. If we condone that occupation by agreeing to Morocco's "right" to fish the waters off the Western Sahara, we are condoning the occupation and the illegality of what Morocco is doing. The people who stand to gain from that are a number of extremely large, powerful fishing companies, particularly in France and Spain, and those who stand to lose are the poor people who have lived out all these years in the refugee camps in Western Sahara. I hope that when he comes to reply the Minister will be able to offer some assurance on these matters.

I would like to quote from a letter to me from my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud who, like me, takes a very close interest in matters concerning Western Sahara and is a strong supporters of the Sahrawi people. He says:

"I am deeply concerned at the implications of this agreement. It flies in the face of the pressure that the UN has been applying over the years to try to resolve the situation in the Western Sahara. I am appalled that narrow EU fishing interests have been prioritised over the wider rights of the Saharawis and this gives a green light for Morocco to carry on with its illegal occupation of land and waters. What safeguards have been put in place to ensure that over fishing does not take place thus removing a potential source of revenue for a future independent Western Sahara? Surely the EU realises the sensitivity of this issue and should not put narrow economic interests above its long held political view in support of the UN that a referendum should be held on the future of the territory."

To put it simply, I hope that this EU fishing agreement does not go ahead in so far as it takes away the fishing area of the Western Sahara people. I hope that we get a very strong declaration of support for a UN-organised referendum so that the people of the Western Sahara can, once and for all, decide their own future. If they wish to live in an independent country, in what was formerly a Spanish colony, it is their right to do so. That is a right enshrined in international law, and above all it is our duty to try to support that right within international law.

2.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) on the commitment that he has shown on this issue over many years. He has an interest not only in Western Sahara but, for the purposes of this debate, in any potential impact of the EU-Morocco fisheries agreement on that part of the world.

May I start by apologising to my hon. Friend for the fact that, as he acknowledged, many of the points that he raised are the responsibility of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office? I know that he held discussions with the Minister for the Middle East, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), back in the autumn, and he may want to renew that contact now. I shall certainly make sure that the concerns that he has raised today that are relevant to the Foreign Office are communicated to my hon. Friend.

The proposed new fisheries partnership agreement between the EU and Morocco is due to come into force in May 2006 for a period of four years. It is made under the provisions of the European common fisheries policy and, as my hon. Friend said, the Commission has competence to negotiate such agreements on behalf of the EU. The agreement has yet to come before the Agriculture and Fisheries Council for adoption, and we are still waiting for an opinion from the European Parliament. If they have not already done so, I urge my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, North and for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who has a deep interest, to raise their concerns with Members of the European Parliament, who have a role to play in these matters.

From a purely fisheries perspective, the agreement reflects the new fisheries partnership approach based on the Fisheries Council's reforms of 2004 in respect of such agreements. For example, article 6 of the protocol to the agreement provides for more than a third of the EU's financial contribution to be used for the implementation of a national fisheries policy based on responsible fishing and on the sustainable exploitation of fisheries resources. That reflects the improvements to such third-party agreements in terms of their transparency and sustainability that were championed by the United Kingdom in particular. The agreement is based on the scientific assessment of stocks in Moroccan waters and consequently excludes fishing possibilities for cephalopods and shellfish, which have been over-exploited.

In addition to the fisheries aspects of the agreement, my hon. Friend has raised its potential effect on the disputed status of Western Sahara. I give my hon. Friend and the House the following assurance. The UK Government would not support an agreement if we felt that it would prejudice the question of the status of Western Sahara. The delimitation of the agreement is identical to that of the previous EU-Morocco fisheries agreement, which expired in 1999. The UK Government's position remains the same: the status of Western Sahara should be dealt with under the United Nations process. We regard the sovereignty of Western Sahara as undetermined, pending UN efforts to find a solution and we fully support that UN process.

As my hon. Friend also said, the European Commission has recently produced legal advice that suggests that there is nothing in the draft fisheries agreement that is inconsistent with international law governing the status of Western Sahara. The Fisheries Council will clearly want to explore that advice further when discussing the draft agreement. The UK Government are considering the Commission's advice in discussion with other member states who, like us, have been seeking reassurance on the matter, and we have placed a reserve on our position.

I am aware of concerns expressed by War on Want and others that few Sahrawis will benefit from the agreement because of the structure of the fishing industry in the areas concerned. The Commission has expressed the view that the Western Sahara people will benefit from the agreement, but I have asked the Commission to study and respond to War on Want's evidence as a matter of urgency.

Morocco is obliged under international law to ensure that in non-self-governing territories such as Western Sahara economic activity does not adversely affect the people. It is clear in paragraph 24 of the letter of 29 January 2002 from the UN's legal advisers to the Security Council that the exploitation of the resources of such territories must be conducted for the benefit of the peoples of those territories on their behalf or in consultation with their representatives.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that, in that regard, "people's" includes those who are in the refugee camps in Algeria?

Mr. Bradshaw: It is not for a Fisheries Minister to express a view on who properly speaks on behalf of the people of Western Sahara. I am sure that my hon. Friend has his own view, but that too is an issue on which he will have to seek confirmation from my colleagues in the Foreign Office.

We are concerned to ensure that obligations that are self-evident in the case that we are discussing are honoured. The European Union, including the UK Government, is considering how best to ensure that those obligations are respected in the event that the proposed new fisheries agreement is agreed. I hope that, with those comments, I have at least somewhat reassured my hon. Friend.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes to Three o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 28 February 2006

[MRS. JOAN HUMBLE in the Chair]

Business Rates

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

9.30 am

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Good morning, Mrs. Humble. I am delighted that my debate has excited the attention of the House. The allocation of business rates revenue is important to my constituents and many others.

The current local government finance structure does not fully recognise or reward local authorities' contribution to economic growth.

"Local authorities bear many of the costs of economic development although they do not benefit from the increased revenues it generates. Since 1990 business rate revenues have been paid into a central pool so that local authorities get no direct individual or local benefit."

Those well chosen words are not mine, but those of the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), the previous but several local government Minister—and how right he was.

The serious issue that I want to raise is about what happens to the taxes that businesses in our constituencies pay. The key point is that since 1990, business rates have been set nationally; they are now known not as business rates, but national non-domestic rates. The money paid by local businesses, although collected locally, is passed straight to central Government and reallocated, not according to where it came from, but loosely on a per capita basis. I shall come back to that point in a moment.

Why am I—apparently uniquely—interested in that? It is because in South Gloucestershire, the unitary authority where my constituency falls, something strange has been going on since 1997. In that year—the year I was first elected—businesses in my constituency paid just under £45 million in business rates, but we in South Gloucestershire received £53 million. So in 1997–98, we were net beneficiaries by £8 million of the business rate system; those figures come from a written answer provided to me by the Department concerned. It has all gone wrong since then, because in every succeeding year we have put more into the national pot than we have taken out. In 1998–99, there was an immediate swing: local businesses paid nearly £60 million, but received only just over £55 million. There was, as it were, a £4 million tax on South Gloucestershire businesses—money that they paid in tax that did not benefit the local community.

Time would permit me to go through each succeeding year, but I shall not. Suffice it to say that in each and every year since then there has been a substantial South Gloucestershire tax—a levy on our businesses, money that did not return to the local area. I am delighted to see that my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), has joined us; he will want to make a lengthy contribution to the debate. The extent to which South Gloucestershire businesses overpay business rates—that is, pay money that does not benefit South Gloucestershire—has knock-on effects on the area of Gloucestershire that he covers.

So the tax was £4 million in 1998. Things got very bad in 2001–02, when the tax became £14 million. In this place, we toss figures such as £14 million around as though they were spare change, but in the context of the budget of a local authority which, as I shall say repeatedly, is one of the worst funded in the country for other elements of local authority funding, £14 million is a huge sum.

I am not making a party political point; the council is run in a joint administration by all three political parties. This year, the all-party council signed up to a budget that involved getting rid of travel tokens for disabled people, which had been in place for a long time. That has been controversial locally, but it is the kind of difficult choice forced on that local authority because of its very tight financial position. Those business rates that we do not get back really matter.

In the most recent year for which figures are available—the current year—it is estimated that £11 million more is paid by local businesses than is received from the national pot. The issue is a running sore. Cumulatively—I am sure you were wondering what the cumulative figure was, Mrs. Humble—£53 million more has been taken from South Gloucestershire businesses than was given back to South Gloucestershire people since the Government came to power. To give an idea of the scale, that is more money than was stolen in the Bank of England heist—it is that kind of rip-off. That huge amount of money goes out of the local community and does not come back.

I have been doing a bit of investigation to try to work out why that has been. What has caused that switch around? One of my local councillors—Councillor Dave Hockey—raised the issue with me. He said, "Did you realise that all this money is going out of the area on business rates?" I said that he was not right, because I had asked a question in Parliament and found that, surprisingly enough, we were net recipients. I had asked the question four or five years previously. The first time I asked, we had been net recipients. I thought that surprising, because we had low unemployment and lots of business; one would have imagined that we would not have been. I just left the issue alone. It was through the assiduousness of one of my councillors, who said, "Go and have another look", that I realised how much things had changed.

Why have they changed? Back in 1997–98, local businesses were paying £45 million in business rates. This year, they are paying double that—£93 million. That is strange, because official Government policy is that business rates do not go up by more than inflation each year. In a sense, the answer to that is obvious when one thinks about it. However, on the face of it, business rate increases each year, in terms of the rate poundage, are capped by retail price inflation. How can it be that businesses are paying double over a period of just eight or nine years?

Two things are going on. First, I think I am right in saying that business rate revaluation happens every five years, so we are probably on our second revaluation over the period. In a growing area where business land is in short supply, rates have gone up substantially. However, I am still astonished that the burden has doubled, because the revenue that we have got back has gone up by only 60 per cent. That is the root of the problem; the bill has more than doubled.

[Steve Webb]

Not only South Gloucestershire is involved, although it is particularly affected by the phenomenon; other parts of the country are also affected. Across the country as a whole, Greater London is the only standard region that pays more than it receives. That will not surprise the House unduly. It is not the whole of Greater London—outer London is a net recipient—but inner London, and the particular cases of the City of London and Westminster. I am reliably informed that Westminster pays more in business rates than the whole of Birmingham, Manchester and Liverpool put together, so there are clearly very big imbalances. I pre-empt any criticism that I might end up with some very simplistic recommendation by saying that simply arguing that we should retain business rates locally is not of itself a sufficient response, because there are very big imbalances. I accept that point.

I feel in a slightly Bob Geldof mood this morning. I do not mean exactly, "Give us your money", but "At least give us our money", or "Give us some of our money"—that would be a start. I am a very modest man. I do not say, "Give us your money", but "Give us some of our money." That would be nice.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my near neighbour for giving way and I am sorry that I missed the first minute of what he said. My only disagreement—the hon. Gentleman has not come on to this—is that it is not the district's money. The money should be restituted to where it comes from, which is the immediate area. I have always believed—to be fair, the Government considered this issue in their review of business rates—that at least part of the money should go back to the relevant parish or town, where there are representative bodies. Where I live, in Stonehouse, there is the bulk of the industry. It is a running sore that we put all the value into the local economy, but get nothing out of it. Does the hon. Gentleman agree? He is a new localist, surely.

Steve Webb: I am grateful for that comment. Obviously, the issue does not arise in quite the same way. South Gloucestershire is a unitary authority, so there is not the same issue between county and district as in the hon. Gentleman's area. However, there is an issue about towns and parishes, and if the Government are willing to address the point about locally raised money being spent locally, there might well be an argument for going further, to the towns and parishes. That is an interesting point.

As I say, not only South Gloucestershire is involved, but the City of London, Westminster and other parts of inner London. How does the system work at the moment? Since 1990–91, central Government have set the rate, which applies to the local tax base—the rateable value of non-domestic properties. The money is sent centrally and allocated per capita—although that is something of a simplification, as is everything in local government finance, given that there are issues about multi-tier authorities, police authorities and so on. Broadly speaking, the money returns per capita and not according to where the business activity is.

Someone who is concerned about social justice, such as myself, might say, "Why are you moaning? Is business not a good thing? Jobs are good news. You should be glad that you have the jobs. Stop complaining and talk about something else." However, it is not that simple. Although I welcome the fact that unemployment in my constituency is below the national average and that we have had prosperity—they are obviously good things—businesses and rapid economic growth bring costs as well as benefits. Today, I am asking for the system more accurately to reflect the costs of growth and not simply its benefits.

What are the costs? One of the constant headaches in our area is the lack of infrastructure. I always think that my constituency is the nicest place in the country in which to live. The quality of life, the environment and so on are some of the things that make that the case. Judging by letters that I receive and people's complaints, the traffic congestion, the difficulty of getting affordable housing and other such issues sometimes make it not the nicest place in which to live. All those matters are exacerbated by rapid economic growth. In a sense, steady economic growth is far more manageable, but that is not what has taken place in South Gloucestershire. There has been rapid growth, thousands of new houses have been built and the infrastructure has not kept up. Had the business rates money been retained locally to a greater extent we could have done much more to accommodate the growth.

Let us consider traffic congestion. Each time another business park is built there are huge traffic implications: major highways works and so on. The roads network simply cannot expand fast enough; nor indeed should it. Dealing effectively with traffic congestion has been a huge ongoing issue. There is an area known locally as the north fringe of Bristol—that winds up the people of South Gloucestershire greatly, because it is in South Gloucestershire, although we all know where we are talking about. It has a lot of employment and it will have thousands more houses because of the Deputy Prime Minister's intervention. It has gridlock at certain times of day. When the council tries to reroute anything or change the phasing of the traffic lights, it often makes matters worse. Such things cannot be fixed on the cheap. Dealing with the highways infrastructure and the consequences of business growth is a long-term job that requires serious investment. If more of the business rates were retained locally, there would be a better match between the additional jobs, the revenue that comes from those rates and the costs that follow.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's analysis, but I am unclear whether he is talking about retaining locally a greater proportion of the business rate—a specified sum in respect of growth—or the whole of the business rate. The Government's scheme redistributes it around the country. If it is not redistributed, certain parts will never have sufficient funds to deal with their economic needs. How would he address those things?

Steve Webb: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I tend to look upon my speeches as the equivalent of a thriller novel: they build gradually to the exciting denouement. He might be the sort of person who turns straight to the back page to find out whodunnit. If he bears with me, I will address his point, although I will give him a teaser in respect of my conclusion so as not to keep him in suspense too much.

Essentially there should be wholesale local retention of business rates but with some sort of equalisation mechanism to offset the extremes that would result. The consequences would be a substantial rebalancing of funding, which is currently far too centralised, but with local discretion at the margins. That is what I would like, but I will return to the point in more detail later.

Infrastructure costs result from rapid business growth. Planning is perhaps a neglected topic, in the sense that every council has a planning department. South Gloucestershire's planning department assesses major projects such as highways schemes and business park developments. It deals not just with Mrs. Jones's home extension but with things that have knock-on effects for the whole area, the local plan and the entire strategy. That is a big job. The planning department has, at times, been completely swamped by large applications. The process needs to be resourced properly. Clearly, as there is a lot of industry and business in the area, there are big issues about waste disposal and other environmental concerns.

There are also big knock-on effects on public transport. Clearly, and quite properly, we cannot just build our way out of the roads problem by constructing yet more roads, as to do so would change the character of the area. It is far better to give people realistic alternatives. Public transport is grossly underfunded in South Gloucestershire. The authority has no natural centre; the centre is outside the authority, in Bristol. People travel into Bristol but they do so by travelling across the authority. They travel to the north fringe of Bristol—the south fringe of South Gloucestershire. The situation does not lend itself to cheap public transport. It is not as if everyone lives on the outskirts of the big city and goes in to work, and all we need is a series of bus routes in and out. A much more messy set of public transport arrangements are needed, involving arterial and cross-country routes.

There are also many people living in relatively small towns and villages, and many of the public transport services are simply uneconomical. The provision of one commuter bus in the morning and one in the evening for people who live in a small village might be all that is economical. Yet, a bus service cannot be run on that basis.

Substantial knock-on effects are involved. South Gloucestershire has an extremely high level of car ownership, so more businesses and jobs mean either massive congestion or serious investment in public transport. We have not really received that investment. Retaining the business rates would enable South Gloucestershire to do more work in that area.

I want to mention one further cost, which is not an obvious one despite its importance: the cost of housing. One might imagine that lots of businesses, jobs and growth would mean lots of people with lots of money who could afford to buy their new Barratt homes on the big new estates. One might imagine that there is no problem. However, what happens is that people move into the area because of the jobs and buy up the houses, because they can afford to do so. That has consequences for the local sons and daughters, for local families and for people in rented accommodation. There is a dearth of rented accommodation, because owner-occupation is high, partly because of the jobs and the prosperity. Affordable housing is also in short supply, because the buying power of the people moving in for the jobs is substantial.

How does the council meet the housing need of the people who are not part of the process that I am discussing? How does it ensure that sons and daughters can afford to get a foot on the housing ladder? Surprisingly, for a prosperous area such as the one I represent, one of the biggest issues that people come to see me about every week is the lack of affordable housing to rent or to buy. That would not be obvious to an outsider. It would be easy to think that lots of jobs mean that people can afford houses and that there is no problem. However, housing is one of our biggest problems. Were we able to retain more business rates locally, the council, in partnership with housing associations or whoever, would be able to do more to ensure a better supply of affordable housing in the area. The jobs and so on are not unalloyed good news.

There is a sting in the tail. The other thing that people say is, "You get all these jobs and people moving in, so the council must be rolling in it." When a new house is built the people who move in pay council tax. However, let us consider what the funding formula does. It examines how much can be raised in council tax from all the houses and how short that amount is of what is needed, and it is involved in filling the gap. In other words, every extra house and extra bit of council tax comes off what the Government make available to the local authority in the other bit of the funding formula. Each extra person and extra house does not benefit the council at all; the money comes off what the Government give in the revenue support grant or in the formula spending assessment.

It gets worse. People then say, "Hang on a minute. The Government give you back money for every child in your schools and for every elderly person using your social services." However, when one examines the league tables, one sees that South Gloucestershire is ranked either second or third from bottom in the entire country for the amount of money per pupil in its schools, the amount of money for elderly people needing social care and so on. It is the infamous triple whammy.

Businesses come into the area, but there is a proportion of the authority's money that we never see. The council tax revenue is simply knocked off what the Government give, so we do not see that. The cost of educating each new child and looking after all elderly people is greater than the money that central Government give to pay for education and care. We make a loss on each person who moves into South Gloucestershire. It is an indisputable fact that population growth is a loss-making activity there. The argument of, "Jobs are great. You are a prosperous area. Tough—go and whinge somewhere else", does not stack up. Things are much more complicated than that. That is why there is a strong case, particularly in South Gloucestershire, for greater retention of local business rates.

Let us consider the Government's thinking and what consultation they have carried out. Obviously, they undertook their own balance-of-funding review. The issue was critical. It was about how much of the council tax that is raised locally was spent locally. At the moment, to put it crudely, it is about a quarter. To put it roughly, business rates amount to a fifth to a quarter of council spending on average. If we were to relocalise business rates, instead of raising locally a quarter of what is spent locally, the amount would be about a half. I consider, as the Minister probably does, that raising locally only a fifth to a quarter of the money that is spent locally is the wrong balance to strike.

[Steve Webb]

The Government do not set up a balance-of-funding review if they do not sense that the balance has swung too far and that there is too much central control and not enough local discretion. Clearly, we are talking about a continuum and there is no exact right figure, but relocalising business rates could lead to a fairer, more equitable balance of funding—half local, half national.

The House will not be astonished to learn that, when the review consulted, almost all local authorities wanted relocalisation, to change the balance of funding and to reduce what is called the gearing problem. The House will know that, when a local authority needs to raise extra money, it cannot do so through the half that it receives in block grant from central Government, because that is fixed. It cannot raise the extra money from the quarter that it receives in business rates, because that is fixed. So the £1 on the whole budget becomes £4 on the quarter that is raised locally. In other words, the gearing problem is that 1 per cent. on the whole budget becomes 4 per cent. on the council tax.

If the council could get some of the money through the council tax and some of it through the business rates, the gearing would become not 1:4, but 1:2. In other words, marginal increases become less of a hit on council tax payers and marginal cuts become less of a benefit to council tax payers, but such matters are less acutely focused on one particular sector, and that must be right. It is another advantage of relocalising the business rates.

One argument for relocalisation is that local authorities that are depending directly on businesses for revenue have more incentive to work closely with them. History does not show that that has always been the case. Before 1990, one of the reasons why business rates were nationalised—it is funny to think of the Thatcher Government nationalising things—was the feeling that local authorities were a bit out of control in respect of what they were doing to businesses and that some of the increases were arbitrary. It was felt that increases were sometimes large and unpredictable and that, because businesses did not vote, they were a soft target. I understand such arguments and I shall return to them.

Over the 15 years since, there has been a cultural change. There is clear evidence that local authorities see it as their role to work closely with local businesses. Economic development partnerships and strategic partnerships are now much more in the warp and weft of what local government does, so there is much less anxiety that a reckless, malicious local government would fling taxes on businesses because it was easy to do so, with no regard for the consequences.

Understandably, the business community has its reservations about allowing local authorities to set business rates without let or hindrance. One argument that is often used is that businesses do not vote, so why should local authorities be allowed to levy the tax and be in the position of taxation without representation? The fact that local authorities can tax businesses, but businesses cannot vote them out would be an argument against corporation tax. Businesses do not vote in national elections either, but we still tax them, so I am not sure that that argument stacks up. As well as being council tax payers and private citizens, the voters are employers, employees, shareholders and consumers and all have an interest in a prosperous local economy. The local electorate is not indifferent to the level of business rates, so the argument is not straightforward.

Clearly, we need to avoid arbitrary changes and huge swings. Business needs a certain amount of stability and predictability. I shall come back to the safeguards. As I agreed with the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) by implication, there would need to be an alternative sort of equalisation. For example, if Westminster City council were allowed to retain its business rates, it would be paying citizens to live here because of the amount that it would raise. Obviously that would be an absurd extreme. The City of London could be paying for world cruises. Matters are not as simple as that, but an equalisation mechanism could still allow local authorities to determine what business rate local businesses could bear and what was appropriate for the services that they have to provide because of the presence of rapidly growing businesses, and that is what I am arguing for.

The Local Government Association said that, when the national business rate system was introduced, 29 per cent. of all council spending came from business rates. Now the amount is 20 per cent., so it has fallen from just under a third to a fifth. No one is suggesting that there should be a huge shift, but that change has happened partly because of the inflation cap on business rates and partly because of huge hikes in council tax. It has meant that, within the local economy, far less is now being borne directly by business. Speaking as an economist, I say that in one sense business does not exist. It is shareholders, employees or customers. Any tax will ultimately be incident on the consumers, the employees or the shareholders. To say that so much of the tax is on business is slightly a misnomer. I hope that hon. Members understand what I mean by that.

Mr. Pickles: As he has reminded me that he was an economist, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will consider my question easy to answer. Assuming that we accept his plan for a more modest redistribution, what additional amount would the Government have to put in to ensure that the poor parts of the United Kingdom received a sum equal to their needs?

Steve Webb: The hon. Gentleman refers to equalisation. In other words, the Government must ensure that there is not a disproportionate result from the City of Londons, the Westminsters and so on at the expense of the areas that have relatively low business rate revenue. Clearly, there is a redistributive consequence. For example, if South Gloucestershire authority keeps more of its business rates and ends up as a net beneficiary, someone somewhere will end up with less money. There needs to be a transitional process of getting from here to there.

The proportion of local tax paid by business has now fallen to a fifth. Many people would consider that that has not been a carefully planned, calculated, long-term strategy, but that it has just happened. It has been the year-by-year consequence of substantial above-inflation council tax rises and nominally, at least, inflation-linked business rate raises.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman has not mentioned the rural domain where there has been a careful plan to keep businesses in place by reducing business rates substantially, half through central Government and up to half through local authorities. That is vital in the sense that it is often why some businesses can stay in operation. I do not want him to lose the thought that there is a planned way in which to operate business rates, although it is a bit more confusing. It is wrong to consider that it is an urban model. We need a level of subsidy for rural businesses, otherwise they will go out of business. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees.

Steve Webb: The rural post offices that have survived in my constituency have benefited from business rate relief, as have small shops. In many ways, greater local discretion on such things enables local authorities to be more responsive to precisely those sorts of local needs, instead of there being a national system.

If there was a worry that it would be unacceptable to allow councils free rein to jack up the business rates as much as they wanted—and, perhaps, to keep council tax down as a result—what sort of safeguards could we have? Various options have been considered. The balance-of-funding review came up with something. One interesting suggestion is to link council tax increases to business rates increases. That would mean that councils would not be free to jack up the business rates just because businesses do not vote, and to freeze the council tax, because any decision about increasing business rates would have a consequent effect on the electorate—albeit that increases would be more fairly shared. I am not unsympathetic to that kind of idea. I do not in general like shackling local discretion, but if there is an anxiety that history has shown that total freedom has been misused, there might be at least a transitional need for some sort of link.

There might also be some mandatory consultation process with business, although I am slightly sceptical about that, because businesses have felt in the past in respect of business rates that they went to consultation meetings and then everything went through exactly as it did before. Therefore, I am not sure how one could enforce mandatory consultation that actually changed anything.

There could be intermediate options between having a national rate, as at present, and an entirely local rate. Getting rid of the inflation cap on the national rate would help to offset the imbalance between council tax and business rates. Some element of growth money could be retained locally—I will come on to that topic shortly—or there could be a national rate for large businesses, for consistency across the country, but a variable rate for small business. Therefore, various reform options could be considered.

What conclusion did the balance-of-funding review come to—other than that there needed to be another review, of course? One option was that local authorities might be allowed, at the margins, to keep some of the growth money; the local authority business growth incentive scheme was mentioned. I must admit that I had forgotten about that scheme until I did a bit of research. I remember sitting in the House in November 2002 and hearing the Chancellor talk about it. His pre-Budget report of that year stated that the Government intended to explore ways to build on local government reforms by allowing "local authorities to retain some or all of any increases in business rates revenue to spend on their own priorities."

I remember sitting in the House in November 2002 and thinking, "At last we have a local government finance reform that might benefit South Gloucestershire." Little did I know! The pre-Budget report went on to say:

"Under any proposals, the additional revenue would come from increases in the tax base generated by local authorities successfully encouraging growth, and not from increasing the tax on existing business."

In other words, this scheme was not going to be about local authorities putting up taxes; it was going to be about local authorities encouraging growth and keeping some of the fruits of growth. In November 2002, I thought, "It is great that this has been announced by the Chancellor. It probably needs to be announced another four times at six-monthly intervals, but then it will happen."

Nothing happened for rather a long time. Then, the following summer, we had a consultation paper on the scheme. It came up with various criteria that the scheme should adopt. The first was to give

"local authorities an incentive to maximise local economic growth".

Occasionally, I want to add the word "sustainable" to such phrases—but that subject is, perhaps, for another day. The second was "that the scheme should give local authorities additional revenues to spend on their own priorities".

We are all in favour of that. The next principle was "that the incentive should be consistent with Government aims for growth in all regions of the country and reductions in the persistent gap in performance between regions".

That is an interesting principle because—to stray slightly—part of the reason why we have such growth in South Gloucestershire is the imbalance in the national economy. Personally, I think that too much growth is being forced on an already overheated area, with some of the costs that we have been talking about. Another principle is "that the scheme should be as intelligible and transparent as possible."

That reference to "intelligible and transparent" is interesting.

After the consultation in the summer of 2003, another two years went by. In July 2005—more than two years later—the final details of the local authority business growth incentive scheme were produced, which I thought was great because, at last, councils were going to get to keep some of their business rate growth money. In July 2005, the Minister for Local Government explained how the scheme would work. The main aspects were summarised in the accompanying press release:

[Steve Webb]

"Business growth will be measured in terms of the increase in a local authority's rateable value during a calendar year."

That is a reasonable way of doing that. It also said:

"The starting point . . . will be their rateable value"

at the end of December 2004. Next, the press release went into local government finance mode:

"Each authority will have a 'floor'".

That is a target; this scheme is about giving local government more discretion, and the first thing the Government do is set a target. They say that each authority will have a "target level of rateable value growth that must be reached to gain from" the scheme. But it is not as simple as that: an authority will have a floor, which "will be the baseline minus a national adjustment factor".

Therefore, we have a target, a floor, a baseline and a national adjustment, despite the fact that this scheme is meant to give local authorities more control.

There is also a scaling factor:

"A scaling factor of 70 per cent. will be applied to all revenues gained above the floor to calculate the amount of revenue that can be retained locally."

However, there is a ceiling, which is "the maximum revenue that an authority can keep".

That

"will be based on a modified form of the Environmental, Protective and Cultural Services (EPCS) part of Formula Spending Share (FSS)."

We should remember that the criteria for that are that the scheme should be "intelligible and transparent". The press release states that that will be phased in as follows:

"The level of the ceilings for the first three years of the scheme will be 3 per cent., 6 per cent. and 9 per cent. respectively, of modified EPCS FSS."

In a sense, I do not care—if we get some money, I just do not care. The press release then goes on to mention "two-tier areas" and so forth.

The press release then includes a statement on which I would be grateful to hear the Minister's response, because I would like to know what it means for South Gloucestershire. It states:

"Authorities that fail to retain money under the scheme will be re-based, to give them a fair and meaningful challenge in the next year, and a new lower floor will be calculated, determined from their new starting point."

What does that mean for South Gloucestershire? In February 2006, the money was announced: 250 local authorities got money out of this scheme. It is precisely the sort of thing that I am talking about—growth, and local authorities keeping some of their business rates. Money was given to 250 authorities—the amount was about £100 million—but South Gloucestershire got nil. This is what I thought: how can a scheme be devised for fast-growing authorities to help them retain more of their business rates, and we get nothing?

I have come up with Webb's law of local government finance, which is that every reform of it produces the worst possible outcome for South Gloucestershire. I have discovered since I became an MP that that is an immutable law. When the Chancellor announced the scheme in November 2002, I could not conceive of any authority in the country failing to gain—and I thought that if any authority would gain, it would be mine.

I hope that the Minister can explain what happens now. I presume that this is what has happened: we have had year after year of rapid growth, but at the moment when that was measured, our growth had decelerated. I will not call for a retrospective business growth incentive scheme, because that would go against the transparency and coherence point, but I hope that Members are beginning to see where I am coming from. We have had years of rapid growth, with its associated costs, and yet the system has not reflected that. Now that South Gloucestershire has not qualified under this year's scheme, will it be easier for it to qualify next year—or not? I do not understand whether that will be the case.

I query the scheme—and that is not only because we did not get any money out of it. It feels like a classic case of people saying, "We've got the balance-of-funding review, and then we've got another review—the Lyons inquiry—so we can't make any decisions about anything, so we will just fiddle around the edge." This has all the hallmarks of the Chancellor having created yet another fiendishly complex scheme that has a whole set of bureaucracy—administration, central targets and so forth, which will no doubt need to be abolished once we have some sort of relocalisation—and I think that the philosophy behind it is very peculiar. What is it saying exactly? Is it saying that local authorities should grant more planning permissions for new businesses, so that they get to keep some of the business rates? That would be a strange incentive mechanism. I am not entirely sure what authorities are meant to do that they are not already doing. Local authorities promote local enterprise; what additional things are they supposed to do to try to generate extra money? What is the incentive mechanism? What is the scheme trying to incentivise? I am not clear on that.

Mr. Drew: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one way to cut through a lot of the problems would be to do what we are starting to do with housing development—although the Government have been taken there kicking and screaming—which is to consider an element of land value taxation? It should be put formally on the table that what is wrong with this country is that we have never taxed land fairly and effectively. That is as true for business as for housing development. The Government are on to something in considering a planning gain supplement, although they have not gone all the way. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government could do the same for business rates—that is, sweep them away and consider proper land value taxation?

Steve Webb: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a close follower of Liberal Democrat policy and manifestos. I have been incredibly restrained in not mentioning site value rating, but I feel that this is the moment to do so. If I were talking about a more wholesale reform of business rates, we would certainly advocate looking into the taxation of site values; but that is in the medium term. My priority, as the hon. Gentleman will gather, is to try to do something more immediate about the real financial crisis faced by local authorities—well, by my local authority.

So, is it just me? Are we talking about special pleading from one local authority? Actually, we are not: paragraph 160 of a 2003–04 report by the all-party Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister says, in the context of relocalising business rates, that "In the Committee's view it must be a priority to make a change in the balance of funding."

The Committee concludes:

"The Committee therefore recommends that the Government returns business rates to local authority control as soon as possible, but no later than 1 April 2006."

I know that the Department likes to follow the Select Committee's recommendations, so it has a busy month ahead if it is to meet that deadline.

We are not just talking about the special pleading of one local authority; the issue is bigger than that. It is about the balance of funding between central and local government, which has got out of kilter. An all-party Committee, representing all parts of the country, thought that that would be the right structural change. It so happens that, in my judgment, such a change would benefit my area, but there are also good conceptual arguments for it.

So where are we now? The Lyons review considered the same issues once again and, funnily enough, came up with many of the same answers as the previous review. Interestingly, Sir Michael Lyons said that not all businesses opposed the relocalisation of business rates. There are two reasons why some businesses actually supported it. First, some of them wanted local discretion for funding transport, road improvements and regeneration; I did not mention regeneration because it is not a particularly big issue in my area, but clearly it is in some parts of the country. Secondly, there is a feeling among businesses that links with local authorities have weakened since business rates became national, because there is no need for that dialogue, and that has tended to undermine those relationships. But still we are waiting.

In conclusion—I hope that I have not deprived anyone of the chance of contributing to the debate—if someone came to the issue cold, they might think, "Don't be ridiculous; you're talking about a prosperous area. It has plenty of money, and people there don't have any problems. Just leave it alone", but if they looked at the matter in a bit more detail, they would realise that things are not that simple. They would realise that jobs and prosperity are great, but come with an infrastructure cost that is not being met, and that every additional person who moves into South Gloucestershire is a net drain on its exchequer. That is a strange situation: the Government are setting up an incentive scheme to encourage local authorities to generate business growth, yet when the local authority gets business growth, it loses money. That cannot be right.

Sorting out South Gloucestershire's problem will be part of a bigger structural reform that, as the Select Committee said, has its own justifications. We should make the balance of funding more even, so it is not three quarters to one quarter, but half and half; that would be much better. We should try to have a system whereby local communities, and council tax payers who also wear other hats as employers, employees and customers of local businesses, can decide on the right balance for themselves. That has to be right. For too long, under successive Governments, there has been a drift towards central Government telling local government what to do. We should relocalise business rates, with appropriate adjustments for the imbalance of business rate revenue, but should then allow local authorities to change rates at the margin to reflect local priorities.

Perhaps I have made the odd comment that was not wholly appreciative of some Government schemes, so I will end on a note of consensus. All three parties represented here today are apparently in favour of localism. I am reliably informed that the new Conservative leader believes in localism. I do not know whether that is in the pamphlet that he is sending to Conservative party members, but most good things are, as far as I can see. I hope that he is in favour. The Government are the new localisers, I am told, and we are localisers, too, so there is every chance of all-party agreement on the issues that I raised. I hope to go back to south Gloucestershire at the end of the week with that £11 million to give back to the local community.

10.16 am

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) on raising the subject today and on securing this debate, but I caution him against making too many security arrangements for taking a cheque back with him at the end of the week. One always feels optimism about such matters, but it may be slightly too optimistic to hope that the Government will turn the matter around in that space of time.

It is clear that the issue is of great importance to the community in South Gloucestershire, and the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend are shared by businesses, residents and councils the length and breadth of the country. It is widely accepted that the overall system of local government finance is somewhat discredited, to say the least. After all, if there was no fundamental problem with the system, the Government would not have set up the wide-ranging Lyons review, and it would not have taken so long for that review to report to Parliament. Our debate has highlighted one of the key reasons why the system is in crisis: the lack of control and accountability for the financing of local services.

The fact that local communities and their elected representatives do not determine their own fate when it comes to funding for local services is a major factor in the public's lack of confidence in local democracy as a whole, and business rates are a shining example of the kind of centralism that stifles much local decision-making. It always seemed strange to me, in the three years when I served as council leader in Stockport, that we were obliged—by law, I believe—to consult the business community when formulating annual budgets, yet whatever was said, and however much the council listened, we could alter neither the rate nor the total amount that we raised from it. That was one of the more bizarre aspects of an already strange system.

There are a number of arguments for retaining the status quo—frankly, there always are—but I have not seen any compelling evidence that shows conclusively that businesses would move out of high-rate areas into lower-rate ones. That did not happen when the rates were localised, and I do not believe that it would happen now. Neither do I believe that councils are itching to increase local taxation. In fact, according to the Audit Commission, the steep increases in council tax since 1997 have largely been caused by the gearing and the central control of the system that we are debating. The attitude seems to be that Government believe that local matters are best dealt with from an office in Whitehall, and that denigrates our democratic system.

[Mark Hunter]

I find it patronising, at best, to be told that democratically elected representatives are somehow unworthy of, or not to be trusted with, tax-raising powers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon said, local government—I am sure that the Minister will agree—has moved on since the days when Militant Tendency occupied Liverpool city hall, and when councillors might be tempted to let rip with such powers. These days there is a much more professional and—dare I say it?—business-like approach in town halls throughout the country, where local authorities, including the Liberal Democrat one in Liverpool, work closely and constructively with their partners in the commercial sector. Anyway, as we all know, this Government are not afraid to cap.

A new system of localised business rates could not be implemented overnight. Transitional arrangements could be put in place to offer assurances to businesses. For example, we could start by localising only part of the rate, with the other part remaining linked to inflation, or maintain the national system for large businesses at least in the short term.

Businesses are an integral part of their community and it would be doing a disservice to local representatives to suggest that they would abuse any powers in this area. Businesses would then have a much greater stake in their local authority. Safeguards can be applied to the system, by linking business rate levels to council tax increases, for example, if that is required, once the two systems have converged. By localising rates in this way, we would be restoring accountability to the system and encouraging responsibility.

The fact is that my party is asking not for more but for fairer taxation. Recent trends mean that the burden of local authority finance has been shifting away from businesses to council tax payers, and it falls disproportionately on those in our community who are least equipped to pay it. It is not just that businesses in South Gloucestershire are being ripped off; what really rankles is the fact that pensioners and people on low and fixed incomes are paying for that.

Mr. Pickles: I am sorry to say that I am not entirely following the hon. Gentleman's argument. Although he was saying that his party was not looking to increase taxation, the hon. Member for Northavon has just said, very bravely, that an additional sum would have to be added to the pot to take care of equalisation. That has to come from somewhere and it is obvious that it is coming from the Government. Is the hon. Gentleman perhaps not entirely right when he suggests that he is not looking to increase taxation?

Mark Hunter: I thank the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) for his intervention, but my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon has already indicated that these issues can be dealt with via the equalisation mechanism, which would be necessary. In any event, if the point of what I am trying to put across today is not clear by the end of my remarks, I should be happy to converse further with the hon. Gentleman.

It rankles with us that people on low and fixed incomes are paying for all this. On a very limited scale, raising money from businesses at a local level, through business improvement districts, has proved successful and I do not see why those successes cannot be repeated more widely.

There is a risk involved in changing a policy like this, but I believe the Government should be bold in handing powers back to local authorities. We have heard plenty of rhetoric from Ministers about the localism agenda and empowering communities, but that is about as far as it has gone. Local government has seen creeping centralisation for far too long and, as a result of that centralisation and the gearing effect, council tax for the vast majority of people is spiralling.

I hope that when Lyons finally reports, he will take on board views like the ones expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon this morning, because after all, one of his key tasks is to restore confidence in the system of local government finance, and reallocating business rates to local councils would be an excellent place to start.

10.23 am

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): Mrs. Humble, this is the first time that I have served under your chairmanship. It is always slightly unnerving to discover a member of one's own intake in such an august position, but I shall do my best to keep my side up.

It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb). I spent part of my life listening to his dissertations in various Committees. I had not realised, until now, how much I missed his input and I am pleased to have this additional fix. It is a pleasure to listen to the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter). I commend his criticism and his urging the Government to be bold in returning powers to local authorities.

One of the highlights of my recess was listening to the Today programme, when the Minister of Communities and Local Government introduced double devolution. It was immensely interesting to hear that, as he moved from Today to The World at One and PM, the right hon. Gentleman was faced with the same question—"Which powers are the Government proposing to devolve to local authorities?"—which touches on local government finance and the business rate. I did not have the opportunity to listen to The World Tonight, but by the end of PM, he was not capable of giving a single example. I suppose that if one is in charge of such immense powers, it is sometimes difficult to let go.

I thought that the hon. Member for Northavon was courageous—so much so that I am sure his statements will appear in numerous copies of In Touch—when talking about redistribution under his proposals. At one point, I thought that he was suggesting that an additional sum of money was to be put in the pot by the Government to take care of the equalisation problem. However, the hon. Member for Cheadle assured me that that was not the case, so it must be the reverse; we must be dealing with a set sum.

The hon. Gentleman talked about transitional relief, which must mean that net recipients will receive less and there will, perhaps, need to be a cushioning effect—perhaps a floor—which he criticised so regularly in relation to additional economic growth. There must be a floor, which means that over a period of years the poorer parts of the country will receive less financial help. That is a brave statement, particularly when—I am looking at the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—the hon. Gentleman seems to be targeting Labour seats. The red rose may be featuring in this particular thing. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman is a great man, and if we can get his words around the nation, so much the better.

I return for a moment to what the hon. Gentleman was saying with regard to local authorities being the beneficiaries of new business. He was right to say that the comprehensive performance assessment form is a little bit complex and is difficult to fill in, but he has to understand that there is a problem of management that does not just relate to new economic growth, which is almost exactly mirrored in the CPA regime. South Gloucestershire has almost certainly lost out where a number of authorities lose out: it is impossible in the forms to put the information in any kind of context.

The hon. Member for Northavon talks about his local authority having a process of growth, which has not been taken into account when it arrives at a particular point. One often sees that in the CPA forms, because one cannot work out precisely where an authority has come from in order to give the appropriate rating. That can be done within the form to assess the economic growth; however, although the direction of travel can be worked out, the speed cannot. If South Gloucestershire is given another base, it would probably take three or four times before that captures what is happening, by which time the process would have moved on again. There is a legitimate criticism to be made in respect of that.

The hon. Members for Cheadle and for Northavon were a bit sniffy about the business rates consultation. I am old enough to remember the old system. I participated in the last rates consultation when business rates were localised, and I participated in the first one thereafter. In the last one, everyone demanded a lower increase in the business rate and in the next one they demanded a higher increase in the domestic rates. It was an interesting experience.

I think that what divides the good authorities from the bad is whether they treat the rates consultation meeting as a straightforward decision about how much to put up the council tax. The good ones treat it almost like a "state of the nation"; they try to work closely with their business communities, they lay out their plans and the ways in which they want to take the authority forward and consider ways of helping local business. As the hon. Members for Northavon and for Cheadle said, no serious local authority can expect to be able to offer prosperity to its citizens unless it works closely with the business community.

I was kind of interested—or rather, I was beyond interested; I was fascinated beyond belief—by the lack of commitment to site value rating. It took a prompting from the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) to elicit from the hon. Member for Northavon some general support for site value rating. I think it would be fair to say that unless the balance of funding is properly addressed, any problems in our current financial system will almost certainly be exaggerated. Firms in an area where land values are higher, such as local high streets, will end up with much larger tax bills, which will put many firms out of business and encourage new development on cheaper greenfield sites. I see the Minister nodding. It will also mean that two pieces of land of the same size in the same area will be taxed equally, irrespective of the use to which they are put. So, for example, a garage development would pay the same as a next-door office block of the same floor size. That does not strike me as terribly sensible.

I must commend to the House the comments of the Liberal Democrat housing spokesman in 2002—I have had a temporary lapse and cannot remember his constituency—who said:

"Such a tax would raise significant sums"

and that it would be a tax on regeneration and development. That does not strike me as a terribly good thing. He added:

"Such a tax would also end windfall gains to which people contribute nothing."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 24 July 2002; Vol. 389, c. 277WH.]

I am not entirely sure that that is an avenue that I want to go down, because I do not particularly want to tax regeneration and redevelopment.

Steve Webb: I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) that the hon. Gentleman was referring to.

Mr. Pickles: It was indeed.

Steve Webb: The hon. Gentleman wanted to spoil the denouement of my thriller, and I want to do the same to his: will he, at the end of his speech, say that he is for or against the re-localisation of business rates?

Mr. Pickles: I have decided now that, as in a great movie, there is an arc: a first part, a middle, and a final section. I am still towards the middle, but to keep everyone on their toes, I shall say that towards the end I shall make an announcement.

The hon. Member for Northavon mentioned being a little uncertain about why the amount collected in business rates had gone up. No doubt he was very clear in his mind about the Government's undertaking, in statements to Parliament, that the business rates would be revenue-neutral. That clearly has not been the case, as the hon. Gentleman, I think, hinted. There has been a 7.4 per cent. increase in real terms, in the process of revaluation of the business rate. The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that that is quite an important part of business expenditure. In fact, the business rate is the third largest sum that a local business must put out, after wages and rent. It is to be regretted that such a rapid change—particularly in areas that have enjoyed considerable economic growth since the last revaluation—was not cushioned with a subsidy from central Government, as has been normal. Business rates have been higher this year for medium and large firms.

[Mr. Pickles]

We spoke a while ago about complexity with reference to councils' ability to adjust and claim for additional economic growth. All those problems have been mirrored in the low take-up of small business relief; it is suggested that local firms are losing out on half of that. As a result, to finance the transitional relief, the Government have capped the reductions in bills on properties where revalued rateable values have fallen. That is the so-called downward phasing. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors has said that some firms will be paying almost 50 per cent. more than their true liability and that "it is absurd that those whose businesses have suffered and whose rates bills should be reducing, find they have to pay a financial penalty to protect what are usually the more successful businesses from increases in rates bills."

It is a shame that the small business relief is not automatic. Firms must fill in forms to claim it, discouraging take-up, but the largest multiplier will still automatically be levied on medium and large firms, irrespective of the take-up of small firms. Like the means-testing of benefits, on which the hon. Member for Northavon is a considerable expert, the paperwork will discourage many small businesses from applying. The Government figures reveal that almost half of all small businesses have not anticipated the relief.

We are now moving into the final phase of the arc that I described. I can understand why all this fuss was created. I look back to the time when I was a council leader. There were firms in local authority areas not far from the one that I represented—Bradford—where firms were so desperate, because of the penal nature of the taxation, that they went to the extraordinary length of removing roofs from factories to avoid it. If that had happened in an authority on which I was a representative, I should have found it deeply shaming.

There was a feeling that the business rates could be squeezed until the pips squeaked. That proved not to be so.I have always felt that the recession that we faced in the steel and textile towns of the north of England was made quicker and deeper by what happened. It was not the cause, because things were going against a trend, but there comes a time when people ask, "Shall we try and go on for a little longer, in case there is an upturn?" and decisions are taken. However, that is ancient history. I do not think that there are many authorities in the country, regardless of political control, that would even contemplate that. We have seen the effects and they are not particularly pretty.

My party is considering these matters, and I have an official statement to make on its behalf. It is the kind of thing that one reads on the way home, thinking, "This will go down quite well":

"Conservatives would not necessarily oppose schemes that will give local councils a direct financial incentive to boost economic activity in the area but would avoid higher taxation."

By Jove, I cannot believe it—whoever wrote that must have a bonus! However, it says nothing. My party is considering the issue, but speaking as an individual, not as a spokesman for my great and glorious party, I think that the day when we repatriate business rates cannot come soon enough. Indeed, there are good and solid economic reasons for repatriating them, but I am not entirely sure that I want to go down the line suggested by the hon. Member for Northavon, because I do not really want to rob the poor.

Before we can make a final decision on this hard issue, we must be clear in our minds about the effect that the balance of funding has on the multiplier. The biggest issue—whether we are talking about business rates, local income tax or council tax—is always resource equalisation. We clearly cannot have the poorest part of the country being starved of resources and the richest part retaining everything, although, in truth, I cannot imagine any political party allowing that to happen, because down that route would lie madness.

So, the short answer, as we dip towards the end of the arc of the great novel of business rates, is that my party is, as hon. Members can imagine, looking at the issue quite closely. It is one of the great issues on which we all, regardless of party, must make a decision. Although my party is not, at the moment, opposed to returning business rates, it is not saying yes. On the other hand, I am saying yes.

10.42 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): Mrs. Humble, it is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, and I associate myself with the ever-courteous remarks of the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) in that regard. I congratulate the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) on securing the debate and particularly on his success in persuading so many colleagues to stay away and allow him the opportunity fully to develop his position and his argument. The debate provides a useful opportunity to discuss the allocation of business rates generally and in the 2006–07 and 2007–08 settlements.

The hon. Member for Northavon is particularly concerned that local authorities are unable to keep the business rates that they collect, and I sense that the debate is part of the campaign that he has mounted to return business rates to local authorities, among his other objectives. It was interesting that, speaking for himself, the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar agreed with the hon. Member for Northavon, but that he did not quite agree with him when he spoke for the Conservative party. That was quite an interesting balancing act.

I shall try to outline the Government's position and their view of the status quo, as well as respond to several of the points that have been raised and set out the way forward. However, in contrast to the hon. Members for Northavon and for Brentwood and Ongar, my conclusion will be no surprise when I arrive at it in a few minutes' time.

In 2006–07, for the first time, we have announced two-year grant allocations for every local authority in England. We have put a premium on the stability and predictability of funding, so that councils can plan ahead for better service delivery. The first full three-year settlement will be introduced alongside the next spending round. In the interests of further stability, we have made grant floors a permanent part of the grant distribution system. Floors guarantee a minimum year-on-year grant increase for all authorities.

South Gloucestershire has benefited from the extra money that we have invested in local services in recent years. For the 10-year period to 2007–08, we have been able to provide South Gloucestershire district council with an average annual increase in general grant of 5.7 per cent. in cash terms.

The business rates system makes a significant contribution to the funding of local authorities. However, as far as local authorities are concerned, there is no correlation between the business rate that is collected in their areas and the business rate that is allocated to them. In fact, most authorities are net gainers, benefiting from the large business rate contribution from the City of London, Westminster and some other large authorities, as the hon. Member for Northavon acknowledged

Business rates help support all tiers of local government in an area. For the South Gloucestershire area, that means that business rates are provided for South Gloucestershire district council, Avon fire and rescue authority and the Avon and Somerset police authority.

Before 2006–07, business rates were distributed to authorities on a pound-per-head basis. From 2006–07, they will be distributed under the same formula as revenue support grant.

It is important to consider not just the distribution of the redistributed business rates but revenue support grant and principal formula police grant. We refer to those three elements collectively as formula grant. From 2006–07, the Government have introduced a new system to distribute formula grant. Under that system, the distribution of formula grant is determined wholly by four elements: relative needs amount, the relative resource amount, the central allocation—an amount per head—and the floor damping scheme.

The relative needs and resource elements should be broadly familiar to hon. Members because the system has long contained formulaic estimates of relative need and relative ability to raise council tax. The central allocation makes explicit what was always implicit in the system—that after taking account of differences in relative needs and resources, some grant is allocated on a per-capita basis. Finally, to ensure that each authority gets a reasonable increase in grant, the Government set a guaranteed minimum percentage increase in grant each year—the floor. The cost of that is met by scaling back grant increases above the floor.

Once we have worked out an authority's allocation of formula grant, we need to work out how much of each of the elements that make up formula grant an authority receives. We do that as follows. First, we subtract the amount of principal formula police grant, if any, that an authority receives from its formula grant. We then split the remainder into revenue support grant and redistributed business rates, in proportion to the England totals of those elements.

As I explained, every local authority receives a proportion of the redistributed business rates. So in the South Gloucestershire area, the result of all those calculations is that the district council will receive £41.016 million in redistributed business rates in 2006–07, Avon fire and rescue authority will receive £19.904 million and Avon and Somerset police authority will receive £52.761 million.

Steve Webb: I am grateful to the Minister and I am following the detail closely, but will he consider the sentence that he has just said? He said that South Gloucestershire would get £41 million back from the business rates, but South Gloucestershire businesses paid £92 million in business rates this year. I have been talking about a gap of £10 million or £11 million hitherto. Is the Minister saying that, from next year, because the reallocation is done on a different basis, there will be a huge gap between the local business rates that are paid and received back?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I shall discuss what is going to happen when I seek to clarify the issue of the local authority business growth incentive, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

I was going to say that the hon. Gentleman had based much of his speech on the amount of business rates collected by South Gloucestershire and the amount of redistributed business rates that it received. However, I was also going to say that, if we look at the figures for 2004–05, we see that whereas South Gloucestershire businesses contributed just over £84 million to the pool, South Gloucestershire received £68.796 million in redistributed business grants. As the hon. Gentleman says, there was a differential, but South Gloucestershire residents also benefited from the amount of business rates provided for the fire and rescue and the police authority that cover their area. Avon fire and rescue authority received more than £9 million and Avon and Somerset police authority received more than £20 million. It is therefore true that South Gloucestershire is a net contributor of business rates to the pool, but the amount is perhaps not as much as hon. Members may have been led to believe.

The hon. Member for Northavon described the local authority business growth incentive scheme very accurately and fully. The first grants, totalling £110 million, have been paid to authorities in 2005–06. As he said, South Gloucestershire received no grant under the scheme in that period. An evaluation of the first year of the scheme is under way and will determine what changes could be made to improve the scheme's effectiveness. At this time, therefore, there is no precise answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

It is right that local businesses should contribute to the funding of local authorities. It is also right that we should use the grant in the settlement, including redistributed business rates, to ensure that all councils are able to set realistic council tax increases. The most important factor in that is the stability and predictability of Government grant. As I have said previously, we ensure that every authority receives at a least a minimum percentage increase above the previous year's formula grant, after adjusting for changes in funding and function.

Under the Conservative Government, if the calculation of an authority's grant was below the level of the previous years, that authority had to live with it.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

Since 1999–2000, the Government have ensured that every local authority receives at least the same amount of grant as the previous year, on a like-for-like basis. This year we have also provided authorities with grant allocations for two years. That means that they can take both year's grant settlements into account for their medium-term planning.

I started by saying that the issue was complicated. As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, we have been considering the local government financing system for some time. The arguments that he has put forward in favour of a re-localisation of business grants are not new. In 2004, the balance-of-funding review acknowledged that re-localisation of business rates could give councils greater incentives to promote economic development and improve links with businesses. However, it also noted that businesses had serious concerns, including risks to productivity and competitiveness. They argued that the proposal would be likely to harm relationships between business and local government. The report noted that re-localisation of business rates was not an easy option and that further work would be required.

Following that review, the Government established an independent inquiry under Sir Michael Lyons to consider the case for changes to the system of local government funding, and to report and make recommendations by the end of 2005. As part of that inquiry, he was asked to assess the case for giving local authorities more flexibility to raise additional revenue, and to analyse options for shifting the balance of funding, including, among others, the reform of business rates.

In September 2005, the Government agreed with Sir Michael to extend his inquiry so that it could consider issues relating to the wider functions of local government and its future role, as well as, and prior to, making recommendations on local government funding. Sir Michael will produce his final report at the end of 2006, which will contribute to the comprehensive spending review of 2007.

The extension to Sir Michael's inquiry will enable us to make well-informed decisions on local government finance. We believe that we should make changes to local government funding only when we have a clear and complete understanding of what we want local government to do. That understanding must be shared not only by central and local government but by all those who help to deliver services and, most important, by the people whom they serve—the general public. In short, we must settle function before funding.

Some of the arguments regarding business rates have been helpfully set out in Sir Michael's interim report and consultation paper, which was published on 15 December 2005. The Government welcome that publication as a useful contribution to the debate on the future role and function of local government and the way it is funded; however, it is an interim report, not a final one. Sir Michael has not come to firm conclusions, but has set out some of his thinking to date and begun an important process of consultation on the role and function of local government.

In his interim report, Sir Michael sets out a number of the arguments that have been made to him about whether local authorities should have a role in the setting of business rates and whether business rates should be re-localised. He notes that arguments have been made previously, not least to the balance-of-funding review, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, about the contribution that the re-localisation of business rates could make to changing the balance of funding. Local government has supported that position for some time, although as Sir Michael notes, it too recognises that business rates play an important role in the equalisation system for supporting services across the country. As such, they could not be wholly retained locally without significant other reforms.

Sir Michael also notes that there are arguments against re-localisation, as evidenced by the representations from, among others, the CBI and the British Chambers of Commerce. They have expressed concern that local control of business rates would make tax bills less predictable and could lead to an increase in the taxes paid by business. It is clear from Sir Michael's interim report that there is a range of views on the subject. Sir Michael confirms that he > "will continue to explore the interactions between business and local government in many of the areas my remit covers. This will include further consideration of how changes to business rates could improve the ability of, and incentives on, local authorities to support and promote economic development, including looking at current exemptions and discounts."

We have always made it clear that there are difficult decisions to be taken on local government funding. That is why it is important to take the time to get them right. Any substantial reform has to be set firmly within the wider context of a clear, shared understanding of the role of local government. We will make no decisions on the re-localisation of business rates or on any funding issues within Sir Michael's remit until we have received and considered his final report, which is due at the end of this year.

With the extension of Sir Michael's remit, there is now an opportunity to promote a greater understanding of local government among the public. We encourage all concerned to contribute to the next phase of Sir Michael's inquiry so that he can offer the best possible advice in his final report. In this way, we are confident that Sir Michael's work will provide the platform for fundamental and lasting reform.

This debate is an example of the interest in the funding of local government, and I am grateful for the opportunity that it has provided to hon. Members to air their views, including, so extensively, the hon. Member for Northavon. Sir Michael is also keen to see a wide-ranging debate on the issues relating to his inquiry. I encourage hon. Members to ensure that he is made aware of their views so that he can take them into account.

Finally, I agree with the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) that, sadly, there will not be a cheque in the post before Friday. However, Sir Michael will bring forward proposals in due course that I hope will command general support.

10.56 am

Sitting suspended until Eleven o'clock.

Industrial Relations

11 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): First, I declare my interest as chair of the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers parliamentary group as set out in the Register of Members' Interests.

I am grateful to be able to raise the important issue of industrial relations within the railways industry. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), will agree that the men and women who work on our railways perform a magnificent job in helping to keep Britain moving. It is a 24-hours-a-day, seven-days-a-week, 365-days-a-year task. Railway workers know better than anyone that for the railways to work effectively, there has to be co-operation from all involved: the cleaners, railway workshop grades, train maintenance staff, track workers, catering staff, signal technicians, office staff, call-centre operatives, station revenue protection staff, signal operators, guards and drivers. They all work together in all hours and, sometimes, appalling conditions, to ensure that our trains keep running. In fact, prior to privatisation, British Rail's work force were judged the most productive of any rail service in Europe. A recent Catalyst study confirmed the efficiency of the service and the contribution that the work force make to that.

Railway workers continue to do a brilliant job, despite having to pick up the pieces of the disastrous privatisation undertaken by the last Conservative Government. Privatisation not only crippled our railway system, but saw the privateers make huge redundancies and attack wages and conditions so that the income of the vast majority of railway workers even fell behind average earnings during the period of privatisation. Although our rail staff remain in the private sector, they are magnificent examples of public servants. They retain the ethos and commitment of the public service, and often have to work in severe conditions; for example, there has been a huge increase in staff assaults, and they now find themselves on the front line of a risk of terrorist attacks.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister—indeed, all Members of the House—will agree that our rail staff should be treated fairly and with respect, and that they deserve a fair framework for industrial relations. I hope that he will reassure them today that the Government share those aspirations and are willing to act to achieve a fair framework for industrial relations in the modern railway industry.

I shall highlight three areas of concern: the role of the Association of Train Operating Companies in industrial relations; the role of the Government in industrial relations; and the industrial relations problem of the future of the railways pension scheme. The purpose of ATOC, as it is known in the industry, is a mystery to me and many of my colleagues. What is it? I checked its website, and it is not a statutory body but a voluntary organisation whose role is to serve as "the voice of the passenger railway".

The website goes on to say that the association

"represents train companies to the government, regulatory bodies, the media and other opinion formers on transport policy issues."

That sounds exceptionally good.

Members of ATOC—the TOCs, or train operating companies—are paid handsomely for their work. Indeed, according to a recent study by Professor Jean Shaoul of the university of Manchester, the combined total income of TOCs rose by 26 per cent. from £4.8 billion in 1997 to £5.8 billion in 2003.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend describes an organisation, ATOC, that seems to have worthy aims. Will he tell the House how frequently ATOC has met the railway trade unions to discuss issues of common concern, such as those that he has mentioned: training, pensions, and staff assaults? Would not that be a worthwhile forum in which to resolve some of these problems?

John McDonnell: The answer is never. That is the principal point that I wish to make about the role of the association, because train operators have been subsidised with never less than £1 billion a year—indeed, in 2003–04 the amount reached £1.8 billion—all of which is funded by the taxpayer. They have made profits of £1 billion, yet without the subsidy, train operators as a whole would have made a loss every year. With such generous public support, therefore, the Government should be keen on train operators showing a bit of commitment to social partnership by at least meeting the unions.

Mr. George Galloway (Bethnal Green and Bow) (Respect): Will my hon. Friend confirm that the taxpayer is subsiding private train operators between two and three times as much as the taxpayer subsidised British Rail before privatisation?

John McDonnell: I welcome that intervention, and refer back to the Catalyst report, which demonstrated the driving down of public interest from the Government and the public support for British Rail. Even in those circumstances in which there was less public subsidy being provided, the Catalyst report, for which transport experts and economists were independently consulted, judged that British Rail was one of the most productive and efficient systems in Europe.

Since then, privatisation has resulted in more and more public subsidy being poured into the private sector, which has been creamed off in profits for over a decade. That is the point. With such generous public subsidies, one would expect, and the Government should expect, ATOC at least to show a bit of commitment to social partnership. ATOC regularly meets the Government and other stakeholders in the industry, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, it does not meet the representatives of staff—the rail unions. Indeed, it has refused to meet the unions to discuss anything, not only industrial relations.

We know—there has been evidence of this in previous debates—that there has been a continued rise in staff assaults on the railways. Many Members, particularly in London, have participated in the safer stations campaign and have called for improvements to protect passengers and staff, but that does not seem to matter to

[John McDonnell]

ATOC. It does not see any benefit in meeting the rail unions to discuss an industry-wide approach to this problem; it simply refuses to meet the unions to address this basic issue.

David Taylor: On a point that links to the core of the debate, does my hon. Friend hope that ATOC will resist the apparent suggestions for the hiving off of the British Tranport police, who tackle staff assaults and are tooled up to improve the record in that respect?

John McDonnell: I concur with my hon. Friend's sentiments; this is another issue on which one would expect ATOC to meet the rail unions to discuss and place on an agenda. If we are to discuss the safety and security of staff and passengers on the railway system, one would expect ATOC to come to the table with the unions, but it does not meet on anything. We all agree that there is a need to plan and develop industry-wide training and skills. Does ATOC discuss that with the unions? Forget it; ATOC was not interested when an approach was made by the unions. There is a growing crisis with railway pensions, which I shall discuss later. That is a key issue for all concerned—employers and employees—but ATOC would rather not talk to the unions about that either.

Members will find it astonishing that ATOC will not agree even to meet the unions to discuss what could literally be matters of life and death. After the appalling terrorist attacks on London, the Mayor, Ken Livingstone, rightly had discussions with the railway unions on future safety and security matters on London Underground. All sides thought that those talks were productive and helpful in developing our response to terrorist attack.

Those discussions throw into sharp relief the fact that there is no forum for similar discussions with the train operators. The unions have sought meetings with employers through ATOC to discuss improved transport security following the terrorist attacks, but ATOC, which receives billions in public subsidy from the Government, still refuses to meet the unions even to discuss that basic issue. That is unacceptable. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister agrees that that cannot be allowed to continue. As he knows, we have already had a meeting on this issue. The rail unions and the TUC have also had meetings with the Government to try to sort out the matter. Can he assure me that the Government will now intervene and ensure that there will at least be a dialogue between the rail unions and ATOC? The unions stand ready and willing to attend a meeting with ATOC, wherever and whenever that can be arranged, to discuss these critical issues, and we are asking the Government to intervene if ATOC refuses. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give that assurance because we know that the Government take an active interest in railway industrial relations.

That takes me to my second point.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Before the hon. Gentleman moves on to his second point, will he clarify the extent to which he thinks dialogue should take place between ATOC and the rail unions? Does he believe it should include pay, pensions, which he mentioned, and terms and conditions?

John McDonnell: I think that there is an opportunity now to establish a framework in which all matters of common interest to employers and employees in the railway industry can be placed on the table. That should start with a discussion about conditions and the future of the industry. There is an opportunity to return to a co-operative relationship on wages negotiations to avoid the multiplicity of negotiations that take place at present. It will be for both sides to decide how they go forward.

The key issue is to get people around the table. If we can get employers and unions around the table to discuss some of the basic planning of the industry's future—for example, safety, security and response to terrorist attacks—that would engender the opportunity to lead on to other matters by mutual agreement. The issue is the principle of the employer talking to employees and union representatives about these critical matters.

The Government have a role to play. If we are to seek a partnership in this industry, as we seek it in every other industry, there is an onus on the Government to persuade ATOC to come to the table and not to have a stand-off or to be unco-operatively belligerent to basic discussions and dialogue with the industry.

There is also the role of the Government. The Government's role in industrial relations in the railway industry at present is unwise, and even worse than unwise. It is unnecessary and, to put it bluntly, can be seen as unfairly interventionist on the side of employers rather than the unions. It is not a balanced approach. Many in the industry and certainly many railway workers believe that the Government in key instances are letting them down.

The matter needs to be explained because most people find the Government's role unbelievable. I presume that the Government, following heavy lobbying from the private train operators and our mysterious friends in ATOC, have decided in their wisdom to retain powers used by the now defunct Strategic Rail Authority. Those powers allow the Secretary of State for Transport to intervene directly in industrial relations within the industry.

First, the Government can veto pay and conditions agreements between the rail unions and private train operating companies. Secondly, the Government can waive penalty payments incurred by private train operating companies involved in industrial disputes. Thirdly, the Government can provide compensation—this is staggering, and I do not know of any other example in any other industry, public or privatised—to private train operating companies that have lost revenue through involvement in industrial disputes. In other words, on top of the billions of pounds of subsidy and profit already paid to private train operators, it is now Government policy to bankroll private train operating companies in their disputes with the rail unions. That is subsidising a subsidy. It is subsidising industrial relations failure on behalf of employers.

Mr. Galloway: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene again in his admirable speech. I congratulate him on obtaining this debate because it is timely and important.

The first time that I met the Secretary of State for Transport, 31 years ago, he was pressing Trotskyite tracts on bewildered railwaymen at Waverley station in Edinburgh. He metamorphosed, as have so many new Labour Ministers, into a man applying the lash to militant trade unionists, as he now sees them, in the railway industry. That was unbelievable enough, but my hon. Friend has just told the Chamber that despite taxpayers providing subsidies of between two and three times the amount of those previously provided to British Rail, the Association of Train Operating Companies has now resuscitated a power that would allow it to compensate maverick employers who will not meet their employees for the failure of their industrial relations strategy. Perhaps he will repeat what he said so that the Chamber can be sure of what he said. Can it really be true, even of this Government?

John McDonnell: There is a Trotskyist analysis of how we have arrived here, but we can talk about that later.

If the left was demanding a Labour Government to subsidise unions in disputes, my hon. Friend and I would describe it as a transitional demand. That is the ludicrousness of what is going on. If we told the Government that we expected them to subsidise unions and to pay them so that there is no loss to the work force when they go on strike, there would be uproar in the Daily Mail and The Sun would run pictures of my hon. Friend the Minister—

David Taylor: Rightly so.

John McDonnell: Rightly so for its readership. My hon. Friend would be called Red—

David Taylor: Red Twigg.

John McDonnell: When the issue is explained to people, they feel disbelief that a Labour Government should subsidise employers in dispute so that they lose nothing in that dispute. Many of us were shop stewards before coming to the House and it beggars belief that that is happening. In practical terms, the reality is that that provokes and prolongs disputes because there is no loss to the employer.

Tom Brake: The hon. Gentleman clearly objects to subsidies, but does he believe that there are cases—for example, 7/7, when I understand that train operating companies received a subsidy—when the use of Government money is appropriate?

John McDonnell: What I resent is not subsidies to the railway industry, but subsidies being creamed off into profit by the private sector. In addition, I resent subsidies being used in industrial disputes to strengthen the hand of employers to achieve their objectives in those disputes. If there is to be a level playing field, it should be level for industrial relations. Otherwise, industrial relations in the railway industry are soured rather than having a proper climate and framework.

I shall give some examples. Richard Branson of Virgin Trains and Brian Souter of Stagecoach can expect payouts from a Labour Government whenever they take on a rail union. That is beyond belief. Not only is it obviously wrong, it is an unprecedented and dangerous departure from existing policy on private sector industrial relations. It could have widespread implications beyond the confines of the railway industry. Where will the Government next intervene to prop up multi-million-pound private companies in their battles against the unions?

What about the cost of that ill-conceived policy? In answer to a parliamentary question on 14 March 2005, I was told that the Strategic Rail Authority has paid a staggering £23 million to compensate private operating companies for revenue losses during strike action between March 2003 and November 2004. That £23 million could have provided investment in the rail service.

David Taylor: Can my hon. Friend give any examples of how using taxpayers' money in this way has prevented emerging disputes or has improved industrial relations in the transport sector?

John McDonnell: I would welcome the Minister giving an example, if he can find one, of where else this policy operates in government or elsewhere. I know of no other example.

The sum of £23 million may not sound a great deal, but it could be used, for example, to build a new secondary school or refurbish a primary school, or it could be used to invest in a medical centre, but it goes straight into the profits of private operating companies to enable them to defeat a union that possibly has a legitimate case for industrial action—one would have to judge each case individually—that, in normal circumstances, would have been resolved through negotiation but is prolonged as a result of Government intervention.

David Taylor: It would pay for a thousand graduate teachers.

John McDonnell: My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position that the money would pay for a thousand graduate teachers. Instead, it is pocketed by Branson, Souter and others in ATOC.

During the same period, according to a study by Professor Shaoul of the university of Manchester, private train operators received more than £1.5 billion in public subsidy and made profits of £200 million. That is incredible, and it is important that we get it on the record, as the average person in the street would not believe what the Government do to prop up the industry and employers who want to provoke industrial relations disputes. This is an astonishing abuse of public funds, and there must be further proper scrutiny of the policy.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): In the interest of putting things on the record, does my hon. Friend have any additional information about how the £23 million was distributed among the companies that received it?

John McDonnell: That is one of the questions that I would like to ask the Minister. The answer should be placed on the record, as it is important that when the travelling public step on their train they know how much the train operating company receives from the Government to prop up any industrial action that it may wish to provoke.

[John McDonnell]

Mr. Galloway: I do not know when such payments began—I missed that part of my hon. Friend's comments—but I wonder whether they helped subsidise Brian Souter's vicious, fascistic, anti-Government campaign on clause 28, which may have had a different number in Scotland. Using money from his business, this Brian Souter launched a blistering, homophobic, bigoted and prejudiced campaign against the Government who gave him millions of pounds.

John McDonnell: Strange bedfellows on the overnight sleeper to Scotland—that is all that I can say.

On the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson), I have some information in respect of Scotland. A written reply to a parliamentary question from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) in May 2003—that was during the period of the Strategic Rail Authority—states that "the Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) has made payments of £12.65 million to National Express in respect of revenue loss by ScotRail arising from industrial action."—[Official Report, 15 May 2003; Vol. 405, c. 340W.]

That is a matter for the Scottish Executive, of course, but that is how much was paid out to one company under the SRA.

What bewildered Members of this House is that, on the demise of the SRA, the Government took those powers to themselves, when they could so easily have stepped back at that stage, and declined to receive such powers or to engage in the continued subsidy of industrial relations provocations by employers.

I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Minister some questions so that we can put the matter on the record. I hope that today's debate will prompt further public and parliamentary scrutiny of the whole process. First, how long have the Government—and, before them, the SRA—pursued this policy? That is the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Mr. Galloway) made. How long has this been going on? I ask the question because some confusion has been created by some of the responses to the Transport Committee. The issue was briefly raised in that Committee on 26 November 2002 as part of its inquiry into the SRA. In an exchange at that meeting, the Chairman asked Richard Bowker of the SRA:

"Is it true that you volunteered to underwrite any problem that should arise for any company in relation to a strike?"

Mr. Bowker replied:

"No, not at all. We remain of the view that the companies who are the most appropriate people to negotiate and to manage industrial relations are the Train Operating Companies."

Yet we know from subsequent parliamentary questions that four months after that Select Committee hearing, the Government, through the SRA, were already paying National Express compensation to the tune of millions of pounds for revenue lost in a dispute involving ScotRail. Was the Select Committee misled? Did Mr. Bowker not know that that was the intention? We need clarification on that.

Will my hon. Friend also clarify when the Government and the SRA started the policy? Precisely when did it start, and who took the decision? Do the Government use taxpayers' money to provide direct or indirect financial support to private companies during industrial disputes, or to veto private sector pay-and-condition agreements, in any industry other than the rail industry? Is this industry unique, or are hidden subsidies provided to other employers by the Government?

Under what statutory arrangements do the Government believe that they can use such powers? It would be useful to clarify exactly the statutory arrangements, as several hon. Members would seek to amend the legislation. Did the Government or the SRA take legal advice on the issue? What legal advice was provided, by whom, and can it be made publicly available? Hon. Members would, at the least, want to clarify whether this is a legitimate role for the Government and whether legally the Secretary of State has such powers.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend ask an additional question? He will know that new franchises are about to come into operation. I have been told by union activists that the companies that are taking on those franchises may use the opportunity further to reduce trade union rights and activities. Should not the Government insist that the franchises include right and proper processes for trade union officials and members to engage in industrial relations? It would be an absolute disgrace if such activities were to be reduced.

John McDonnell: It would be useful if this debate were to send a message to companies that seek to provoke industrial relations breakdowns, or to reform, change or cut pay and conditions, and are willing to take on the unions on the basis that their activities will be subsidised by the Government. We must send out the message that Members of this House will examine and scrutinise every penny of taxpayers' money that is used to subsidise industrial relations provocations. At this key stage of the tenders being transferred, we run into danger by feather-bedding employers and train operating companies that are willing to risk industrial relations in the industry to enhance their profits.

David Taylor: Is there not a myth about industrial relations in the rail industry? Even in the peak years—if we can call them that—of Thatcherism between 1979 and 1996, there were just a handful of industrial disputes. They were regrettable, but there were just a handful. The number quintupled between 1997 and 2004, not least because the negotiations involve 73 different bodies, including 25 train operating companies, 10 infrastructure companies and so on.

John McDonnell: That leads back to the original point, which is that there should be some discussions between the Association of Train Operating Companies and the unions. That might enhance the industrial relations climate by overcoming the dog's breakfast of negotiating structures that exist.

I shall finish off with a couple of questions to the Minister. Will he tell me when the powers were taken and when the decision was made to provide the SRA and the Government with those powers? At what level of Government was that decision made? It smacks of a decision centred on No. 10. It astounds me that No. 11 and the Treasury would agree to such a scale of subsidy to the private sector being made in such an unaccountable way.

This leads me to my final question on the matter. Will the Minister explain the formula or the criteria used to determine whether a private train operating company can receive support in this way? Is there a checklist of actions that the company has to have undertaken? Is an assessment undertaken by the Secretary of State of whether the company has acted reasonably in seeking to settle the dispute?

I have another example of where the Government intervene in industrial relations; it is happening at the moment in the Prison Service. The Home Secretary has the opportunity in law to intervene to prevent industrial action in the Prison Service. However, he has that power only on the basis of making an assessment of whether it is reasonable to do so, and he assesses the behaviour and the activities of the partners within that industrial relations framework. Do similar procedures exist in the decision-making process through which the Secretary of State for Transport awards significant sums of money to the companies? Does the Secretary of State consider the behaviour of and actions taken by employers in seeking to resolve the dispute, or in seeking to prolong or provoke it?

Will the Minister tell me which companies have received such financial support, and how much support have they received? It would be very useful to get on the record, down to the last penny, how much Branson and others have been trousering from Government on the basis of disputes that they have provoked.

Ms Katy Clark (North Ayrshire and Arran) (Lab): My hon. Friend has already mentioned that substantial subsidy has been given to First ScotRail in respect of an industrial dispute in Scotland. Recently, powers relating to railways have been transferred to the Scottish Executive. It would be helpful if the Minister told us what discussions had taken place with the Scottish Executive on the issue, and if he confirmed that it was within the Scottish Executive's powers to decide not to continue with the policy and not to provide subsidy to private companies in this way.

John McDonnell: That is an important question. My understanding is that the Scottish Executive have a role in the matter, but we need clarity on that. Are the Scottish Executive being hamstrung and controlled by the Secretary of State for Transport in their operations to facilitate improvement of the industrial relations climate? It would be useful to get on the record the specific roles that each of the partners within Government play.

In the current dispute between the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers and Virgin Trains, more than 300 guards have been striking on Sundays since 1 January, after the Virgin board vetoed a settlement of the dispute over the erosion of Sunday pay rates. In that dispute, we have the barmy situation of Virgin bosses blocking a settlement that would have cost them no more than £6 per guard per Sunday to settle. In an answer to a written parliamentary question, my hon. Friend the Minister confirmed that Virgin Trains was in discussion with its franchise manager—the Government—on the current dispute. With regard to this dispute, will he assure me that the Government are not providing the train company of our multi-billionaire friend Richard Branson with any financial support? I hope that the Minister can provide answers to these questions, and I hope that he will also reassure us on the threat to railway pensions.

Tom Brake: I want to put a hypothetical situation to the hon. Gentleman. It is possible that one of the train operating companies—probably not Richard Branson's—will risk bankruptcy as a result of an industrial action. What does he think the appropriate Government response should be in such circumstances?

John McDonnell: To bring it back into public ownership. It is as simple as that. That would solve the problem overnight and be a shining example of the Government's actions for the future.

Mr. Davidson: My hon. Friend has asked a large number of very detailed questions of the Minister, who is a fine man and will want to be as helpful as he possibly can. Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Minister is unable to answer all the questions in detail today—I see that he is here unprotected by a Parliamentary Private Secretary—it would be reasonable for him to give a clear undertaking to provide in writing an answer to any questions that he is unable to answer?

John McDonnell: I do not say this as a quotation from Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar", but the Minister is an honest man. Therefore, I am sure that he will provide us with all the detailed responses that we have asked for. I do not expect him to do that in sufficient detail today, but I would welcome it in writing. We would then have the opportunity to place that matter on the record in a further debate. The debate does not end here: the issue will come back time and time again, every time there is a dispute in the railway industry and every time we identify a single penny going from the taxpayer to the employer to subsidise disputes. This is the first part of the campaign to get some sort of fair and just industrial relations framework in the railways industry.

Mr. Davidson: And the answers will come up at his trial.

John McDonnell: From a sedentary position, there was a reference to trials. We no longer shoot people in our movement for betrayals. [Laughter.] Some regret that.

I move on to address the issue that is souring the industrial relations climate at the moment, which is that of the railway pension scheme. As the Minister will be aware, the scheme is under threat due to significant deficits in a number of different sections of the scheme. A number of sections are okay and can manage the deficits, but a number are not. The deficits have been caused by factors similar to those facing other industry pension schemes, including poor financial returns—I accept that—but also irresponsible employers exploiting pension holidays during the early years and the actuary's change to mortality assumptions on the basis that pensioners are living longer.

[John McDonnell]

However, the threat to the railway pension scheme has been significantly compounded by the fragmentation and privatisation of the railways, specifically by railway employers enjoying surpluses built up during the latter years of British Rail when thousands of railway staff left the industry in preparation for privatisation. The rail employers have not been prepared to use those surpluses or the billions of pounds profit made from privatisation to fund the schemes adequately.

The structure of the railways means that train operating and infrastructure companies' contracts cover only a number of years before they are re-tendered, which introduces instability into the system. The Minister will be aware that that has acted as a disincentive for train operating companies and other rail contractors to take on the liability of additional contributions now, or to recoup any overpayments from surpluses in the future. It is a structural problem in the industry.

The problem has been compounded by the fact that, following privatisation, the unified railway pension scheme was fragmented into more than 100 different sections, which has meant the loss of the economies of scale and financial stability provided by the unified scheme. As a whole, the private train operating companies, Network Rail and its contractors are entirely dependent on public subsidy for their continued survival. Does the Minister agree that the Government have a clear responsibility to assist in resolving this problem?

There is plenty of scope for the Government to act. In the immediate term, they could use their position as the primary funder of the railway industry to provide comfort letters to the actuary to allow for deficits to be repaid over a longer period than the five years currently proposed. That would add some security to the system, which is increasingly in disarray. I understand that there may be plans to provide such comfort letters to cover the train operating companies, and if that is the case, it is most welcome. I hope that it will apply to all railway companies whose pension schemes are suffering from severe deficits. Even if comfort letters are provided, they will not address the fundamental problem of the fragmentation of the railway pension scheme, nor the tendency of various railway operators and employers to act in their own short-term interests.

Does my hon. Friend the Minister agree that the pension system could be made more efficient and secure if the railway pension scheme reverted to a unified fund, rather than the array of individual sections? Does he agree also that it would introduce immediate economies of scale and facilitate stability, long-term planning and more prudent management—essential prerequisites of a healthy pension scheme? There could be strong financial incentives for the Government to move towards a unified pension scheme.

The Minister knows that every time a train operating franchise changes hands or splits, the pension scheme is restructured to take account of the change of franchise, with pensioners, deferred pensioners and contributing members allocated or re-allocated to various sections of the railway pension or to new sections that are being set up. Pensions are complicated enough, and that adds only complication upon complication. Furthermore, all those changes require the input of actuaries, lawyers and other professionals, and there must be an enormous administrative burden.

The costs associated with the changes to pensions are borne not by the private companies but by the Department for Transport. Will the Minister tell us how much money the Government have spent in that way since the railways were privatised? Do the Government believe that it represents value for money? Does he agree that it would be far better value for the Government and a better deal for railway workers if there were a unified pension scheme again?

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for taking the time to listen to my concerns, and I hope that he will be able to answer my questions, if not today then in writing to us, so that we can read those responses into the record.

Our railway workers need their concerns raised in this place. When the Government were elected, they went out of their way to impress upon the media and all who would listen to them that their relationship with the trade unions would mean fairness not favours. When it comes to industrial relations in the railway industry, the sense is that the whole process has been reversed. The privatised companies are getting the favours, and the rail staff are not getting any fairness. I hope that the Minister will tell us today how he intends to change that, and I hope that he will at least provide us with a commitment that the Government will consider the matter again.

As I said earlier, this is the start of a campaign that will not go away. This is the first debate in a long campaign that we hope will not only secure a fair industrial relations framework for the railway industry but create an effective climate for railway workers, passengers, the Government and taxpayers.

11.43 am

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing a rare debate on the subject of industrial relations in the railways. He said that he will seek to pursue the matter further and to secure a further debate, and I would welcome that. I compend him for following the matter attentively. The trail of parliamentary questions included in our pack demonstrate how assiduous he is in following the issues, whether they are industrial relations, pensions or the relationship between the Association of Train Operating Companies and the unions.

On that point, I am as surprised as the hon. Gentleman is about the unwillingness of ATOC to enter into discussions. We might have a difference of opinion about the areas it should be willing to discuss, but I support the general principle that it should be willing to enter into discussions. I agree with his comments about the role that the workers in the rail industry have to play in keeping the country moving, and about the very important role that they played in keeping us on the move during the recent terrorist incident.

Prior to the debate, I sought feedback from several sources, including the unions, individual staff and the industry on the state of industrial relations in the railway industry. I was not overwhelmed by representations from those different sources. Perhaps the unions direct their attentions to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that that is not the case, and I encourage them to share their concerns more widely than appears to have been the case in this instance. It confirms the anecdotal evidence of my recent travel experiences, which is that, generally, industrial relations on the railways are good.

I received some information from Network Rail about the level of industrial action within its organisation. According to the company, there has been only one incident of industrial action since it took control in October 2002. It has been a period of relative calm. That is in contrast with past years. I have been commuting in and around London on the trains for the past 23 years, and during that time, there have been some very bad periods when many travellers have had to seek other ways of getting to and from work, whether walking, cycling, using the tube instead of the train or vice versa.

That is not to say that there are no areas of dispute or disagreement, as the hon. Gentleman highlighted. Sometimes, they are resolved quickly, and I am sure that he welcomes the swift action that Metronet Rail took in relation to Blue Diamond. The cleaning contract was quickly terminated after it was revealed that the cleaning contractor was not paying workers the agreed rate. It had its contract withdrawn—a substantial contract that was worth £20 million over three years.

I hazard to say that there are some examples of quite good relations between some of the main players and the unions. However, the hon. Gentleman, through his series of parliamentary questions, has rightly drawn attention to the dispute between the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers and Virgin. He referred to the essence of the dispute—an issue about Sunday pay rates, involving 300 guards—and revealed that one of the more surprising aspects of the dispute was the role that the Government have played in providing subsidies to train operating companies involved in disputes. As he stated, and parliamentary answers reveal, Virgin is in discussion with the franchise manager—the Government—about that issue.

I do not think that the hon. Gentleman answered my question in an intervention about whether it is appropriate to pay subsidies to compensate the train operating companies in relation, for instance, to a terrorist incident. There are perhaps circumstances in which it is perfectly legitimate for those companies to receive support. However, in relation to industrial disputes, we need much reassurance from the Government that such support does not feed the dispute, rather than seek to resolve it. At £23 million, the sums of money involved are not insubstantial, and I hope that the Minister will be able to provide more detail about which train operating companies have received that subsidy, so that we can consider whether some of the smaller companies would have gone out of business if they had not received it. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington said that there is a clear way forward: the Government should take control and bring the companies back into the public sector. However, it would be useful for Members to know whether some companies might have gone out of business without some of the subsidies.

Mr. Davidson: Having listened with some interest to the hon. Gentleman, I am not clear whether he supports the Government being able to indemnify companies for their losses. Can we have a clear statement of the Liberal position on that matter?

Tom Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention and I hope to be able to give him a clearer picture in the next few minutes. I believe that there may well be circumstances in which what has been described is appropriate but, as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington said, we need to hear from the Minister what criteria the train operating companies have to satisfy to qualify for the subsidies. We also need to hear whether there is anything on the other side of the argument. In other words, are the Government actively providing incentives to ensure that industrial disputes are resolved amicably? Is everything on one side of the argument? I hope that the Minister will respond to that point.

Mr. Davidson: Do I take it that the answer about the Liberal policy is, "Don't know"? I ask the question because the issue is not solely of academic interest, as the Liberals are in a coalition in Scotland and there is a potential impact on the position of ScotRail. It would be helpful to me as a Scottish Member to know unequivocally whether the Liberals are in favour of the procedure. If the hon. Gentleman cannot tell me today, perhaps he could write to me, as the Minister does, after the debate in order to make me aware of the position.

Tom Brake: It is a departure to request that Opposition Members write to Government Members to explain their position, but the intervention from the hon. Gentleman was legitimate, his point was valid, and I will pursue it and give him a detailed response. The Minister for Transport and Telecommunications in Scotland is a Liberal Democrat Member of the Scottish Parliament, so clearly the hon. Gentleman is entitled to a response, which he will receive soon, I hope.

John McDonnell: The hon. Gentleman is right. If there is to be subsidy in an industrial relations dispute, what criteria do the Government use? At the moment, if there are criteria, they are used to judge whether the money goes to the employer. If there is to be that Government intervention, we might as well have criteria whereby the Government decide who they will back. They might well be sending a cheque to Bob Crow and saying, "You've got it right this time, Bob; we'll give you the dosh." That is the ludicrous situation that we are getting into if the Government are going to intervene in industrial relations.

Tom Brake: I am happy to let the Minister respond to that point and say whether he will seek to make a financial contribution to Bob Crow's funds—I am sure that he will have clear views on that.

[Tom Brake]

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington rightly highlighted the concerns of the unions.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): On the point about funds to Bob Crow, let us consider what Nick Wright, head of communications for ASLEF, has said, which is that it is easier to negotiate with the TOCs and the franchise operators in the run-up to the renewal of the franchise. So in fact the Government are giving money to Bob Crow and his friends, because they have the power in the balance of negotiations at that time. That is the countervailing argument to the one advanced by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) earlier.

John McDonnell rose—

Tom Brake: I give way again.

John McDonnell: We can overcome that by ending the franchise process altogether and bringing rail back into public ownership.

Tom Brake: Clearly, we need a further debate on this subject because we could pursue it for a number of hours hence, but to return to what I was saying, the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington rightly highlighted the concern of the unions that the subsidy process is feeding disputes. I hope that, as he said, the Minister will put clearly on record the criteria that have to be met for the subsidy to be provided and what the counterbalance is in terms of the encouragement that the Government give to ensure that disputes are settled amicably without the need for an industrial dispute.

Has the Minister considered whether there are circumstances in which compulsory arbitration might be needed to resolve such an issue? I am referring to binding arbitration whereby the cases of both parties would be assessed independently and they would agree to sign up to the outcome of such a process. Alternatively, has the Minister considered the idea proposed by the transport committee of the London assembly, which is voluntary no-strike agreements in advance of key dates in the calendar when disputes traditionally come to a head, such as Christmas and new year? I am also thinking of the period in advance of the Olympics in 2012. I hope that the Minister will comment on that point. He may also want to provide clarity on what reasonable steps the franchise operators have to take to prevent industrial action. I understand that the Government require operators to do that before any subsidy can be made available.

I have not dwelt on pensions, to which the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington rightly referred. The Government are in a bit of a mess in that area. Certainly there is not much clarity or consistency from the Government on public sector pensions. The issue of pensions will increasingly grab the headlines, whether in the public sector or in the rail industry, as the hon. Gentleman outlined. I hope that the Minister will be more convincing on that issue in relation to the railways industry than the Government have been in respect of other sectors.

I hope that hon. Members agree that, so far, this has been an informative debate, attempting to clarify Government policy. That is what the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is seeking to do, and I thank his office for clarifying for me before the debate the areas on which he was to focus. The debate has not been about scoring political points, so I hope that the Minister will respond in a similar vein.

11.57 am

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing the debate and on putting his case so clearly, eloquently and forcefully. I support him in praising the staff of the railways for the job that they do. I represent a London constituency that benefits from both surface and underground rail, and the staff work very hard. Unfortunately, all too often in the eyes of the travelling public and perhaps in the eyes of some of the workers, they are represented by union leaders to whom the old adage of the first world war might apply.

I was interested in the hon. Gentleman's history lesson. We have heard from several Government Members, both Front and Back Benchers, the history lesson of the railways, which always seems to start around 1988, when British Rail started to be a productive and efficient body, and which ignores conveniently the history of the 70 years before that, when Governments of both hues failed to invest. I guide anyone who wants to read a succinct history of the railways to the two articles by Professor Huxley in The Railway Magazine last year, which give a rather more clear, fair and balanced view of railway history.

There has been quite a lot of talk today about the improvement in industrial relations on the railways and, indeed, throughout the country generally. It is true that industrial relations have improved such that, in 2003, we recorded the lowest number of labour disputes for 25 years, but it is true also that one third of those were recorded on our transport system in some way, shape or form, and that transport still accounted for 25 per cent. of the almost 500,000 days lost. The debate is therefore important in allowing us to consider why some of these disputes still arise. I shall refer to some of the issues raised by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington.

Tom Brake: I understand that today is a big day for the Conservatives—they have published a new glossy brochure. Will the hon. Gentleman set out what it contains about railways policy?

Stephen Hammond: I shall leave that for the hon. Gentleman to read later in the day; the brochure does not set out any policy in detail. Of course, later this week the Liberal Democrats have a bigger day, and we shall see whether it presages any change.

I confirm for the hon. Gentleman that by the summer recess there will be detailed Conservative policies on a number of issues, such as transport policy—particularly rail policy. I shall be delighted to debate them with him then.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington referred to a number of the written parliamentary questions that he has tabled about subsidies to the railways. In my earlier intervention on the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) I said that the argument could be made either way.

There has been much righteous indignation about legitimate cases for industrial action being overcome by an astonishing abuse—I think those were the words of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington—of public funds. He asked a number of detailed questions of the Minister. Surely the nub of the issue is that the franchise agreements, entered into by both this Government and their Conservative predecessor, have enshrined the ability to reimburse the franchise operators for net losses due to industrial action. That is within the franchise arrangements and, presumably, subject to normal franchise arrangements and normal contract law: if one side breaches those franchise arrangements, the other can seek redress. I am sure that the Minister will confirm that that is the case. If it is not, I shall be interested to hear his argument as to why.

The argument to put to the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is that the franchise arrangements have sought to put such things in place so that we can improve services to passengers and investment in the railways, which has been lacking since 1918.

John McDonnell: The question for the hon. Gentleman is whether those things should be within the franchise agreements themselves. What is his party's position on that?

Stephen Hammond: I am happy to confirm that my party believes that the current franchise arrangements are suitable and appropriate.

I look forward to the Minister giving a number of answers—either in the Chamber this morning or in writing later. If he cannot answer the rather large number of huge, detailed questions, perhaps he will do us the courtesy of making any written response available to everybody by placing it in the Library. That would be helpful.

I picked up on the remark made by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington about the Association of Train Operating Companies refusing to meet about anything. I accept that that may be right; I simply do not know. However, the quote that I gave from the head of communications at ASLEF clearly indicates that across the industry there is dialogue with the train operating companies in certain cases.

Under the franchise arrangements, the train operating companies have an obligation to speak to franchise operators about industrial relations, safety and security. The hon. Gentleman tried, I think, to present a picture in which no conversation at all was taking place between the unions and the franchise operators. That is somewhat misleading.

John McDonnell: I find the word "misleading" inappropriate. I made it clear that there is no dialogue between ATOC and the unions. ATOC has refused all meetings about the strategic issues facing the railway industry, including issues of safety and so on. I did not seek to mislead the House in any way.

Stephen Hammond: I am happy to withdraw my remark. I merely point out that a huge amount of dialogue is going on between unions and franchise operators and between unions and the train operating companies, as was shown by my quote from the head of communications at ASLEF.

We have talked a little about the principle of an employer and employee talking together, and I suspect that there is agreement on that across the House. Equally, there must be some agreement across the House that when an agreed negotiation and consultation process is in place, it should be maintained through all the stages of negotiation.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington has already referred to the Greater London authority transport committee report, which came out this week. It refers exactly to this issue. It says that if the process could be cemented voluntarily, that could revive a great deal of trust in industrial relations in the underground. I accept that the underground is not the same as surface rail, but the point being made was that all too often in London underground negotiations, the unions break an agreed code and threaten industrial action at an early stage. We then see a breakdown into industrial action at a time that causes the height of discomfort to the travelling public.

The GLA committee made and illustrated the point that that was a continual tactic. It seems sensible that the committee should have recommended that when an agreed negotiation and consultation procedure is in place, the whole of it should be followed through prior to any escalation of action. I hope that that could be agreed across the House, and would welcome the Minister's support for that recommendation.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington did not talk about a number of other industrial relations issues. I should like to mention one thing that the public find extremely difficult to understand. The discomfort of the travelling public is clearly the leverage of the unions in industrial relations. Andy Reed, another national organiser for ASLEF, said that industrial relations at the London underground varied "from hostility to anarchy".

That is exactly what the travelling public see—the hostility of the unions towards them and the anarchy of the service provided to them. The travelling public have problems understanding that quite often the majority of such actions—or at least a number of them, particularly recent ones on the underground—have not been supported by a majority of the union members.

For instance, various reports have stated that in the past four years, I think, the RMT has called 23 ballots in respect of the underground system. Turnout has been 48 per cent. on average, but below 40 per cent. in a number of the ballots. Those ballots have resulted in 10 strikes. Much talk this morning has been about unscrupulous employers trousering money, but there are also unscrupulous union leaders who call strikes on minority turnouts and minority support.

Mr. Drew: I should declare my links with the RMT, which are recorded in the Register of Members' Interests. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that I have seen members of the general public hurling abuse at staff members, when, because of the total inadequacy of our network and through no fault of those staff members, connecting trains have gone? I have seen how those staff members, some of whom I am sure are union activists—I know some activists well—deal with that situation. It is a gross abuse to point the finger at the start at union activists, as the hon. Gentleman has done.

[Mr. Drew]

Stephen Hammond: In this case, this hon. Gentleman is genuinely being misleading. I opened my remarks by specifically praising the staff, and I would utterly condemn anyone who made such remarks to railway workers. My remarks about the unscrupulous nature of union leaders referred not to the workers, but to the tactic of calling action on a minority turnout.

John McDonnell: That was raised in the GLA transport committee debate. The Conservative members argued that industrial action should be called only if a majority of all staff—not a majority of the turnout—voted for it. However, on that basis, the GLA member, Roger Evans, for whom only 13 per cent. of the electorate voted, would never have been elected in the first place.

Stephen Hammond: I think that that is also wrong. The recommendation is that there should be a 50 per cent. turnout of the membership in the ballot; that would be the relevant majority. All too often, action has been called on a turnout of well below 50 per cent. That is the difference.

John McDonnell: Roger Evans, the GLA Tory member, had been arguing that the tube unions should be allowed to take strike action only if a majority of those entitled to vote voted for the action.

Stephen Hammond: That is not the recommendation of the GLA transport committee, which is rather different. It is that there be at least a 50 per cent. turnout in the ballot.

John McDonnell: So the hon. Gentleman is condemning Roger Evans.

Stephen Hammond: No, I am not condemning him, because he is entitled to that view and I might support it. I was merely pointing out what the actual recommendation is. The tendency of union officials to act in their short-term interests all too often hampers industrial relations in the rail industry.

We could have a debate lasting an hour and a half on the railway pension scheme.

John McDonnell: We will.

Stephen Hammond: I am glad that we will, because it will be an interesting debate. It will be extremely interesting to hear the Minister's response about previous pension fund holidays, how they will work, and how they have worked and acted against pensioners.

The Minister might not wish to comment on the fact that across the public sector there is currently an unfunded liability in pensions, which the Government admit to be £460 billion. If they were to be honest and give their unfunded liability in the same way as companies must, following the obligations of financial reporting standard 17 or—perhaps to be more generous to the Government—following a discount rate more closely linked to index-linked skills, the unfunded liability of the Government pension scheme would be between £670 billion and £850 billion. I believe that the Chief Secretary has confirmed that in written responses.

The rail industry scheme's problem pales into insignificance when we consider the matter across the whole public sector.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): Will the hon. Gentleman enlighten us on current Conservative party policy in this area?

Stephen Hammond: I am merely pointing out the Government's own error. If, in the same way as they force corporate pension funds—[Interruption.]

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. I ask hon. Members to stop having conversations across the Chamber.

Stephen Hammond: I was merely pointing out that if the Government operated on the same basis as that which they force on companies, the unfunded liability of the public sector pension fund would be between £670 billion and £850 billion. The Conservative party is considering whether or not we should fund it. It would be honest to say that this Government's liabilities are 125 per cent. of gross domestic product, not the 60 per cent. that they claim in terms of debt.

The issue of the pension fund will cause considerable problems both for the trustees and for the Government for some time to come.

12.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) on securing this debate and providing an opportunity to discuss the important issue of industrial relations in the rail industry.

I use the railways every week, both local and national lines, and I have never driven down to London by car. It is a pleasure to use them. I am grateful to the people who work on them to ensure that a good service is provided.

I want briefly to outline the situation in the railway industry, because to do so gives a context to the industrial relations issues. In debates such as this we might feel that a major problem is occurring and that the situation is not quite as good as it seems.

Tom Brake: Will the Minister give way?

Derek Twigg: I have only just started, so I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will let me continue a little before I allow him to intervene.

Some good things are happening and I want to relate them to the Chamber in order to set the scene. The railways continue to be a success. The Government are spending £87 million each week on them and there have been record levels of investment in rolling stock. On average, over the past 12 months, more than 85 per cent. of trains have run on time as measured by the industry-standard public performance measure. Furthermore, there have been record levels of train patronage; more than 1 billion passengers used the railways in 2005, which is the highest number since the 1960s and makes our railways the fastest growing in Europe. Since 1996–97, rail passenger kilometres have grown by 32 per cent., so people are now travelling further by rail than ever.

Tom Brake: I thank the Minister for giving way. I was going to say that, having sat in a large number of these debates during the past nine years, I am aware that the introductory remarks about the industry generally tend to squeeze out the time for answering the serious points made by hon. Members.

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman will just have to listen to what I have to say, and I think he will find that that is not the case.

It is important to underline the current success of the railway industry. It has much to do with its staff, who are a vital part of the success. Whatever their particular role, their actions contribute to the increased usage of the railway and the general improvement that has taken place. On 7 July we saw the commitment and performance of railway staff during difficult and trying circumstances. I know that an issue has been made about security on the railways and the role of staff.

It is also important to talk about the future, because the industry is now a vibrant one and more people want to work in it. Recently, I visited HMS Sultan, near Gosport, to see the new Network Rail apprenticeship scheme in action. It employs 200 engineering apprentices. They are the future of our railway industry. How often have we been crying out for investment in apprenticeships and in the railways? The scheme is another example of the good things that are happening. I am delighted about the growing interest in the railways and the increasing number of people using them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington raised the point about the Association of Train Operating Companies and meetings with the unions. He will know, as do the unions that I have met, that we have raised issues with ATOC. The specific one, about which there has recently been a further discussion and which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said he would raise, was about getting together to discuss security. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, and other hon. Members, that we are in the process of dealing with that. We will host the meeting between ATOC and the trade unions to discuss security issues. The meeting will be about security and not about other issues.

I will now address the specific issues that have been raised in this debate. The Government believe that industrial relations are a matter for the industry and that issues are best and most effectively dealt with between the relevant industry parties. Before the Railways Act 2005, the Strategic Rail Authority had responsibility for industrial relations. When its responsibilities transferred to the Department for Transport last year, my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), stated that the Government intended to continue the SRA policy in this area. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington raised the matter in his speech and I will go into further detail as I continue mine.

The Government have three main roles in industrial relations in the rail industry. They must approve any pay settlement agreed during the last twelve months of a franchise; they can agree to waive poor performance penalties, if that poor performance is as a result of industrial action; and they can agree to provide compensation of net losses to train operating companies for industrial action.

Although the Department will not get involved in the details of pay awards and negotiations, the Government should keep an overview of what is happening in the industry, pay rates and anything unusual that is happening in terms of pay awards. A pay award in one TOC will have potential implications for all TOCs. My officials meet the industry regularly in order to provide me with such an overview. In addition, as hon. Members would expect, franchise management teams are kept regularly up to date with the current position of their TOCs in these matters.

A specific point was made about Virgin Cross Country. It has regularly met its franchise management team. The meetings have included updates to the Department on the current dispute with the RMT train managers about differential pay on Sundays, which has been ongoing since 1 January 2006. That does not mean that the Government are making, or are planning, any intervention in this or any other dispute. As I have explained, industrial relations issues are for the individual company and the union to resolve. However, we would be failing in our duty if we did not seek to keep up to date on issues that might affect the satisfaction of passengers or the smooth running of the railway, or that might have a significant effect on the public purse.

On the contractual position issue generally—

John McDonnell: Before the Minister discusses that, will he clarify the criteria that enable the Secretary of State to judge the intervention or the level of subsidy if there is a dispute? I am anxious to get as much on to the record as possible.

Derek Twigg: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, and I will address that point during my speech. I am sure that he will not be surprised to hear that we anticipated some of his questions. I will get back to hon. Members about the ones that I am unable to deal with today after the debate.

The Department's position on industrial relations within the rail industry is defined in the franchise agreements. Everything that the Department does, it does because it has to contractually. There is little that it must do that is discretionary.

Under the franchise agreement, the Department may at its sole discretion, agree to provide compensation to TOCs for their net losses suffered as a result of industrial action. That clause was added to the franchise agreement in 2003. The mechanism to pay compensation exists because of the relatively short-term nature of the franchises. Because of that, there were worries that TOCs might react in a way that would be to the detriment of future franchises rather than consider the causes of industrial action on their merits. Such awards might represent poor value for money for the industry as a whole and ultimately for the taxpayer when, in due course, we came to re-franchise the business. However, I emphasise that the compensation is not automatic and is paid only after consideration of all the contributing factors.

[Derek Twigg]

For an operator to be able to receive such support, it needs to be able to demonstrate that it has taken all reasonable steps to avoid industrial action. It also needs to show that it has done all that it can to prevent any action from having a negative effect on its business. Any support covers only net losses, and that captures the savings that operators may make from the industrial action. That remains the Government's position, but no such payments have been made since the Department took over direct responsibility for franchise agreements from the SRA last year.

John McDonnell: Is the judgment on reasonable steps undertaken independently?

Derek Twigg: It is taken by the Department, but the franchise managers work with the individual TOCs to that end. I stress that, since we took over the responsibility for franchising, we have not done anything in that respect. As my hon. Friend said, payments have been made under the clause. In the financial year 2003–04, the SRA made payments of £22.4 million in compensation to TOCs. In 2004–05, that figure was £1.4 million. My hon. Friend has asked for more detail on the breakdown of payments. I shall endeavour to write to him about it in due course.

Tom Brake: Is "reasonable steps" a legal definition or is there, as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington suggested, a checklist behind the phrase?

Derek Twigg: There is a relationship between a franchise manager and a TOC. "Reasonable" is something that we have to discuss and negotiate with the TOCs, but I shall be happy to give the hon. Gentleman further details after the debate.

I must clarify the position of the Department during the last 12 months of a franchise. When a franchise is at that stage, the position is slightly different. While the franchising concept was being developed in the mid-1990s, it was recognised that there was a need to prevent train operating companies from agreeing above-inflation pay increases, knowing that most of the cost would fall on their successors. To prevent that from happening, a clause was added to the franchise agreements to force the TOC to agree any proposed pay increases that would be above the average earnings index with the Department.

If the Department were to withhold its consent to such a pay award and that resulted in industrial action, it would be bound contractually to compensate the TOC for its net losses. That has never happened. To reiterate, the clause applies only if a franchise is in the last 12 months of operation. There are several other actions that cannot be taken by the operator in the last 12 months of a franchise without the Department's permission, which include the increase or decrease of staff numbers or total staff costs of more than 5 per cent. The Department monitors such issues carefully as part of its responsibility for managing the franchise.

Reference has been made to renationalisation. I shall not go into detail, but we have set up a new structure within the rail industry. The Department has set up a rail review, with Network Rail taking responsibility for performance. The train operating companies are working with them and also on improving customer service. Working with the private sector is important to bring more investment into the rail network and bring about the improvements that I have mentioned. We are spending £87 million a week. Post-privatisation, there were many complex problems in the industry. We have now set out a much clearer way forward and a structure whereby people understand what is happening. That will bring about further improvements in the rail industry in the coming years.

Reference has been made to agreements in respect of London Underground. Its operation, including industrial relations, is a matter for the Mayor, not central Government. It is for London Underground as the employer to lead in industrial relations and resolve any dispute with the trade unions. Any industrial action on the underground causes unnecessary inconvenience and disruption to the travelling public. We strongly urge all sides to continue negotiations so that the current dispute can be resolved peacefully. The strike arranged for 21 February was cancelled due to both sides engaging in constructive talks. I understand that the proposed strike on 2 March will also not go ahead.

As for strikes and agreements, and certain times when strikes should not take place, there are no proposals for the Government to ban strikes on London Underground. A local agreement between the employer and the trades union could be undertaken if both sides were agreeable. However, even that could not guarantee that no further action would take place. New York has such a no-strike agreement in place, but that did not prevent strikes from taking place last autumn. It also cannot prevent unofficial action. It is far better that industrial relations are undertaken in a constructive and positive manner from the outset so that strikes or threats of industrial action are not necessary.

I am sure that hon. Members will agree that now is not the time to go into the wider issues of railways pensions and the existing challenges.

Mr. Davidson: Before the Minister goes into pension details, did he accept our argument when we asked him for a full and helpful response to our detailed questions? He said that he would respond. Will his responses be helpful and constructive, and clarify matters, or will they be obscuration letters that sometimes come from Ministers?

Derek Twigg: Unless my hon. Friend has noticed something that I have not noticed in my seven months in the job, that is not generally my style. I give a commitment that I shall place the information that has been requested about issues that I have not dealt with today in the Library and I will make sure that all hon. Members are kept informed of what is happening. I shall make matters as clear as possible. I give my hon. Friend that undertaking.

I understand the worries that are felt about railway pensions. It is accepted generally by all parties, including the trustees, that the operation of the railway pension scheme—the RPS—needs to be fundamentally assessed to ensure its continued good operation in the future and that members continue to receive their expected benefits, but the costs need to be contained at an acceptable level. I am aware of the potential for difficulty caused by the announcement of large deficits within sections of the RPS, but I am hopeful that a way forward will be found. Obviously, people are working together to find that way forward.

The rail industry has undergone extraordinary changes in the past 10 to 15 years, beginning with privatisation and ending with the recent Railways Act 2005. I stress that the commitment and contribution of trade union members and staff who work in the rail industry has obviously been fundamental in getting over the difficulties that the industry faced post-privatisation, Railtrack and so on, and in taking forward what is now a much more successful railway, which is improving. I cannot underestimate the contribution that the staff have made to that, as have the train operating companies and Network Rail as well as the Government in the way in which we have set in place the strategy for the railway. By working together, we can further improve the railway and take it from strength to strength.

As for the £87 million, it is crucial that our investment continues. Reliability has been a major factor in improving the railways. More than 85 per cent. of trains are running on time. People are voting with their feet and using the railways in greater numbers. As I said, more than 1 billion passengers used the railway last year. As any successful organisation knows, staff are its biggest asset—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Regeneration (Thetford)

12.30 pm

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I am delighted to have this opportunity to fly the flag for my constituency, and in particular for the market town of Thetford. I am also pleased that the Minister—someone I consider a parliamentary friend—is replying on behalf of the Government. I know that he will be positive and sincere in addressing the issues I raise, and that his advice will help to move us forward. I wish to outline the problems facing Thetford, the opportunities that exist, and what needs to be done to give Thetford the chance it so genuinely deserves.

Thetford lies in the heart of Breckland, an area of sandy heath and forest around the Little Ouse valley, and it has historically been the industrial engine of the area. It is the fourth largest town in Norfolk, and it is the centre for employment, shopping and community services for the surrounding rural community. It is only six miles from the county boundary, so its catchment area extends into neighbouring Suffolk, Cambridgeshire and beyond.

Thetford has a wealth of heritage that should attract more national and international visitors, but it is not a renowned tourist location, and it is largely held in low regard by Norfolk residents from elsewhere in the county—indeed, sadly, it is often seen as a troublespot. Between 1956 and 1980, Thetford was a London overspill town, and it went through a period of rapid expansion in housing and jobs. That has left Thetford with large housing estates and industrial areas on its outskirts.

Norfolk is a diverse county, with some areas of affluence, but others of extreme deprivation. That is a significant problem in Thetford, and particularly in the west of the town. We continue to face the major challenge created by grafting three substantial housing estates on to a relatively small area, but with limited sustained mainstream investment in social and economic opportunities. The 2001 census, coupled with local information provided by the Keystone Development Trust, showed that the key issues include child poverty, ill health related to disadvantage, low educational attainment and aspirations, antisocial behaviour, high teenage pregnancy and high levels of petty crime and domestic violence. Do the Government accept that Thetford has for too long been undervalued in respect of their investment priorities?

Fortunately, however, Thetford is now reaching a turning point. I am pleased to report that partnership-driven regeneration work, underpinned by the East of England Development Agency and European resources, has brought the town to the threshold of positive change. That has created some hugely positive trends, fostered and encouraged by many local agencies, including Breckland council, Thetford town council, the Keystone Development Trust and Norfolk county council. Thetford is benefiting from demographic diversification, with the influx of new residents who work in Norwich or Cambridge. They will bring some wealth to the town. However, it is important that we develop local jobs for local people, and have a diversity of shops and facilities, so that they choose to spend their money in the town.

[Mr. Christopher Fraser]

We have had help for the housing estates through the single regeneration budget and European objective 2 funding, but what will happen when that short-term regeneration funding comes to an end? The local authority is trying to balance the need for new additional housing stock with the difficulties faced in respect of outdated existing housing. That is hard to do. When the Government plan major housing developments, Ministers must accept that we need funding for local amenities if areas such as Thetford are to provide for the community when it moves in. When new houses are built, that has huge implications for schools, GPs' surgeries, and local transport and leisure facilities for children and adults alike.

Currently, there are about 7,000 migrant workers in Thetford. They meet labour shortages in the local economy—they do jobs that the indigenous population do not want to do. They make a significant contribution to the economic development of the area, but, unfortunately, they are perceived by some as having a negative effect on local services and schools. I would like the Government to support local agencies to promote understanding and respect, and to ensure that we have a properly integrated community. That would allow Thetford to celebrate its new multicultural nature.

I am the first to admit that much positive work is being done and there is a good feeling in the town, but those trends must be viewed realistically as part of a bigger picture for the community. There has been criticism that support in respect of drug and alcohol dependency, and sexual health and domestic violence on the estates, has been piecemeal, and that the lack of mainstream public resources for community centre costs or social programmes has made things worse. Unfortunately, there is a general fear of crime, and of persistent racism or racial harassment. There is only a limited amount that the local authority can do without support from central Government. As the Minister probably knows, it is doing its best. However, when we find that community policing is hampered by resource limitations, that puts the ball right back in the Government's court.

It is true that unemployment is currently relatively low. Many of the industrial estates in Thetford were created in the 1960s and 1970s as part of the Greater London council overspill programme, when many businesses were relocated to the town. That has left a lasting legacy. There is a number of large manufacturing businesses, and a predominance of manufacturing employment in the town; over 50 per cent. of the work force are employed in that sector. However, that means that the national trend of the contraction of that sector has the potential to hit the town very hard.

In the greater Thetford area, we have recently been hit by an announcement by Del Monte that it may close its factory in Methwold, with the loss of more than 250 jobs. Future closures—there will inevitably be more—will result in difficult to let, outdated units as well as job losses. Will the Government recognise the challenges faced by Norfolk market towns such as Thetford, and continue to make funding support available to address those challenges? Will they also recognise that social, economic and environmental regeneration is not only needed in large urban settlements and seaside resorts, but required to keep Britain's market towns vibrant and sustainable?

Now let us look to the future. No one denies that European funds and local and regional public sector regeneration funding have started to address the social, environmental and economic issues facing the town, but will Thetford benefit and move forward over the next five to 10 years? In the draft regional spatial strategy, Breckland council has earmarked Thetford for another wave of significant growth in both housing and jobs. It sees that not as an end in itself, but as a means to regenerate Thetford, and in particular the town centre. Will the Government ensure that Thetford's potential is fully realised through support for current and future regeneration initiatives, such as the rural enterprise valley and the Moving Thetford Forward projects? Moving Thetford Forward is a vision and development strategy prepared to inform Breckland council's local development framework. It is a hugely exciting vision for the future of Thetford

"as a lively market town where people of all ages and backgrounds feel welcome to live and visit", but it remains largely unfunded.

Thetford has a dearth of places to play sport, watch films, view art or go dancing. Local residents have some way to go if they want to do so. Young people lack appropriate places to meet, and public transport does not offer easy access to other towns that enjoy such benefits. What support can the Government give to encourage the development of cultural and leisure facilities to enhance the lives of the people who live in Thetford?

As the leader of Breckland council, William Nunn, told me,

"we will need to drive this project from the public sector, because the private sector is focused on the negative reports that the media portray".

I would like to think that this debate will start to redress the balance, and that the positive progress made in the town will persuade the private sector and the media alike that Thetford has an exciting future, which will be delivered all the sooner if we work together, and if the Government openly support the projects being instigated by local agencies and interest groups.

Other opportunities for the future have been identified and are being examined, including the possibility of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister giving Thetford growth point status, and the possibility of establishing a market town regeneration company; a feasibility study into that is under way. Can the Minister offer advice and encouragement on the future of those initiatives? What about the local area agreement, a key Government tool for engaging all agencies? The LAA highlights many of the issues facing Thetford, but does it bring any new money to deal with them?

In order to attract investment to the town through skilled employment and well paid jobs, Breckland council is working on the rural enterprise valley project, to which I referred. As Mark Stanton, the economic development and regeneration manager, told me:

"The purpose of REV is to harness the power of Norfolk's world class motorsport and advanced engineering sectors, to gain competitive advantage for the cluster, its supply chain and related businesses ... The project will build an exciting new business community benefiting from interaction and collaboration, business and skills support and development, increased investment and infrastructure developments."

The project includes the construction of Thetford enterprise park, which will offer high-quality, purpose-built premises to the sector and its associated supply chain. However, two key issues are as yet unresolved, the first of which is funding.

Breckland council, the Crown estate, which owns some of the land, the Government office for the east of England, through objective 2 funding, and Norfolk county council have all made firm or provisional commitments to funding the project. I urge the East of England Development Agency to commit to the £1.5 million grant that would enable the project to get off the ground. I hope that the Minister will support me in that request. As long as the EEDA agreement remains outstanding, there is a risk for the council in starting work.

The project is hugely exciting, and will have a major and continuing economic impact on the district, county and region. It will support a high-growth sector, promote inward investment along the A11 corridor, and bring new, quality employment opportunities. I want the project to be at the heart of an area of investment and opportunity, known and promoted across the country as "Tech Anglia", where people will want to live and work because it offers a positive future for them and their families.

If we are to achieve that goal, we must address the outstanding matter of the local roads infrastructure, and in particular the A11, which is a vital link between Norfolk and the rest of the United Kingdom. There remains an 8 mile stretch of single carriageway between Fiveways Corner roundabout and Thetford which leaves Norfolk the only county, and Norwich the largest settlement, not connected to the national dual carriageway network. The need to dual that section is paramount. It must be completed as a matter of urgency. The business community, utterly frustrated by unfulfilled promises and ever growing delays on that stretch of road, has rolled in behind our local authorities. A compelling case has been submitted to the regional assembly. Will the Minister support that project, and will he join me in calling on the Secretary of State for Transport to approve it so that a timetable can be drawn up and work can start?

I have highlighted Thetford's history, the difficulties that the town faces, the opportunities that lie just around the corner, and the next steps towards making a real difference to Thetford and the surrounding area. I know that the Minister will take on board the fact that neighbourhood regeneration is a long haul, but does he accept that neighbourhoods such as Thetford experiencing poverty and disadvantage deserve the best and consistent services, rather than piecemeal regeneration schemes? What can he offer the people of Thetford, and the agencies working so hard on their behalf, for the future? We want Government support for a secure and viable economic future. Where necessary, we want appropriate, timely funding, to ensure the success of the area.

I have one more issue to raise, and that is the concern in Thetford, Breckland and across south-west Norfolk about the proposal by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that the county should become unitary. There is a commonly held, passionate belief in the local delivery of local services, supported, of course, by Government, rather than a one-size-fits-all unitary approach.

Again, I thank the Minister for listening to my concerns. I invite him to visit Thetford to see for himself the issues that I raised. Thetford is an example of a town that has been done down by too many people for too long. Much could happen in the town in a short time. I am determined to do all that I can to ensure that Thetford achieves its true potential in this economically competitive and technological age, and to ensure that the concept of "Tech Anglia", and all that it could stand for in East Anglia and across the country, is truly realised.

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Hood. I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) on securing this debate, which provides an opportunity to discuss the significant work in progress to regenerate Thetford. I appreciate his kind remarks, and I hope to respond somewhat positively to a number of his points.

Recent developments in the town and plans for the future are extremely encouraging, as has been outlined by the hon. Gentleman. Partners including Thetford town council, Breckland council, the Keystone Development Trust and the East of England Development Agency have been working together to develop long-term plans for the town. Those plans culminated this month in the launch of a vision and a development strategy called Moving Thetford Forward, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. That strategy is the product of extensive consultation with local stakeholders, and local people will continue to be widely consulted as a vital part of ongoing activities.

At the core of the proposals is the plan to build on the town's outstanding natural assets. From among those, the town's waterfront has been identified as offering considerable opportunities for development. I am advised that options for increasing waterside accommodation and attractive leisure activities are under consideration. Residents and businesses are keen for further improvements to the town's streetscaping, and want to combine a mix of traditional and contemporary enhancements that are sympathetic to Thetford's rich history and to its need to develop as a modern, thriving economy.

In all, five key themes have been identified as the basis for the vision and the development strategy. The putting together of that vision has really underlined the strength of the partnership in Thetford and the determination of central partners, including those mentioned, to reinvigorate the town, working hand-in-hand with local businesses and residents.

It is important that the vision maintains its momentum as a blueprint for practical actions in the town over the next few years. As part of the vision, the East of England Development Agency invited Breckland council to submit a proposal for a feasibility study to consider the potential for establishing a market town regeneration company in Thetford. Obviously, that is still at an early stage, but it provides a clear signal of the positive intent of partners to ensure that Thetford continues to progress and realise its potential.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

Rightly, people living and working in Thetford take great pride in the town's rich history and culture. Thetford has an exceptionally interesting past, which has been influential in shaping key investments to develop the local economy. It was from Thetford that Queen Boudicca—when I was educated, she was called Boadicea—plotted her attempted overthrow of the Romans. Another resident continuing the noble tradition of freedom and liberty was Thomas Paine, who attended Thetford grammar school. Of course, Thetford was a world-famous centre for steam traction engine production in the 19th century and the early part of the 20th century through the Charles Burrell company.

That history has been at the centre of significant investments in the town, designed to unlock the potential in that rich heritage and so help stimulate the town's economy. The development of the magnificent ancient house museum, located in a 15th century Tudor merchant's house, will provide an outstanding exhibition space for the town's collection of valuable artefacts. Those include a hoard of late Roman jewellery and spoons as well as a display of original items from an Indian prince with connections to Thetford, Duleep Singh, the last Sikh maharajah of the Punjab. The manner in which this architectural jewel has been revitalised illustrates well the community-based approach to cultural and economic development in the town. Throughout the closure, local people have been involved and kept informed of progress, and educational opportunities have been maximised through close working with Thetford's schools.

The town's industrial heritage is celebrated and explored in the redeveloped Charles Burrell museum, which contains some wonderful examples of steam-powered traction engines. The local community is now considering options for further developing this facility, including potentially enhancing its impact as a museum that brings to life the history of Charles Burrell and Sons in the town, or extending its usage as a craft and music venue for the young. The need for increased provision for young people in the town has been identified as a particular priority within the Thetford vision and development strategy, as mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

As well as stimulating the town's economy through the creation of 21st century visitor attractions, such facilities are also acting as powerful tools to engage local people in the town's history and culture, and that can exert only a positive influence on people's sense of pride in place and connection with the town, which the Government are keen to promote. This sense of pride in place is clearly important in helping to bring together the culturally diverse community that lives in Thetford.

Thetford has a proud tradition of embracing and supporting new populations and groups, from the migration of engineers during the 19th and the early part of the 20th century from London, the midlands and Yorkshire, to the expanding employment opportunities in the town's Burrell works, to the settlement in the 1950s of several thousand Londoners in Thetford and the more recent establishment of a growing Portuguese community.

Of course, as well as bringing fresh opportunities and perspectives, these changes have also carried with them new challenges. The Government recognise that and have invested, for example, in measures to ensure that the Portuguese community is supported as part of a thriving community and is able fully to play its part. The difficulties faced by this growing migrant community in negotiating language and cultural barriers are real, as are problems accessing employment and training opportunities and general services.

In responding to these challenges, more than £190,000 is being provided under the Home Office's race equality grant scheme, "Connecting Communities", through the Thetford-based Keystone Development Trust, to remove barriers to employment and skills development. A central part of this scheme will be a range of services to guide migrant workers through the various types of provision in the Breckland area. The scheme also includes support for the setting up of a Multilingual and European Thetford Association, run by and for migrant workers, and support for better childcare facilities, which are more responsive to the shift patterns worked by some migrants. Practical work advice has been provided to hundreds of Portuguese people, directly resulting in them gaining employment. An information pack, providing a guide to public services in the Breckland area, brings this information together.

In addition, the European social fund objective 2 programme has part-funded a complementary skills package of support for the food manufacturing industry to help promote growth, sustainability and competitiveness. That project has provided support for 2,000 beneficiaries, a large proportion of which are migrant workers. All this provision is clearly important in making a genuine difference to the lives of people within this community and to their ability to contribute to and be part of a thriving town.

Developing the town's skills base and job opportunities has been a priority. The Government recognise the urgent needs within Thetford, which manifest themselves in high levels of benefit dependency and unemployment.

Mr. Fraser: On the skill base, can the Minister assure me that new money, rather than the piecemeal packets that I mentioned, will be available for the projects about which we are talking? We need to examine what will happen in the long term, not just put little amounts of money here and there.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am not sure that I will be able fully to satisfy the hon. Gentleman, but I will deal with the amount of funding that is under active consideration. This debate will allow me the opportunity to make inquiries to reinforce the representations that he has been making to Departments in support of the various projects being considered at the moment.

As I was saying, there are high levels of benefit dependency and unemployment, as well as low levels of educational attainment. We have responded to this in a number of ways. Funding has been made available for a town regeneration manager and a linked package of measures to improve the attractiveness of the town centre and promote its vitality as a business and visitor location, including improved landscaping and traffic management schemes.

Responding to the need for more provision of workshop and light industrial space linked to training facilities, £1.76 million has been invested in a brand new social enterprise and skills centre in the town.

Mr. Fraser: The Minister mentioned the town regeneration manager. I should like to put on the record that the funding for that position, which is currently held by Mrs. Susan Glossop, will come to an end. I should like the Government to recognise that we need continued funding for that job.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I hear the hon. Gentleman's request and undertake to make inquiries and write to him about the continuation of funding in respect of the regeneration manager.

Core elements of the social enterprise and skills centre will include the provision of vocational training to meet the demands of local employers, which will provide a real boost to the town's economy, as more than 70 jobs are expected to be created.

In addition, some £3.2 million has been invested in a new enterprise resource centre, which is providing much-needed managed workspace for new and growing employers, training and childcare facilities. Further investment in a refurbished grade 2 listed landmark office building in Thetford, to create a community development centre, is providing a strong statement of the town's determination to put development of its citizens and the work of community groups at the heart of future plans. This is complemented by the refurbishment of a voluntary sector hub to promote voluntary groups and to tap into the unique insight and understanding of this sector as a significant provider of essential services.

Just as Charles Burrell's steam engine facility provided a hub for state-of-the-art manufacturing and high-value-added employment at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century, so the developing automotive sector in Breckland, including Thetford, offers an exiting opportunity into the 21st century within an advanced engineering and motor sport cluster that is a major source of employment and prosperity in the area and offers considerable potential for the future. Turnover in advanced engineering in Breckland in 2003 amounted to £190 million, of which £23.8 million was within the motor sport sector. In ensuring that this vital source of high-value-added employment continues to grow and prosper, partners have been working hard to put the right sort of infrastructure in place to maximise its potential.

Already, £612,500 has been invested in a team of business support experts in the field, who are providing brokerage, grant, recruitment and youth employment and graduate engagement services. This resource is the first part of a package of measures under the rural enterprise valley initiative, with long-term plans for a fully serviced site to support and grow this important cluster now being discussed between key partners, including Breckland district council and EEDA. These talks involve the injection of considerable sums into the project including, potentially, £1.5 million from EEDA, as well as up to £1.9 million from the Crown estate in cash and land.

Of course, we recognise that well planned and carefully thought out transport infrastructure is an important factor in supporting the economic prosperity of Thetford. Many schemes are in place or under development to deliver this. The A11 is a key trunk road, both within Norfolk and also as a route connecting Suffolk and Cambridgeshire. The Minister will know that several improvements have taken place to this road over recent years—most recently, the current A11 Attleborough bypass improvement scheme, which is due to open in early 2007.

The A11 Fiveways to Thetford improvement scheme is identified in the Highways Agency's current business plan as a scheme to be progressed subject to regional priorities. We have now received the region's advice and are assessing it. The A11 Fiveways to Thetford scheme has been identified as a priority scheme by the region and within that ranking it has been allocated a delivery date of no earlier than 2011–12. This takes into consideration the funds available over the next 10-year period and how the full list of schemes can be afforded out of that funding. I understand that the Minister of State, Department for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), is writing to the hon. Gentleman with details and further clarification.

It is possible that the scheme could be started earlier, but only if other schemes do not happen or their programmes slip. The region will be undertaking regular reviews of the priority list to ensure that best use is made of the money available. In addition, improvements have been made to the A47 and measures are being taken forward by the Highways Agency, under its route management strategy, to improve safety and incident management and control vehicle speeds along the Acle straight.

There is no doubt that Thetford is on the move. Certainly, we do not underestimate the challenges ahead. Nevertheless, I hope that the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk will feel somewhat reassured that the activities in place to increase the town's prosperity and prospects, set against the framework of the newly launched town vision and development strategy, provide a strong basis for the future.

I wish him, his constituents and all those working on the town's future every success. I regret that I am not in a position to respond to his kind invitation to visit, but I will seriously consider accepting in future.

Southampton Airport

1 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I am very grateful for this Adjournment debate and the opportunity to talk about the expansion of Southampton airport. I hope that I am speaking up on behalf of those of my constituents who will be worst and most directly affected by the proposed expansion. The plans that I shall be discussing today were set out in the airport master plan that was published last summer. It is because that plan will eventually find its way to the desks of Ministers that I thought a debate in the House of Commons would be appropriate.

I must admit that I am not quite sure what the Minister will do with the airport master plan when it arrives. I hope that one thing that we shall clarify today will be what will happen in Government when the master plans are received from various regional airports. I hope that Ministers will take responsibility for what happens at a local level as a result of national Government policy. My fear, I am afraid, is that Ministers may wash their hands of the problems and challenges that arise; that the master plan will be noted but that nothing will be done nationally to ensure that there is protection from the environmental damage that is currently proposed.

The master plan was produced in direct response to the Government's aviation White Paper. The first thing that I want today is an assurance from the Minister that the Government will take whatever measures are needed to ensure that the local environmental impact will be properly assessed, taken into account and dealt with. Secondly, the master plan is, as I shall explain, a very big change from the figures published in the White Paper. I shall be interested to know from the Minister whether the Government are in any way committed to the projections that were published just a couple of years ago.

There is a certain amount of déjà vu for me in the debate. The first ten-minute Bill that I introduced into the House of Commons after my election in 1992 called for greater local planning powers over airport expansion. It is with some regret that I say 14 years later that very little has changed. There are no direct local or strategic planning controls over airport operations. The only controls—I think that this is true in many ways even of massive airports such as Heathrow—come from the need for planning permission for works on the ground. In Southampton's case it is only because new hard standings and improved terminal buildings will be needed that local authority planning will come into play at all.

I still do not believe that it is acceptable that planning controls kick in only because of an accident of the current physical layout of the airport. In any case, the structures are wrong. In our case, the planning authority is Eastleigh district council, which covers the airport but not my constituents, who lie to the south of the site. Southampton district council, the city council, has no direct planning powers at all in relation to the airport.

I presume that Governments have resisted a better planning process because they fear that it might prevent all airport development. I do not think that that is true. As I shall freely acknowledge, the development of Southampton airport has brought significant economic, development and employment benefits. Strategic planning processes are often well able to balance different considerations, and there is no reason why airport development should be the one major industrial activity in this country that is not subject to proper planning. Many people in Southampton would find it extraordinary that, although Ministers recently turned down the vital expansion of the port of Southampton—a decision with far greater economic consequences and far fewer environmental consequences—after a lengthy planning process, no similar process has been followed with respect to the development of the airport.

At the same time, I want the Minister's assurance that the Government will not try to overrule the limited planning powers that currently exist by using the new strategic planning process. It would be quite unacceptable if any future local public inquiry were to be rendered largely irrelevant by a Government declaration that the expansion has regional significance. I hope that we can be given an assurance that the new strategic planning powers will not be used in that way.

One thing is perfectly clear. We cannot rely on the airport operators, BAA, to safeguard the interests of my constituents who live under the flight path. As I will make clear in a moment, I am not as critical of the local airport management as many of my constituents, but it is a sad fact that the master plan made no mention of the immediate environmental impact of airport expansion. It made no mention of the means of controlling, limiting or mitigating the impact in the areas closest to the airport. To do that, we need to look to the local authorities and to the Minister.

It may help the Minister if I provide a sketch of the airport and its environment. The airport lies between Southampton and Eastleigh, occupying the entire gap between the M27 motorway and what is left of Eastleigh's rail works. The single runway runs more or less north-south, ensuring that all takeoffs and landings are directly over residential areas in either Southampton or Eastleigh. The simple truth is that if there were no airport there today it is inconceivable that anyone would give planning permission for any type of airport in that location.

At the southern, Southampton, end, the ground rises relatively sharply to a height of around 300 ft; the rise begins a short distance from the south of the end of the runway and the M27. The rising ground is almost entirely developed as a residential area, with some important local schools. It is that area, Townhill park, that bears the brunt of the noise and disturbance. A small distance to the south is Bitterne park, a contiguous residential area that is also badly affected.

The majority of complaints come from those living on the hill, but there is also a significant impact on those living at a lower height along the east bank of the river Itchen. I should declare an interest at this point, because that is where I live, although somewhat further to the south than most of those who complain about the airport. The impact on those living in the lower area is partly caused by the deliberate decision to route as many flights as possible along the river route—a decision that I support, even though those flights go over the top of my house.

The airport may still be best known outside the city as the site of the maiden flight of R.J. Mitchell's Spitfire. For much of the postwar period, it was a fairly sleepy local airport. The first major development took place in the early 1990s. It was that that prompted my earlier private Member's Bill. At that time, low-cost flights had not been developed. The airport was seen primarily as a "briefcase" airport, concentrating on the business market, with a limited number of charter flights.

The local authorities were able to use their limited planning powers to extract a number of agreements on airport operations, including a ban on night flying. The voluntary agreement to route flights along the river was brought in around this time. It would be wrong to suggest that those controls produced a satisfactory position for local residents. Noise, vortices and general intrusion continued, but to some extent the economics of the airport operation limited the full impact that we had feared in the early 1990s.

That all changed with the advent of local low-cost flights and the operation in Southampton of Flybe. There was a substantial increase in the number of flights by older and noisier aircraft, particularly the BAe 146. The number of early morning flights also increased significantly. That development, with its huge impact on local people, needed no new planning procedures. It was just a change in the economics of airport operation. The public response was very sharp; at that time the airport became—it has stayed—the most significant local constituency issue in my postbag.

Over the past two years there has been pretty constant engagement between local people and the airport. I believe that the airport manager, who has just retired, David Cumming, made a serious effort to listen to what local people were saying, and within the constraints of his job, which was of course to manage and expand an airport, to improve things to some extent. Flybe has also been engaged in that process.

A number of things were attempted. A trial was run which involved alternative routes and allowing the four-engined planes to climb to 3,000 rather than 1,000 ft before levelling out. Unfortunately, the assessment showed a limited impact from those trials, although I and others firmly believe that the local impact on the worst affected areas was positive. It was a shame that the trials were not continued. At long last a better monitoring system was brought in so that aircraft deviating from agreed routes could be identified. Sadly, that has been inoperable for much of the past two years because of problems with the Pease Pottage radar system.

The process of engagement with the airport was not always satisfactory for my constituents. Some meetings became dominated by people who lived a pretty long way from the airport. They had legitimate concerns, but the impact on their lives was far less. It is important at this point to get across to my hon. Friend the Minister exactly how much the airport has grown, and how much it is planned that it will grow. In 1997 there were just under 600,000 passengers and 25,000 aircraft movements. By 2001 there were 803,000 passengers and 27,000 aircraft movements. In 2003 there were 1.138 million passengers and nearly 32,000 movements.

It was in 2003 that BAA made its submission to the Government's consultation on the development of air transport. In that submission it said that Southampton airport could grow to accommodate around 2.5 million passengers by 2030 within its existing boundaries and assuming, as is planned, additional runway capacity at other airports in the south-east. Thus the long-term aim is for 2.5 million passengers by 2030. The Government seem to accept that view. In their White Paper, they referred to

"support for some growth to allow it"— the airport—

"to cater for local demand. The airport operator doubts that the airport could reach the capacity of "

7 million passengers—the figure floated in the Government's consultation—

"and believes that, within its current boundary, the airport would more likely grow to a capacity of"

2 to 2.5 million passengers per annum. That expansion to 2.5 million passengers was greeted with some horror by local residents, but at least it was spread over a lengthy period, with the possibility of quieter aircraft and further restrictions. However, those projections have been torn up in the new master plan. By 2004, the annual passenger numbers had reached 1.5 million, with 37,400 passenger movements. According to the master plan, the number of passengers will be 3 million by 2015—not 2.5 million by 2030—and 6 million by 2030. The number of passenger movements will be 62,000 at the end of that period. It is not surprising that local people have had enough.

The planning controls are very limited. Development will take place on BAA land over the next nine years, although permission will be required for aircraft stands, taxiways and improved check-in facilities. That brings the issue a bit within the local authorities' remit, and Southampton and Eastleigh have considered the master plan. I am on record as saying that both local authorities have been too weak in their dealings with the airport over the years, although I accept that their powers are limited.

In September, Southampton city council resolved that:

"Council acknowledges the important contribution, direct and indirect, made by the Airport to the local and regional economy.

However, Council also recognises that current levels of noise and pollution are understandably a matter of concern to the residents in some parts of the City and believes that addressing these issues should be at the forefront of BAA's plans for the future of Southampton airport."

Unfortunately, the city council's formal submission to BAA did not reflect that strong unanimous resolution and no reference was made to reducing noise pollution. Why that happened is an internal matter for the city council, but I note that its final position was almost identical to the much more positive position taken by the Liberal Democrat leadership of Eastleigh council.

There is no doubt that the airport has brought significant benefits. There are 1,500 jobs there, many of which are done by my constituents, who value the opportunities that the airport has brought them. It is also valuable for business to be able to fly into and out of Southampton as a premier south coast airport. Local surveys also indicate wide public support. I acknowledge all that, but sometimes our job as Members of Parliament is to stand up for the minority and to ask difficult questions that no one else wants to ask.

[Mr. John Denham]

My constituents who live under the flight path are perhaps the minority among those with an interest in the airport, but their rights must be protected. The airport's impact can be judged against several different factors, including noise, vortex damage, pollution and safety. Many of those are not amenable to simple measurement or assessment. As we have found in the past, noise readings taken over an extended period do not capture the impact of individual flights. Nor is it easy to measure the combined effect of noise, disruption, the loss of useable amenities—such as a garden on a summer afternoon—or, indeed, fear.

We had a large public meeting in November, and the position that emerged from it was clear. It is essential that future plans for the airport start from the recognition that the current impact on local people is unacceptable. It is no good asking how much more people can take, because they cannot take any more. On the contrary, the master plan's starting point should be that local residents' quality of life should improve year on year over the entire period covered by the plan. When the plan is finalised, it should identify the key issues raised in the consultation, setting out how they should be measured and assessed and what measures will be taken to reduce their impact.

It is pretty clear that, left to itself, BAA will not take such an approach and that local authorities' powers to enforce it are limited. The Minister must therefore assure me that the Government will do everything they can to ensure that we achieve a strategy to bring about a continuous improvement in the environment of Townhill park and Bitterne park. To start with, key elements of such a strategy will include the need for noise reduction. That will partly involve ensuring that the airport puts in place a good monitoring system so that it can track flights into and out of the airport, and it is beginning to do that. However, there must also be an effective and continuous system of noise monitoring so that we can identify not only levels of background noise but the impact of individual flights. In addition, I hope that the Minister will support moves to put pressure on the airport to require operators to use quieter aircraft. We have been promised that the noisy BAe 146s will be replaced with Brazlian Embraer aircraft, which are supposed to have a quieter profile. The problem is that we have no means of forcing through changes faster than the airlines, for commercial reasons, wish to implement them. I hope that the Minister will tell me today that stronger powers will be made available to enable planning authorities to force the move to quieter aircraft.

The Government's White Paper made the remarkable claim that

"we will require that airport developments are consistent with existing arrangements for the control of the noise impacts of aviation", but there are no effective controls. It says:

"local controls should operate ... so that ... noise impacts are limited, and where possible reduced over time".

I agree, but I hope that the Minister can tell me exactly how that is meant to happen. Can she assure me that a local authority could refuse planning permission for further development on the grounds—and solely on the grounds—that no agreement had been reached to reduce noise impacts over time? Such measures will be essential for the future life and well-being of my constituents. We need similar measures to monitor, assess and tackle vortex damage, as well as to assess the current levels of air pollution and ensure that they are reduced.

We also need to ensure that safety is properly addressed. A few years ago, the major secondary school under the flight path—Bitterne park school—wanted to build a sports centre, which would have been used for a variety of public activities and would have attracted a large number of visitors. However, the school could not get planning permission, because it was under the airport flight path and it was against Government policy to encourage developments that would attract a large number of people under a flight path. Yet, it is now proposed to have almost three times as many planes flying over the same area, which was deemed unsuitable for a development that would attract a large number of people. I hope that the Minister can explain how safety considerations will be taken into account when Government priorities seem so confused. In my view, it will not be possible to have the scale of expansion currently proposed for Southampton airport while delivering an acceptable environment for my constituents. We need to explore ways in which the airport could be required to have a business model that, for example, put more emphasis on business traffic and less on continuous expansion of the low-cost holiday business. In that way, we can keep the elements of the airport that are essential to local economic development, while minimising the harm to local people.

My final question—I apologise to the Minister for going on slightly longer than I intended—is simply this: does it make sense to plan for 6 million passengers in 2030, given everything that we know about climate change and the rapidly increasing contribution of air transport to greenhouse gases? I do not believe for one moment that public policy will be able to allow the increase in air transport that is implied if we are to deliver what we need to deliver to save our environment. At the Liaison Committee a few weeks ago, the Prime Minister told me that, in his view, the global community would need, by 2012, to have taken the key decisions needed to address climate change. It is difficult to believe that those decisions will allow the uncontrolled expansion of air transport that the present figures imply. I hope that the Minister will tell me that the Government recognise the problem and that the planet's long-term sustainability is, at long last, and after too much delay, being taken into account in aviation policy.

1.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on securing this important debate. I certainly recognise that the points that he addressed are legitimate and growing concerns, both for the communities in Southampton around the airport and, as he mentioned in closing, in terms of the contribution of aviation—among many other strands of the transport industry and domestic use—to climate change and how we address that.

Before I come to those issues, I remind my right hon. Friend that the air transport White Paper, which we published in 2003, was the first attempt to set out a long-term framework to match the development requirements of industry. It provided guidance to communities about how air traffic was likely to develop and gave some confidence to that development process. Explicitly, the White Paper did not do so as part of a "predict and provide" approach—the Government wholly reject the accusation that it did—but to reflect the fact that aviation is a growing sector that has an important contribution to make to the economy, as he recognised in his local context, and reflects people's increasing desire to travel.

Many UK airports are reaching the limits of their capacity. It is therefore important that we consider how some of those benefits and demands can be accommodated, while absolutely rejecting a "predict and provide" model and ensuring that we build in the necessary measures to mitigate some of the disadvantages of air traffic growth at the local, national and global levels.

I shall start with my right hon. Friend's concluding remarks about what the Prime Minister has said is one of the most important challenges facing the planet. The Government recognise that we must ensure that aviation, which is a growing sector, makes a contribution to addressing the urgent challenge of climate change. We know that unilateral action is not likely to be effective, because aviation is by definition a global industry. We are therefore working with other nations through the International Civil Aviation Organisation to promote and develop ways in which aviation can contribute to those aims, developing and introducing better technology, and improving operating practice.

An important achievement that was driven through during the UK presidency of the EU was to bring nearer aviation's entry into the European emissions trading programme. We see emissions trading as the way to ensure that aviation makes a proper contribution to tackling climate change. Compared with the other instruments that are currently available, emissions trading is the most likely to be effective because it provides an economic incentive to reduce emissions. That contrasts with, for example, a more generalised taxation measure, which we have also been called on to introduce.

My right hon. Friend understandably focused his remarks on Southampton. We recognise the economic benefits that regional airports such as Southampton generate for their regions and we support their growth to serve regional and local demand, subject of course to the necessary environmental constraints.

The White Paper invited airport operators to produce master plans setting out their development proposals in response to the conclusions reached in the White Paper. Master plans provide a transparent means for airport operators to explain their development proposals. They help airport operators to take forward the White Paper policy regionally and locally, and to inform stakeholders at all levels. That enables stakeholders to have a say on how the local airport develops. However, I should make it clear that master plans are owned by airport operators, not the Government. As such, master plans do not have development plan status, although the level of detail that they contain may inform local and regional planning processes.

As my right hon. Friend recognises, Southampton airport makes a key contribution to local economic prosperity. More than 1,000 people are directly employed there, more than 500 work in related jobs and, according to an economic impact study of 2004, the airport makes an annual contribution of £86.5 million to the local economy. The air transport White Paper referred to smaller airports such as Southampton as having an important role in the future provision of airport capacity in the south-east. It recognised Southampton as a regional airport and supported growth to allow it to cater for local demand.

The airport expects passenger numbers to grow from the current 1.5 million a year to around 3 million in 2015 and 6 million by 2030. Those forecasts are not subject to Government approval—there are many reasons why forecasts for airports that do not have movement limits set on them may differ from those in the White Paper—but we expect forecasts to be scrutinised in the planning process. If there is an expansion, the figures on which it is based can be brought before the planning process and the forecasts tested for their validity.

BAA published its draft consultative master plan for Southampton in July 2005. The plan detailed how the airport intended to meet the growing demand for regional air travel and gave a commitment to sustainable development and responsible growth. BAA is currently studying the responses to its consultation and I understand that it will write to respondents shortly to outline how it plans to address the key themes that emerged from their consultation. As reflected in my right hon. Friend's comments, those themes were noise, air quality, the potential impact on climate change and surface access.

BAA expected to publish its final master plan by the end of 2005, but the number and content of the responses that it received—800, of which I understand that 100 were quite detailed—encouraged it to carry out further work. BAA now expects to publish its final master plan this summer, alongside a noise strategy, an air quality strategy and a revised surface access strategy.

I hope that it is clear that the master-planning process and the consultation that underpinned it have provided an effective means of identifying local concerns and that they in turn have directly influenced BAA's planning for the airport. I take that as a confirmation of the value of such plans, which were introduced for the first time in the 2003 White Paper.

That is not to suggest that such plans confer planning approval for development, however. Any proposal for expansion would be subject to the planning system in the normal way, taking account of the policies set out in the White Paper and Eastleigh borough council's local plan. It is for the local development plan to address the development of the airport. The local plan and the local development frameworks must take account of the regional development strategy when it is finalised next year.

My right hon. Friend is concerned about noise. Southampton airport is designated under section 35 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, which requires it to provide a proper forum for consultation with users, local authorities and local representative organisations. All airports so designated, including Southampton, have chosen to establish consultative committees. The airport is subject to normal planning controls, and the local planning authority may set such noise-related or other environmental conditions on new developments as it considers appropriate. I hope that that goes some way to answering my right hon. Friend's question.

[Ms Karen Buck]

I understand that the airport has a range of noise mitigation measures. Scheduled night flights are banned and a flying controls agreement is in place with Eastleigh borough council, which lays down operating guidelines to ensure that noise is kept to a minimum and hours of operation are limited. Noise-sensitive operations are restricted and noise preferential routes are in operation to avoid, as far as possible, the most heavily populated areas.

I understand that the airport began a trial of new take-off and landing procedures last July to try to minimise the impact of noise on local people. The trial is due to be completed at the end of October and the results will be reviewed by the airport's technical working group. The Government's policy, reflecting the individuality of airports, remains that local noise problems should be tackled with local solutions. The airport's flying controls agreement with Eastleigh borough council is a good example of that approach.

The provisional local transport plan for Hampshire notes that many factors contribute to air pollution, which my right hon. Friend mentioned. It also records the preparation of an air quality action plan, which is intended to address the issues that have resulted in Eastleigh being declared an air quality management area.

Unfortunately, I am about to run out of time, but I undertake to write to my right hon. Friend about the other issues that he raised. I very much hope that BAA will read this debate with interest and take proper account of the concerns that he expressed on behalf of his constituents.

Second Homes (Cornwall)

1.29 pm

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I welcome the opportunity to have this debate, and welcome the Minister for Housing and Planning. This issue has been on-running for some time in our part of the world and in national parks and other areas that are popular for holiday-making. In Cornwall, it has reached crisis point with homelessness figures and the unaffordability of local housing to local people on local wages. Many people who do not come up in the homelessness figures, but who are looking for homes and cannot afford them are also affected, such as young people who live with their families and others who have left the county because of work and the housing situation, but who would like to live where they were born and brought up.

The number of second homes in Cornwall has been growing substantially, although the figures are not easy to determine in detail. The rawest figures suggest that the number of second homes—homes for which people are essentially getting council tax discounts, which are unoccupied for most of the year and which are used by families only for holidays, and are not used commercially—has risen from 9,233 in 2000 to 13,221 in 2005. That is a growth of more than 40 per cent. Almost 4,000 of what were mainly family homes are no longer available to local people. The total number of households in Cornwall is 215,000, so more than 6 per cent. are now second homes of that sort. That does not include holiday homes to let that have come through the business rating system.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): My hon. Friend makes a good point. He will be aware that on the Isles of Scilly, which are part of my constituency, nearly 25 per cent. of the housing stock is second homes. In a survey of estate agents that I undertook in my constituency last year, I found that twice as many properties sold in the previous year had gone to second home usage than to first-time buyers. That amplifies the seriousness of the situation.

Matthew Taylor: My hon. Friend makes a good point about the Scillies, but the problem is not only there, it also affects popular holiday communities around Cornwall. Official figures for St. Just in Roseland parish show that there are 234 second and holiday homes and 596 homes in which people are in full-time residence. Second home ownership in some Cornish parishes is as high as 80 per cent., taking holiday lets into account. A survey conducted in Portscatho suggested that 85 per cent. of properties are unoccupied most of the year. That is not a small village; it is quite a substantial one. Manaccan on the Lizard peninsular, with which my hon. Friend will be familiar, also has a figure of more than 80 per cent.

To put those figures in context, in the same period there was an increase in social housing. While there were 4,000 extra second homes, the net increase in social housing was 51—just over 1,000 properties were built, but nearly 1,000 were sold through the right to buy. Indeed, since the right to buy was introduced, more than 10,000 council houses in the county have been sold. That is a third of the stock.

In north Cornwall, there are 3,797 second homes—I reiterate that I refer to homes used only by their owners' families and friends and which are not rented out commercially—compared with 4,595 local authority and registered social landlord homes. The number of second homes in north Cornwall is approaching that of homes available for affordable housing, and far exceeds that number when commercially let properties are taken into account. There is a similar problem with building developments. In 2004–05, 2,000 homes were built, of which all but 231 were private commercial developments.

All that takes place in a county in which homelessness is a serious issue. In 2004–05, 1,213 households were found newly homeless, of which 875 were considered to be in priority need.At the end of September 2005, more than 1,000 homeless households were placed in temporary accommodation through local authorities, and 15,600 were on the housing register in the county in 2004–05. It is interesting to put those figures in the context of vacancies among local authority and RSL housing. In north Cornwall, there were only 272 vacancies, but more than 2,000 individuals were accepted on the homeless register, which includes only those individuals who are deemed to be in need of social housing. It will not include young adults of working age because they are not considered to be in that sort of need. People have to be disabled, have children or be elderly to qualify, or there must be some other relevant factor.

The most recent figures that I have been given include only second homes under the council tax discount—there is still a 10 per cent. discount—but according to people to whom I have spoken, those data are dubious. Others researching this issue may be aware of that. I make that point because the Minister may refer to that council tax data, according to which second home numbers appear to have remained fairly constant since 2002, and even to have declined in some parishes. However the people to whom I have spoken say that that is not representative of the true issue. Housing officers and county council statisticians all say that those official figures do not reflect the real situation. What evidence of that is there? The deputy chair of the Cornwall branch of the National Association of Estate Agents confirms that estate agents report no decline in the number of people buying second homes in the county. Local communities reporting to district and county housing officers and statisticians say that that the number of second homes in their villages and towns is greater than official figures suggest. That has been confirmed to me by district council housing officers.

A survey conducted by Crantock parish council in 2004 concluded that actual second home numbers are far higher than the census figures. For Manaccan, census figues put second home ownership at 25.2 per cent., but the parish council figure is more like 80 per cent. Similarly, official figures for Veryan parish show 116 second and holiday homes compared to 427 resident households, but in Portscatho, which is one of the major communities in that area, and which is similar to others, an actual household survey suggested that more than 80 per cent. of properties were owned by people who were not in full-time residence. In such places, one has only to look at the blank windows on winter evenings to know that that is obviously true.

In Portloe, I was approached by a constituent who is looking for housing. He works as an odd-job man in the area and is obviously on a low income. He had just been given notice to leave the last full-time rented property in the parish. All other rented properties are rented as holiday accommodation, so the best that he could get was a winter let. That vacancy had come about because—surprise, surprise—the property was being sold as a second home.

Why does the problem with data exist? There are a number of reasons for it, and it is important that the Minister is aware of them, because they are significant issues for Government as well as for us in the county. Restrictions on time and resources are impacting negatively on the quality of data gathered through the census, but I draw the Minister's attention to the fact that council tax data seem to be increasingly more misleading. That might be an unforeseen—or partly foreseen because there was comment about the possibility of tax avoidance—consequence of people seeking to minimise their tax knowing that they can get a 50 per cent. discount on second homes, rather than only a 10 per cent. council tax discount. The senior research officer at the county council told me:

"With council tax my understanding is that it is financially more advantageous for some owners of what really are second homes to pay business rates. Also I don't think this is quantifiable unless research has been done which I don't know about, but it is said that some couples with two properties register one of them in each of the two properties and each pays council tax with a single person discount . . . Those are just two reasons why the figures may be dodgy."

The loss of the second homes council tax incentive means that there is a potential financial advantage for couples or family members to register as single occupants of properties. They then qualify for a 25 per cent. discount, and often look forward to inheritance tax advantages in the future. Young adults living with their parents might be registered as living at second homes in order to minimise council tax payments there and future tax liabilities. Alternatively it may be financially advantageous to a register a second home as a small business and apply for small business rate relief. The anecdotal evidence confirms that.

A member of the treasury team at Kerrier district council reported an increase in the number of domestic property addresses submitted on the last batch of forms for small business rate relief. He noted a drop in the number of second homes registered compared with the previous year. People are swapping across. Restormel and Carrick both confirmed that and I was provided with a specific example in Kerrier, which gives a measure of the financial advantage of doing that. A property in Kerrier district council that is currently in council tax band B—a small property with a council tax that is not particularly high—would, with the 10 per cent. second home discount, be subject to £836.46 in council tax. However, if it were registered as part of a small business, it would be subject to £809.25, which would be the full business rate, but if an application were made for the 50 per cent. small business discount, the bill would be reduced to £404.63. That is a clear incentive to make the change, even without issues such as capital gains tax avoidance and inheritance tax further down the line.

If that were happening to a great extent, one would expect the process to filter through to the holiday-homes-to-let market. The figures are incomplete because if people say that they are registering as a letting business but do not bother to let the property they do not necessarily come into contact with the tourist associations. Even setting that aside, in 2001 there were 2,895 self-catering accommodation businesses in Cornwall and in 2005 there were 4,111, the great majority of which were hired holiday homes. That is significant growth, to say the least, and there are likely to be thousands more. Those figure show that, contrary to the indication from council tax figures on second homes that there has been a slight decline in numbers, there has been an increase of more than 1,000. Taking the two together, it is not unreasonable to assume that about 10 per cent. of all properties in Cornwall are likely to be holiday homes or second homes. Those homes used to be for full-time family use.

[Matthew Taylor]

I hope that I do not need to spell out the resulting issues in too much detail, but I will run through them. First, this is money coming in from other parts of the country from people who are wealthy enough either to invest in a small business—letting the property—or to have it simply as a second home. Many people can afford to do that. It undoubtedly contributes to rising house prices because it adds a huge extra demand to the market. The average house price in Cornwall confirms that prices bear no relation to local incomes. The average house price in Cornwall is now just over £208,000, compared with £191,000 in England and Wales, yet our wages are 25 per cent. below the national average. According to Shelter and others, that is the worst affordability gap in the country and worse than London where house prices are higher, but incomes are much higher.

Since 1999, national house prices have risen by 97.9 per cent. and that created headlines about inflationary house price rises. However, in Cornwall the rise has been 153.1 per cent. Yet wages have fallen further behind the national average in the same period, so it has clearly not been driven by people in the local housing market. That has also led to the erosion of community fabric as family members are priced out of the market and forced either to move away or to live in the family home. Tight-knit communities have been weakened as a result.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. Does he agree that the effects that he is describing could have an impact on the excellent education system that is provided in Cornwall because of the decline in numbers in small village schools, which will create problems in future?

Matthew Taylor: My hon. Friend is right, and I was about to come to the reduced use of local services. Those services include not only schools, but pubs, post offices and buses, and reduced use sometimes results in the closure of services. I shall give a couple of examples.

The first is from my constituency. St. Mawes is a large community but the combination of retirees and the holiday market means that it can scarcely maintain a two-classroom school. Numbers have been declining and the school may be lost altogether. Crantock is another example, which is familiar to my hon. Friend. Two stores have closed, the playgroup has folded, the youth club is struggling, pubs have few out-of-season customers, and the village hall, churches and charity organisations are all reporting difficulties in maintaining themselves. In that area, 80 per cent. of homes are reported to be holiday homes or some sort of second homes.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): I am sure that my hon. Friend is also aware that the regional spatial strategy that the regional assembly is proposing includes a huge increase in house build in the most urbanised areas of the county. That will exacerbate the problem even more. Villages need homes to help to maintain sustainability, but they are not being built in those places.

Matthew Taylor: I thank my hon. Friend. These shocking figures come from new research, although the Minister may have seen similar material from his civil servants. It has taken a great deal of work to put the material together because it is not readily available through the local authority due to the difficulties in determining what is actually going on.

I want the Minister to consider some serious solutions. First, it is evident from what I have said that we need a serious study of what is going on. Perhaps it could be piloted in Cornwall where there is evidence of the effect of the second-home discount. I welcome the change because the discount seems to have thrown people into various tax avoidance schemes with no proper measure of what is going on. We need some serious work on the impact, not only in Cornwall, but in national parks and similar areas, which seem to be suffering similar problems. Otherwise, funding and planning decisions, not least on house build, will be taken on the wrong basis and the Government will lose cash for local communities, which they should not do. Local councils which need that money to build affordable homes will also lose.

The second issue is the need to tighten up the application process for small business rate relief. Under Government rules, it seems that all that people with second homes need to do to cut their tax is to say that those homes are available to rent for 140 days a year. They just have to tick a box on a form and do not have to provide any evidence that they have marketed the property, let alone that they have actually rented it out. In many cases, the community does not even benefit from more visitors because the property is occupied for only two or three weeks a year when the family take advantage of it. Yet they benefit from a cut in tax and the local council loses money that is currently being invested in building new affordable homes, which is what the extra money from second-home council tax is being used for.

The third issue is that it is important to ensure that the extra funds obtained from increased council tax charges continue to be ring-fenced and are not included in general council income. Councils have a discretionary power to raise the council tax from 90 per cent. and 50 per cent. and to get rid of the discount. In Cornwall that money is predominantly being transferred to the districts to build new homes. For example, in 2004–05 such money delivered real results on the ground with 20 houses in Penwith, 10 in Kerrier, 28 in Carrick, 35 in Restormel, 34 in North Cornwall and six in Caradon.

Many more are in the process of being built. Such results depend on the money being ring-fenced, and I hope that the Minister can offer some reassurance on that. They also depend on people paying, and if they continue to move their holiday homes to business rates that money will dry up.

When we have sorted out the tax avoidance issues, I believe that owners of second homes might pay more rather than less council tax than someone with a normal, full-time home. I shall not give a figure and I am not into penalising those people, but it is normal in the tax system—for example, VAT—to pay little or nothing for essentials but to pay the full rate for things that are less essential. For example, we do not pay VAT on food or children's clothes, but in the housing market people still pay less council tax for a second home than for the home they live in. That seems to be an oddity in the system.

My most important call is for the Government to examine the planning system. The national parks have done so with new build—not with total Government support—by introducing restrictions on new build and insisting that it is used for full-time occupation. However, there are still two planning rules that the Minister must review.

First, barn conversions in rural areas are not allowed for a full-time home, yet they are allowed for a holiday business. That does not make any sense at all and very much angers local communities. In many cases, farmers say that they want to make the conversion for a local person, and that they will charge an affordable rent, but they are not allowed to do so, perhaps because of misplaced sustainability concerns.

Secondly, it is most important that the Government reconsider giving local authorities planning control powers to stop full-time homes being converted to second homes in ever-increasing numbers. I know that it would be hard to police, but there are good tax reasons for policing such conversions. If they are not policed, there may be substantial capital gains tax avoidance. There is also the business rates issue and potential inheritance tax avoidance.

Policing the development of second homes is necessary anyway, but in communities where 60, 70 or 80 per cent. of homes are being turned into holiday homes and where the demand appears to be insatiable, it is vital that councils can say, "Enough is enough." Frankly, if they do not, there will be no point in building new homes in Cornwall. From figures that I obtained today about houses built over the past five years, it appears that at least one of every two has, in effect, gone into the holiday and second home market. Therefore, we are not tackling the housing problem in Cornwall.

1.51 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): I thank the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor) for securing this debate and for using it to raise the important issue of housing availability and affordability in Cornwall. The Government take the matter of housing affordability seriously, and we recognise that problems of affordability must be addressed in all parts of the country. Sometimes, affordability is talked about as if it affects only London and the south-east, but, clearly, it does not. It affects different regions in different ways, according to the different circumstances that arise.

Average house prices in the south-west are over £200,000 and are the fourth highest in the country. The average price figure that I have for Cornwall of £202,396 is slightly different from the hon. Gentleman's figure, but similar.

Housing is also a problem for first-time buyers. It can be difficult for many hard-working families and households to pay for starter homes, which can be expensive. There are more than 1 million more home owners than in 1997, largely as a result of lower mortgage rates, but the pressures on the housing market in general mean that first-time buyers in particular face pressures.

In the south-west, the ratio of lower quartile house prices to lower quartile earnings is 8.46, compared with an average for England of 6.8. We know that there are particular pressures in Cornwall, that house price pressures can have not just a social but an economic impact, and that they can affect the sustainability of local communities.

It is important to put the problem in a national context. The south-west cannot be treated in isolation, although there are some specific issues around the nature of the local economy and the environment in that area. However, there is also a wider context: during the past 30 years, the number of households has increased by 30 per cent. but house building has fallen by more than 50 per cent. Nationally, each year, 190,000 new households are created, but only 150,000 new homes are built.

The level of house building has increased, but it must increase further. Otherwise, in about 20 years' time, only one third of 30-year-old couples will be able to afford to buy their own home. That is unacceptable, as it does not meet people's aspirations or housing need. That is why more market homes, more shared-equity homes and more social housing must be built. Further proposals to do that have been set out in the Barker review. They include changing the planning system and consulting on a planning gain supplement to raise additional resources for infrastructure, as well as increasing environmental standards.

The Government recognise that the challenges facing each region are different. There is high demand across London, the south-east and most of the east of England. Rising incomes are matched by even higher housing demand, which is not matched by housing supply. In the northern regions, areas of high demand are sometimes alongside areas of low demand, which creates different challenges.

In the south-west, there is a problem of housing supply not keeping up with housing demand. It is clear that there is a need to build more homes to meet demand. However, the position is more complex because incomes are lower than in other parts of the country, there are higher retirement levels in certain parts of the south-west and, of course, there are the issues around second homes that the hon. Gentleman raised, which are acute in particular areas.

The regional spatial strategy must take seriously all those different aspects and the need for more new homes in the south-west, but it must ensure that building is done in a sustainable way. That means matching strategies for new house building with strategies for economic regeneration and development—jobs and housing must be considered together—and the location of homes must be considered as well. There is an issue around the long-term sustainability of rural communities, given the additional pressures that they face.

[Yvette Cooper]

The Government are increasing investment in affordable housing. Of the eight regions, the south-west has received the largest increase in its regional housing pot, up from £137 million in 2005–06 to £203 million in 2007–08. That is a significant increase. The south-west regional housing body proposes providing up to 9,500 more affordable homes in the next two years, up from the 6,000 homes that were provided in 2004. We shall announce the final details of the next programme shortly, but it includes significant increases for the west Cornwall market area. I know that Cornwall county council and the six district authorities are also considering new measures to address the problem.

Matthew Taylor rose—

Yvette Cooper: I have only three minutes, and I want to address the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised about second homes, if that is all right. He raised questions about the number of second homes. Obviously, it is difficult for me to respond in detail to some of the questions about the evidence base, but I shall look into the matter further. I certainly take seriously the points that he raised about council tax avoidance and business rate relief and shall look into them further.

The Government will continue to support the revenue for affordable housing that is raised for districts from the changes to the council tax discount. It lasts from 2004 to 2009 and generates some £3 million per year extra subsidy for the provision of affordable housing in Cornwall.

The hon. Gentleman raised some wider issues around second homes. We must recognise that the position is complex, as second home ownership can have a positive impact on the economy if it supports tourism, and the jobs and incomes that depend on it. The Government asked the Affordable Rural Housing Commission to consider in more detail the pressures that are created by second homes, and their impact on rural areas. The commission is also considering where new homes should be built and sustainability for small communities and villages, particularly if there are high levels of retirement in the area. We must ensure that communities have a long-term future and not simply an ageing population.

The Affordable Rural Housing Commission was set up in July 2005 to consider the evidence and to reach consensus on the relevant issues that impact on affordable housing needs in rural areas. It is due to report in the spring this year—in fact, in only a few months' time—and we will look closely at its proposals and any issues that it raises.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 1 March 2006

[MR. CHRISTOPHER CHOPE in the Chair]

Regional Casinos

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.30 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): A few moments ago, I was concerned because we had no Minister with us. I think that the odds were 15 to 2 on him appearing on time.

This debate is rightly entitled "Regional Casinos" because the compromise reached before the last general election when the Gambling Bill went through Parliament was that the number of regional casinos—the largest to be allowed to operate—would be restricted to one. Previously, there had been considerable debate about numbers. It may help if I say at the outset that a partial objective of this debate is to argue the case that it is in the interest of Britain as a whole that we increase the number of regional casinos, rather than restrict their number to one. That would allow a better scale of response to the experimentation that they represent.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a compelling case for having eight regional casinos? That would give local authorities unparalleled opportunities for local regeneration. If they engage the local communities who go along with the process, that would be best for the people and the authorities.

Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend invites me on to territory that I will certainly get to later on. His point is central to the case throughout the whole nation; we need to consider the numbers. For the record, it is worth reminding Members that the Government have established a casino panel chaired by Professor Stephen Crow. On the instructions of the Secretary of State, it will ensure that locations satisfy the need for the best possible test of social impact, which may require a range of locations of different kinds, such as seaside resorts, edge-of-town developments or inner city centres. Those locations will also include areas in need of regeneration, as measured by unemployment and other social deprivation data, that may be likely to benefit from a new casino.

It is worth restating that point because it is the framework within which the case for Manchester can be put—I want to put the case for my own city as a location of a regional casino—but it is also the basis for the case that says that one regional casino will not be enough, as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dunbartonshire (Mr. McFall) argued. I would like to put the case that we should move towards the eight casinos to which my right hon. Friend referred, which was the number in the Gambling Bill when it was first put before the House.

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I am following the profound logic of what my hon. Friend is saying. Does he agree that it is not possible to test the social impact in just one place? A seaside town is very different from a major city. London is different from the rest of the United Kingdom. Suburban areas are different, and Scotland is different. The logic of testing social impact implies up to eight regional casinos, so that we can understand what would happen.

Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will share the logic of the case for a casino in Manchester, which is profound in itself, but he would also share the logic that it makes sense to consider the case for more. We need a proper base to examine the impact of regional casinos, as well as that of the large and small ones. We need that base because regional casinos are different in scale to such an extent that it is difficult to argue that experimentation with large casinos would allow us to know the potential future impact of regional casinos. We need to know specifically how to effect proper partnerships between local authorities—the holders of the public interest—and private partners.

We need to consider the commercial viability of regional casinos. We need to consider what we mean by regeneration opportunities and how they can be seriously translated into practice. And, of course, we need to consider how we can minimise and avoid the potential hazards, such as the existence of criminality in casinos, the abuse of those who are underage and questions of problem gambling. Those issues are all central and can only be dealt with if we have a range of regional casinos so that we can establish what is best practice.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): My hon. Friend, like me, represents a city where deprivation and unemployment are high compared with the rest of the country. Does he agree that although we need a diverse pilot to consider all the different areas of the country, and although regeneration and the need for jobs and employment have to be taken into account, there has to be some kind of guidance and unionisation? Ensuring unionisation in such casinos will go a long way to solving some of the problems that people keep putting forward.

Tony Lloyd: As my hon. Friend would expect, since we both have a strong background in trade unions, I expect any casinos in Britain to operate by the best standards of employment practice, which include, of course, a role for trade unions. That is good for those who work there and, in the long run, for the casino operators and their relationship with the wider community.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The debate seems likely to develop into many interventions and speeches urging the Minister to expand the number of casinos in the pilot. Through my hon. Friend, may I urge the Minister not to do that? In some ways, the Minister is a political croupier in charge of the decision. The option that was decided a few months ago was correct, and the Methodist Church and the Salvation Army were correct. Therefore, as political croupier, I hope that the Minister will say in his winding-up speech, "Rien ne va plus".

Tony Lloyd: I am not sure of my hon. Friend's Norman French. I can only say to him that—alas—although he exhorts me to urge the Minister to restrict the number, I cannot agree with him. My right hon. Friend the Minister will have heard his comments, but I hope that he will listen more to the louder voices from elsewhere in this debate.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I am a Member of Parliament for Blackpool, one of the tourist resorts that wants one of these casinos. I listened to my hon. Friend listing the organisations that should determine where the casinos should be, but does he agree that local people should also be consulted? To pick up on an earlier intervention, the local community needs to be fully behind the process so that the regeneration potential can be maximised.

Tony Lloyd: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend and shall make the case as to why that applies to my city of Manchester and its preferred location for a regional casino. She makes a point that applies wherever casinos should be located: they should have fundamental local support.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on getting this debate this morning. He will be aware that if any of the schemes went ahead and the numbers increased, there would be strong regulation, with built-in safeguards that would allay a lot of fears people have about casinos, particularly in relation to young people. Is he aware that we already have a casino in Coventry, which would meet the criteria should the Minister and the Government decide to expand the numbers? We have one at the arena in Coventry, which is a very modern arena—probably one of the latest in the country—and we already have 90,000 sq ft that could accommodate a casino right away. The area where it would be located—

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. That is long enough.

Tony Lloyd: Thank you Mr. Chope.

Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Lloyd: I will in time, but it will be in everybody's interests if I try to make a little progress.

It is already quite obvious, with some opposition, that the significant view in this debate is from people who want to see the number of casinos increased towards eight or whatever. That call exists not only among people in the debate, but on a much wider basis. It is important to recognise that other political parties as well as my own have begun to examine that question.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has not gone so far as to say that he will change Government policy—the official position. However, he said on the record recently:

"I was interested to read that the Opposition are prepared to revisit the issue of the number of regional casinos, and it would be interesting if they were to let us know how far they would go with liberalisation."—[Official Report, 30 January 2006; Vol. 442, c. 3.]

He went on to say that the Government themselves wanted to examine what the wider scale of interest in a change would be, so that he could assess whether there was that national demand.

I shall come to the main Opposition party's position shortly. It is probably worth placing on record, however, that in a debate on casinos in the House of Lords in October last year, Lord Clement Jones of the Liberal Democrats made their position clear:

"If the Casino Advisory Panel recommends up to eight regional casinos, and if that decision is informed by the principle of destination gambling, we would be prepared to support an order incorporating that provision."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 October 2005; Vol. 674, c.GC257.]

That was a very helpful statement on behalf of the Liberal Democrats.

Several hon. Members: rose—

Tony Lloyd: Would Members please forgive me? I will most certainly give way soon.

I want to get to the position that is rather difficult to interpret. This is where hon. Members on the Conservative Benches may be interested and may be able to help us all, because it is very difficult to know on which side of the flip and the flop the Conservative party is on the issue.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Lloyd: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am going to quote more senior figures than he in the Conservative party, but at a later stage, I will allow him in to push his own Front Bench in the right direction. That is the role of humble Back Benchers such as myself and him.

Anne Milton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Lloyd: I have already said to the hon. Lady that I will give way shortly.

It will be helpful if we talk about the position of the Conservative party. The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale), who was the shadow Secretary for Culture, Media and Sport before the election, made it clear in recent days that he "did originally suggest that three or four pilots would be a better figure than the Government's proposals of eight".

We know that he was pulled back by the then Leader of the Opposition. The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford went on to say:

"I think if the Government wanted now to revisit that and increase the number they would need to show that something had changed, that there was new evidence. But if they could do that, I would certainly be happy to have a look at it."

The hon. Gentleman is normally seen as a cerebral and intelligent Member of our House, and as someone who takes issues on their merits and so on. Within that context, I welcome his clear commitment that one is no longer a viable number.

Since the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) is present, he can either confirm or deny the following quotation. It was widely reported that when he spoke at the Social Market Foundation gambling seminar on January 19—

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I did not speak.

Tony Lloyd: I am fairly certain that the hon. Gentleman's mouth opened on occasion, because he is reported as having answered questions, which is a difficult thing to achieve without speaking. If he wants to correct me on my understanding of the means of communication, I am happy to reconsider it. However, he is quoted as saying that "the Tories would back an increase" in provision. In fairness to him, he is reported as going on to say

"provided there were other changes in the Gambling Act".

That is a legitimate position, but not one—

Mr. Moss: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Lloyd: Of course I will give way, but let me finish the comment.

Mr. Moss: That is a complete misquote. I never uttered those words.

Tony Lloyd: I have to take it from the hon. Gentleman that he did not utter those words. There was an off-the-record briefing reported by Matthew Garrahan in the Financial Times the following day. It was confirmed in spirit by other people who were at the seminar. The hon. Gentleman may want to clarify in his own remarks exactly where he stands. The perception is that once again, rather like the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford, who was pulled back by an irate Leader of the Opposition, the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire—having followed the debate carefully and being a man who takes such matters seriously—faced the same problem whereby his own Front Bench were not willing to move forward with that rather more intelligent view of where we as a nation need to go.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his position. I understand the situation, as I have been in that position in the hierarchy of power. I simply regret that, to use the technical expression, he was shafted.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Tony Lloyd: Before I give way, I want to return to my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham). He made an important point. I shall make it slightly embarrassing for him, because the real Tory party, which still wins things in the country, and I refer to Ken Taylor, the leader of Coventry city council, makes the same case as my hon. Friend whereby there is a profound case for Coventry's consideration for a regional casino. Mr. Taylor has made it clear that he will campaign to ensure that the Leader of the Opposition and the present shadow Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport turn themselves away from their dead end of a policy.

Mr. Moss: I intended to bring my big guns to bear at the end when I wound up, but it is important to get the matter in context. The Government have a majority. To change the number of regional casinos from one to eight, all they need is a statutory instrument using the affirmative procedure. They could do it tomorrow; they do not need any support from the Opposition Benches.

Tony Lloyd: I would prefer to do many things without the support of hon. Members from the Opposition, but there is much broader consensus than simply within my party about the matter. Senior figures in the Conservative party—the leader of Coventry city council is one—want that change.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing such an important debate. Is he aware of an excellent report produced by Hall Aitken, an independent economic consultant based in Glasgow, Manchester and Newcastle, which points out that the social costs of regional casinos are potentially high and that for most locations, they would almost certainly outweigh any economic benefit? I believe that to be true of Glasgow. Does he share my concern that it could also be true of other towns and cities? Does he agree that more balanced analysis and evidence are needed before we increase the number of regional casinos?

Tony Lloyd: Central to my own case, in Manchester, we do not believe that that is the position; we believe that the economic and social benefits far outweigh the disadvantages. Otherwise, I would not be standing here this morning. The case that Manchester would make is a case that would be made by other communities. I do not see it being forced on a reluctant Glasgow, but if Glasgow does not want a casino, it should be a decision for Glasgow, and it should not stop the rest of the country. I must give way to a few Members whom I have promised already.

Anne Milton: My concern is that the regeneration argument about which many people are talking is in fact illusory and that local authorities are allowing wishful thinking to get in the way of their judgment. They are not taking account of the considerable weight of evidence that says that the economic benefits will not benefit those local communities and that the social cost will be extremely high. Those casinos will rely on slot machines. That is where they will make their money, and that means local people putting their money into slot machines. Regeneration will not happen, and there is much evidence to support that argument.

Tony Lloyd: I am not sure whether the hon. Lady is saying that she does not like slot machines or that there will be no regeneration impact. She must be precise. Slot machines already exist, and we are talking about having them on a different scale. I am happy to discuss regeneration and, if I can get through all the interventions, will explain why I believe there will be a strong regeneration impact. That may not apply everywhere, but it certainly will in a city like mine.

[Tony Lloyd]

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman mentioned my party's policy. We have, of course, changed, and we are listening carefully to people. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the NOP poll that showed that 56 per cent. of the population and 64 per cent. of women do not want a casino? Any hon. Members who want the casino destined for south Essex when the report comes out in December is welcome to it.

Tony Lloyd: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman is a member of the listening Conservative party. He referred to his party's policy, but I am not clear what that policy is at the moment or whether it is, as the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford once said, in favour of the increase that the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire does or does not want, depending on whether he did or did not say the words that he was reported to have said. I am not clear either whether that is the present position of the Leader of the Opposition.

We cannot run our political system simply with reference to opinion polls and snapshots.

David Taylor: The Tories would.

Tony Lloyd: The Tories are certainly now focus-group focused. The notorious habit known as flip-flop on the Opposition Front Bench causes a problem.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that many of us are as committed as he is to attracting investment for the regeneration of our towns and cities, but do not want it on the back of further large-scale commercial gambling that just makes money for big businesses and wrecks lives? Does he accept that for many of us one casino is already one too many?

Tony Lloyd: I accept that some people argue that case. The compromise was whittled down to one and, remarkably, supported by very few hon. Members. Those who were opposed were opposed absolutely, but of those who were in favour probably all wanted more but did not have the guts to force that through before the election. That is the reality.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): I understand that the hon. Gentleman must partake in party political jousting about the role of the Opposition, but we should weigh the evidence from both sides, and there is considerable evidence from organisations such as the Methodist Church, as the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said, the Salvation Army and Citizens Advice of the impact of casinos on lower socio-economic groups who do not have the income to sustain a gambling habit. We weigh the anticipated increase in problem gambling against a wish list from large organisations, gaming companies, opportunistic local authorities and, of course, Her Majesty's Treasury, which is after the income from tax.

Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman accuses me of party politicking, but when the Opposition make it so easy, it is difficult not to ridicule their position with its total lack of clarity and its continual change. The hon. Gentleman should talk to his Front Bench and ask his leadership to sort out its policy. Is their position that of Ken Taylor in Coventry?

A number of hon. Members, but not many who are here today, have asked about the regeneration impact and doubted whether it would translate into practice. During my remaining few moments, I want to refer to a report from Europe Economics. So that there is no ambiguity, I should explain that Europe Economics is an independent consultancy and was commissioned by Manchester city council, which wanted an independent assessment of the impact of regional casinos.

Europe Economics made a number of methodological points that are worth stating because they are interesting to a wide audience. It made the central point that any proposal from a local authority had to have a credible local authority behind it. At one level that is obvious, but not all local authorities have the capacity to deliver such complicated and important projects if they are to deliver the benefits that those of us who support regional casinos want. It made the point that any regional casino would need to demonstrate commercial viability. That is also obvious at one level because without commercial viability the regeneration process that should follow cannot be delivered.

The regeneration process is fundamental. My hon. Friend the Minister and the Secretary of State made it clear to the panel that that regeneration will be a central part of the process and that the regeneration impact must be demonstrated. It concluded by saying that, not least in the hierarchical sense but after the other issues had been examined, there would have to be a proper examination of the social impact—some hon. Members have raised this with me—in terms of issues such as the absence of criminality from casinos which is important, the prevention of under-age entry to casinos and gaming areas, and forestalling increases in problem gambling.

Those issues are important as part of the methodological approach, and I hope that the panel will adopt them because it is important that we have the reassurance of a sound methodology. However, it was slightly patronising of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) to talk about the lower socio-economic groups as being those who might be caught up in problem gambling.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is aware of what I meant.

Tony Lloyd: I am totally aware of what the hon. Gentleman means. I represent a constituency that is composed largely of people from those groups and my constituents would probably regard with disdain the idea that they are fickle and feckless and that only people like the hon. Gentleman are immune to the problem. He should be careful in his choice of language if he wants to pursue that case. However, there is a real issue concerning problem gambling and we must all address it.

We are confident that Manchester's bid [illegible]ased on sound economics as well as a sound social strategy. The casino would be in Sports City, which is in my constituency. That is why I sought this debate.

Sports City is already a successful part of regeneration in Manchester. It houses the new east Manchester stadium, the home of Manchester City's football ground, and is where the Commonwealth games took place. We have demonstrated in that area that economic and social regeneration follows economic investment and if the two are matched sensibly and intelligently, they can have a profound impact on the delivery of sustainable economic growth and the restoration of sustainability in our communities. Of those hon. Members who look down on the lower socio-economic groups, few would know what east Manchester was like when the Labour Government took office and about the transformation that has taken place since.

The proposal for a casino would result in investment of around £250 million—that is large-scale investment—and the creation initially of around 2,300 jobs, 900 of which would be targeted on the very local community. That is important as part of the development not simply of the viability but of the popularity of a regional casino in the local community. On the back of that, there would be a centre of excellence for the training of people in the hospitality and customer care industries. Again, that is important in a city such as Manchester where the service economy is so dominant. That would grow from the development as a second-round impact, which is important to the regeneration debate.

There would be community access to local sports and community groups because sporting facilities would be part of the casino complex. The city and would-be developers are committed to an independent analysis and practical methods to tackle the potential downside of a casino. I am confident that the package would be good for my constituency, my city and my part of my region.

Some hon. Members are opposed to regional casinos. That is fine. They are entitled to pursue their arguments and to debate them thoroughly. Their position is legitimate. What is very different is though for most of the rest of us, I believe, is the numbers game. To return to my theme, is it possible to have proper experimentation with regional casinos if there is only one? My central case is that there is a good economic and regeneration argument for regional casinos, but it can be properly examined only if we increase the number from one at present to somewhere around the eight originally envisaged, so that we as a nation can properly assess the impact of casinos in our national life.

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. Before calling Dr. John Pugh, may I appeal to hon. Members, particularly those who have not already made speeches in the form of interventions, to keep their remarks brief?

10 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I was on the Joint Committee that gave the Gambling Bill some pre-legislative scrutiny, so I know more about this topic than I wanted to. To some extent, I approached it with scepticism, as I could never understand why a socialist Government, whom one supposed would at some time want to redistribute wealth from the rich to the poor, would wish to encourage gambling, which seems to do exactly the reverse. However, the Bill was defended rigorously in the House with the suggestion that the prospect of regeneration was attached to it, plus, of course, and not to be missed, the prospect of a certain amount of voluntary taxation being paid by the public.

None the less, it has been accepted throughout that casinos are problematic. First, they are not necessary for regeneration, and, secondly, even as vehicles for regeneration, they have mixed effects. Yes, they create employment, but they also knock out many local businesses, which are replaced by big concerns.

Mrs. Humble: As a member of the Joint Committee that scrutinised the draft legislation, the hon. Gentleman will recall that it supported the development of resort and destination casinos to redevelop our seaside towns and give them new opportunities and a future. Why is he now denying that?

Dr. Pugh: One does not agree with absolutely every word of every report with which one is associated. I am unconvinced, and, when we visited Blackpool, the hon. Lady's constituency, some of the smaller retailers and hoteliers were not completely convinced that they would benefit from the development as designed, as they would be forced out of business by better and more profitable concerns.

We all accept that the proposals must be examined carefully, both as a package and specifically in respect of Blackpool. That point was persistently made. The issue is not just about gambling but many other entertainment industries that would benefit the population and community of Blackpool and the region at large. There was widespread agreement that we needed to make a distinction between destination gambling and ambient gambling, and that was part of the argument against extending the number of casinos.

The second limit put on the process during the course of the Gambling Bill was purely numerical. To some extent, it was determined by fears about social consequences and by a laudable desire to proceed cautiously, and it was embodied in the term "regional casino". A regional casino may carry the tacit presumption that there should be one casino per region, but it may also carry the assumption that it is a regional draw—that whatever is created, whether in Blackpool or anywhere else, is a draw throughout the region and perhaps in other regions as well. Either way, the assumption was that the market should not control the process and that criteria should be set, although throughout the entire debate there was almost an underlying assumption that, whatever was decided, Blackpool would succeed because it was the most preferred. It lobbied extremely well on its own behalf, it had no plan B for regeneration, and everyone accepted that something had to be done.

A panel has been set up to run a kind of beauty contest. Two things are unclear to me, and they lead to the two points that I want to make. First, as the panel proceeds, is the extent of public subsidy a relevant consideration? Regeneration money for the north-west or anywhere else is limited. If it goes to one place, it cannot go to another. I have said in many debates on this subject that, on the continent, public subsidy is not to the fore. In fact, it is more the reverse: money from gambling concerns goes into the public coffers and public infrastructure.

[Dr. Pugh]

I have tried to find out the intentions of the Northwest regional development agency in this affair. It is supportive and sends me brochures and an enormous amount of data on a regular basis. However, it has not confided in me its strategic investment plan: that is, what money, and how much, it wishes to put in, or where and when. That being said, neither does it tell us a variety of other things that we in the north-west would like to find out about, such as funding for such important things as a second Mersey crossing or the Liverpool docks. Such important financial data are largely obscure to democratic representatives in the north-west. What the agency favours and refers to on many occasions are transformational projects. That jargon of the moment seems to mean any project to which is attached high publicity and big expense.

In judging where casinos should go, how much of a genuine concern is public subsidy? How much does it count against any particular proposal, and is it considered when proposals are evaluated?

The second thing that is unclear to me is the regional casino concept itself. Is a casino for a region, or does it draw people to a region? If it is the former, east Manchester and Blackpool certainly compete head to head. There could be a debate about whether we have one or the other, or whether there is room for both. However, if the case for Blackpool is that it will draw people UK-wide and perhaps internationally, right across the piece—to some extent, that is part of the argument for significant public investment to assist the venture—and will not draw in housewives from Barrow, Blackburn and other places, with all the possible social damage that that may cause, the argument for Blackpool and against Manchester does not work. It seems to illustrate a bias against regeneration in Manchester and in favour of regeneration in Blackpool, and it is difficult to make that case coherently, or to demonstrate that it is right.

I am not asking the Government to change their policy, but I defy them to explain it clearly.

10.7 am

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich and Woolwich) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on securing this debate on an important, albeit controversial, subject. The provisions in the Gambling Act 2005 were based on the presumption that casinos could act as a catalyst for regeneration in certain circumstances, bringing significant economic and social benefits. Equally, concerns were voiced about the potential negative impact. In the light of those concerns, the decision was taken to reduce the number of regional casinos from the original proposition of eight to just one.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Just so that we can be historically correct, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the initial proposal was for an unlimited number of regional casinos, not eight? That number came much later in the deliberations.

Mr. Raynsford: I have no reason to quibble with the hon. Gentleman's comment, but I was discussing the period when the Bill was under consideration.

I have no doubt about the potential benefits of a regional casino as an element in the regeneration of the area that I represent in south-east London. It has suffered disproportionately from the decline of the traditional river-based heavy industry, which, when it left, left in a dramatic and damaging way. Huge numbers of people were left unemployed, and the area is gradually recovering from the resulting serious social problems.

The regeneration that is under way in several parts of my constituency includes an ambitious project for the transformation of the Greenwich peninsula around the millennium dome, which, of course, was created for the year 2000. Subsequently, finding a long-term viable solution for it has been a challenge, but work is now under way. The dome itself, now called the $O_2$, will feature a 23,000 capacity arena when it reopens in a year or so. It will host music and other events, including some of the Olympic events in 2012. On most occasions, it will have an evening audience. As the National Audit Office recognised earlier this year in its report considering the project, the income earned from within the arena alone would not generate a fully commercial return, so it is crucial to develop an integrated leisure and entertainment destination by adding other components that will ensure that people come to the area throughout the day and which will attract international as well as national visits. The scheme therefore includes a range of other provision, including a music club, cinemas, a theatre, an exhibition space—there is already a proposal to bring the Tutankhamen exhibition there, which would be a huge attraction and benefit—and a luxury hotel. With regard to the comments from the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh), that will highlight the extent to which there is scope to generate revenue not from people in this country but from international visitors, who would not necessarily be considered as the poor. There may be a redistributive element in that, which he might like to think about. The provision also includes bars, restaurants, cafés and a new pier.

The project is ambitious and one element that would make it far more successful would be a regional casino, which would help to cross-subsidise other components, attract additional visitors, including international visitors, and support the regeneration not only of Greenwich but of many of the deprived areas of south-east London. It is estimated that, with a regional casino, there could be some 500 additional construction jobs during the construction phase and 1,100 jobs during the longer-term operational phase. That would have a significant impact not only on the local economy but more widely in south-east London. We have no doubt, therefore, about the benefits of a regional casino, were we to secure one, in Greenwich. It would be part of a successful regeneration.

We have seen evidence submitted by various organisations. The Hall Aitken report, which has been referred to, cast doubt on whether the estimates for the regenerative benefits in the north-west, Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham and Blackpool would be delivered. I have no basis for commenting on whether that view is valid, but it is certainly not valid for Greenwich. We are confident that a regional casino would bring benefits. However, it would not be right to base an assessment of the potential contribution towards regeneration on one venture only in the unique circumstances of my constituency. Given the clear evidence and interest from many authorities in a range of areas—seaside areas, urban areas, more rural areas, the north, the midlands, London and the south—there must be a wider range of regional casinos from which we can learn lessons as to where they work and promote regeneration and where there are problems. There may be problems, and we need to learn from the initial phase in order to inform future policy developments. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central made a very powerful case that one casino is simply not enough if we are to use it as a test bed to establish whether creating regional casinos supports regeneration.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): The arguments that we have heard about not having more pilots are based on the belief among some hon. Members that some academic research, to which my right hon. Friend has referred, shows that there probably are not benefits or there are disbenefits from regional casinos. Is not the point of the pilot to prove on the ground which academic research is correct and whether the benefits or disbenefits actually exist?

Mr. Raynsford: I agree wholeheartedly and reinforce the point that a judgment cannot be made on the basis of one casino in one discrete location, because the circumstances that might apply in Sheffield, Blackpool or Birmingham will be different from the circumstances in Greenwich. I believe that we have a very strong and attractive proposition for a regional casino in Greenwich, but I accept that different circumstances apply elsewhere and I urge the Minister to reconsider the limitation to one and to accept that we need to conduct a pilot on a wider scale if we are to learn the lessons.

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): I shall begin to call the hon. Members making the winding-up speeches at 10.35 am, which means that we have about 20 minutes left for this part of the debate. I hope that hon. Members will be brief.

10.14 am

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): My constituency already has three casinos, all of which are very successful and which are, in many ways, some of the safest places to be around and within in Southend, compared with some of the pubs and clubs there. I would support there being only one test bed, but on the basis that it was in Southend. I suspect that other hon. Members who want a regional casino in their area would also encourage only one if it was on their patch. The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) made powerful points about a larger number. I was somewhat confused, given that the Gambling Act 2005 allows the Government, through a statutory instrument subject to the affirmative procedure, to increase the number. I would be interested to hear, when the Minister winds up the debate, at what point, the initial casino having been tested, the number would be extended—whether that would be at six, 12 or 24 months.

There are major social impact issues, but as I mentioned, the casinos in Southend are some of the safest places in the area. Southend has high unemployment—4.9 per cent.—and therefore meets the criteria for a regional casino. The local council is keen to bring a regional casino to the town. I admit that I have been concerned at words coming from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister forcing our region to rally behind one proposal. It would not be right to force all politicians and authorities to rally behind just one proposal in a region; we should leave things wide open. In my region, I can see why the Government would think that there is a powerful case for one regional casino at the dome, but I do not necessarily think that that would be right.

My final concern relates to section 106 agreements. One reason why there is such a powerful case for a regional casino in Southend is that it would regenerate the area and, through a section 106 agreement, solve some of the social, economic and physical problems of the constituency, where there has been a cliff slip. However, if, over coming months and years, the Treasury decides that it wants to reform the system of section 106 agreements and to take the planning gain back into the central Treasury pot and redistribute it to other areas, I would be deeply concerned about Southend having a regional casino and about a number of other proposals. I ask the Minister to confirm, if possible, that that is not likely to happen.

10.17 am

Mr. Anthony Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on securing the debate. I will be as brief as I can. I, too, served on the pre-legislative Committee, which sat for 18 months. We considered the proposals over that time and took the view that the open-ended criteria for regional casinos should be changed. The figure of 40 was determined by the Government at the time, but it went down to eight. The situation was accepted not only across the political parties but across the two Houses during the debate. There was no opposition in relation to the final report, so it was a bit disingenuous of the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) to put forward the view that he did.

The same applies to the Conservatives. They did make their point. On 24 January 2005, the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) said:

> "If the Government want to test these proposals, they should do it across the board and limit the number of regional casinos from eight to four. That would, at a stroke, reduce the number of category A machines available from 10,000 to 5,000."—[Official Report, 24 January 2005; Vol. 430, c. 67.]

That is on the record in Hansard, so we are now seeing another flip-flop on policy, admittedly not by the leader of the party but by other Opposition Members.

The pre-legislative Committee came to its conclusion on the basis that the scheme would be fair, just and a proper test of some of the social problems that other parties considered the casinos would create. The scheme would come across the country, and we considered that the regional development agencies would be prepared to consider those issues. There are more than 150 applications for the casinos, so there is interest not only from the industry but from local politicians, local business people and local communities.

[Mr. Anthony Wright]

I speak on behalf of my constituents in Great Yarmouth, and certainly the local authority, which is Conservative-controlled, wants one of the regional casinos to help to regenerate the resort. The regeneration is not just about having a casino. We have attracted a senior leader in the hotel industry to set up and build a brand new hotel in my constituency, which will lead to extra jobs.

Some advance the argument that such a development will be socially reprehensible, and people will turn to gambling. However, in Great Yarmouth we already have two casinos, a horse-racing track and a greyhound track, the amusement arcades and the bingo halls. I asked the people who look at social responsibilities in respect of those who get caught in the net of gambling whether there was a predominance of people with a gambling addiction in places such as Great Yarmouth, as opposed to other inland areas without such amounts of gambling, and they said no. The test needs to go across the country to find out if there will be a problem: I do not consider that one test will make a justifiable case.

There is a bit of hypocritical nonsense coming from some hon. Members who decide to take a particular viewpoint on gambling, saying that perhaps we should not have even one casino and, perhaps, we should do away with gambling altogether. However, I hazard a guess that many hon. Members would welcome some investment from the lottery into their constituencies. As far as I am concerned, we need to take on board the comments of the pre-legislative Committee, which the Government have accepted, and have a test across the country on perhaps four or eight sites, because one is too few. The hunger is out there in various constituencies—not just in businesses, but in the communities as well—to help regenerate resorts like Great Yarmouth and other areas throughout the UK.

The Government should revisit this point. I urge the Minister not to be the political croupier stopping this, but to share the chips around across the country rather than give them to one player on the board.

10.22 am

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on securing this debate and making an eloquent and wittily barbed speech in terms of some of the Opposition's flip-flops.

As a Blackpool MP, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), I have a strong interest in the outcome of the discussions in this debate. Also, as honorary president of the British Resorts Association, I have seen, as colleagues have already mentioned, some of the broad issues of decline making seaside towns and resorts central to this debate. As a former Parliamentary Private Secretary in the Department that introduced this legislation, I am fully aware of all the twists and turns that have accompanied it. Coming from Blackpool, I can say a roller coaster ride on the Pepsi Max Big One is nothing compared to being in the Department in the two or three months before the legislation finally went on to the statute book. However, we are where we are.

I want to take as my text what the Secretary of State said in writing to hon. Members about 10 days before the final agreement, before the general election:

"We think it is important to take a controlled and cautious approach to the introduction of these new types of casino".

I believe that the Government have done that by setting up the panel and charging it with certain responsibilities. We should also remember that the process includes large and small casino expansion, which will give tests across the board and throughout the country from which conclusions can be drawn.

As the debate about the House of Lords and its composition has often just dealt with the issue of categories and numbers and escaped the issue of what people want a reformed House of Lords for, I want briefly this morning to pick up some of the points that the panel needs to consider and ask, "What do you want regional casinos for? What are the issues that affect whether we have one, four, eight, or whatever number?" On sustainability, surely we are not talking just about where a regional casino is sited, but the level of preparedness, the background and the context. That is one reason why we in Blackpool feel that we have a basis for development.

The leader of Blackpool council wrote in the latest document promoting the proposals:

"Destination casino development has the potential to ignite the reinvigoration process, remove the seasonal trading pattern, and bring about the wider investment that will reverse the current trends . . . Blackpool looks upon gaming deregulation as a potent catalyst for regeneration but only where it is part of an overall regeneration plan that will bring transformational change, and there is a strong local commitment to integrated policing and monitoring of casino management and social responsibility programmes."

Mrs. Humble: I thank my hon. Friend and Blackpool colleague for giving way. Does he agree that developing the local skills base is also important? Will he welcome the new courses available at Blackpool and The Fylde college to develop the necessary skills in the town and region to ensure that local people can take part in casino development?

Mr. Marsden: My hon. Friend makes a point on preparedness in considering regional casinos that I was going to deal with.

We in Blackpool have tried, over a six-year period, to deal with this matter. It is six years since Leisure Parcs first produced its Pharzoh's Palace plan, during which time we have had the Psion report, which talked about potential regenerative benefits in Blackpool, development of the local strategic partnership and the urban regeneration company—the only one in the country—which has at its centre regeneration around the casino. The scrutiny Committee testified to the preparations in Blackpool, as the hon. Member for Southport said earlier. The chairman of the urban regeneration company is Sir Peter Hall, one of the most distinguished planners in the country.

As my hon. Friend says, there has been a series of developments designed to broaden that base and deal with preparation. Sustainability is important, which is why we in Blackpool have not just looked at beaming in a resort, or regional, casino as if it were an alien spaceship, but considered it in the context of much broader regeneration for the town. Hon. Members who have visited Blackpool recently, for party conferences or other reasons, will have seen that we already have an intelligent, comprehensive master plan that is developing the town in contexts other than just the importation of a regional casino. That development includes the southern gateway, which has totally redeveloped the southern side of the town and the promenade area, the Solaris Centre, which is part of the partnership between Blackpool and Lancaster university, and work currently being done on a central gateway to connect the resort zone with the proposed conference and casino quarter.

The point I am trying to make is that regional casinos cannot be thought about in a vacuum, or even in terms of one particular project, however attractively packaged and financed by the private sector it may be. We have to consider overall involvement and, indeed, as colleagues have said, the issue of local acceptance. In Blackpool, we have had, over six years, probably the most sustained argument and discussion of these issues. Of course, as the hon. Member for Southport said, there are people in Blackpool who are concerned about the potential effects of regional casinos there or anywhere else, but overall there is an understanding that without a regional casino and a kick-start element many other regeneration points on which I have touched run the risk of being still-born. That is the context in which we need to consider regional casinos, wherever they are located: will they work on their own terms and will they work in the context of the larger regeneration of the area?

If there were any doubt, our case has been put eloquently in recent years by the council, by businesses in the town and, I hope, by elected representatives and others. The five inner wards of Blackpool, where it is proposed that the casino development is located, have experienced intense multiple deprivation, which is not always recognised in seaside towns, although it is recognised in inner cities and on housing estates. We have the tenth most intense multiple deprivation in the country and male life expectancy that is shorter than that in only one other place in the country. We have poorish educational standards and transience, with primary school turnover of between 25 per cent. and 50 per cent. a year, and poor housing, with 35 per cent. of households with no central heating and 5 per cent. sharing amenities. That is the social context in which we need to look for local acceptance. We have that local acceptance across the board, even among some of the small hoteliers, who appreciate that it will involve disruption.

We have not done that at the cost of ignoring social responsibility, which is an important issue for the panel to consider. Rightly, the Government came under pressure from the Churches, the Salvation Army and the Methodists; it is right that they, and all Members, should be prodded to consider that issue. We must avoid the experience of Australia and some of the experience of the US. Blackpool is acutely conscious of that, which is why we have developed the gaming academy and training facilities and why we are in deep consultation with the trade unions. Only last week, the local authority published a draft policy document on gambling that will be considered by the licensing committee, although obviously it cannot be finalised until the Gambling Commission publishes its guidance in May.

The issue of what we mean by a regional casino has already been raised. From the support and endorsement given in Blackpool by the regional spatial strategy, the north-west development association and the North West regional assembly, it is clear that a regional casino is seen as something that will draw people in from elsewhere and that it has to have a national and international impact.

We in Blackpool welcomed the award of the Commonwealth games to Manchester—as a native Mancunian, I particularly welcomed it—and Liverpool's designation as city of culture because those were transformational moments not only for those cities, but for the whole region, so we see anything that happens in Blackpool as having a regional and international impact.

Finally, let me say something about regeneration. Regeneration has to be genuine and integrated. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood said when she spoke on the Gambling Bill in November 2004, development is not the same as regeneration. Hon. Members would do well to reflect on whether we are talking about destination gambling or doorstep gambling. I am sure that the panel will reflect on that in coming to its conclusions.

10.32 am

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): The right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) set out his case for the dome's suitability as an area for the regional casino in London. May I highlight Rainham in my constituency? It is on the edge of the Thames gateway, adjacent to Rainham marshes, and we have the opportunity to regenerate the east London corridor and kick-start much-needed investment for regenerating Rainham and the London Thames gateway area.

When we talk about the regenerative effects of regional casinos, it is important that we should focus heavily on where the relevant sites, or site, would be, given that the negative social impact, about which a number of Members have talked this morning, can be acute. Research suggests that 0.8 per cent. of the population could be prone to problem gambling, and we should take that carefully into account when considering the appropriate site for a regional casino.

Rainham has the advantage of being quite distant from population areas, separated by the channel tunnel rail link and other industrial areas. In my view, it could be a good site, because its distance from population areas would reduce the risk of problem gambling there; it is almost a destination location, and that marks it out as slightly different.

We also need to consider displacement; by that, I mean how a regional casino—a large leisure complex—will impact on other leisure areas in the vicinity. That factor cannot be downplayed. When considering the location of an appropriate site, the negative impact on the region's micro-economic climate should be taken closely into account.

My final word is that the issue should be considered carefully; the ramifications of choosing the wrong site for a casino would be long lasting and have negative impacts on the population areas that the casino served.

10.35 am

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): As others have, I congratulate the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on securing the debate. I remind Members that the regional casinos that we are debating were only one part of the Gambling Bill, which has become the Gambling Act 2005. Although regional casinos have been a highly controversial element of that Act, many other parts have been welcomed across parties—for example, the regulations on internet gambling, tougher social responsibility and the tougher regulator in the shape of the Gambling Commission.

The greatest controversy has been about regional casinos. Indeed, Members across the House were deeply surprised when the Government first came forward with their proposals for a massive explosion in the number of casinos, whether small, large or regional. People were particularly surprised by the initial proposal, which I referred to in my previous intervention, to have an unlimited number of new regional super-casinos, which would have had up to 1,250 new-style category A machines, untried and untested, with unlimited stakes and prizes, and most closely linked in many people's minds to a potential increase in problem gambling.

That proposal for an unlimited number of such casinos was deeply surprising, and people could not reconcile it with the Secretary of State's statement to the Joint Committee; she said that if the legislation gave rise to an increase in problem gambling, it would have failed and would be bad legislation. Stung by the criticism, the Government made a U-turn, not all of which is bad, and introduced their proposal for a cap of eight on the number of regional casinos.

The Liberal Democrats supported that proposal. As we know, during the washing-up period, the Government were forced to reduce the number from eight to one. The Liberal Democrats were not involved in that deal, but it was what the Secretary of State was forced to accept. It is worth recalling that in doing so, she said,

"we reserve the right to ask Parliament again what number of regional casinos is necessary to test their impact."—[Official Report, 7 April 2005; Vol. 432, c. 1624.]

That is what we are debating today. Before we make any decision to agree to an increase from one to whatever number, there are important issues to be resolved.

It is crucial that we take into account the effect of any change in that number on the existing and future casino estate in this country. We know that there will be more casinos than at present because of the applications still being made under the old Gaming Act 1968. I find it surprising that we are debating how many new casinos there will be when we still have not had a clear agreement from the Government on the cut-off date for applications to set up new casinos under the 1968 Act. Indeed, if the figures given in a parliamentary answer are any indication, something like 50 or more new casinos could be established under the old legislation. All that is taking place while the independent advisory panel is considering how many new casinos there should be and where they should be located.

The Government have not got their Act together on use class orders. Even before Second Reading, many of us were concerned about how a swimming pool, a dance hall or many other entertainment centres could change into a casino without needing planning permission. We argued that there was a need for a single use class order for casinos. On Second Reading, the Secretary of State promised us that we would have it, yet to date the issue has not been resolved.

The Government have consulted, and the consultation report has been finalised and published on the website of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, but there still have not been any statutory instruments. That issue is still unresolved, but it is crucial, because if another form of entertainment centre can be converted into a casino without planning permission, no form of section 106 agreement has to be offered up and there will be no benefit from regeneration.

Mr. Betts: I am listening to all of the hon. Gentleman's caveats. However, does he accept that if pilots are to be a meaningful test of the benefits or disbenefits of regional casinos, the right number is not one?

Mr. Foster: We will test a number of issues in the pilot, one of which relates to social responsibility and another to regeneration. I believe that it is possible to have a trial involving just one pilot, although there might be arguments for having more. Until we know the background—the environment in which the number of pilots will take place—it is difficult to judge whether there should be one, four or more. That is why this is crucial.

We are also considering issues about other impacts on gaming in this country. It is crazy that the Government still have not made a decision on what to do about the triennial review in terms of stakes and prizes for family entertainment centre machines. The Minister has said that he wants more evidence. He has been given that. He has said that it would be helpful to have cross-party support, which he has been offered. Yet, we still have not had the decision. That is creating a loss of jobs in seaside resorts and in many other places, and it is not an economic benefit. We need an answer.

As others have said, we need to be clear about the regeneration benefit. It is fascinating to note that when the Secretary of State reluctantly accepted that there had to be a reduction in the number of regional casinos from eight to one, she said that it would probably mean a "loss of probably in excess of 40,000 jobs."—[Official Report, 7 April 2005; Vol. 432, c. 1629.]

That represents 5,000 jobs per casino, which is in strange, marked contrast to what the hon. Member for Manchester, Central told us in his speech about the bid for east Manchester's casino. He said that it would create only 2,300 jobs. The Secretary of State has been somewhat cavalier about the economic benefits. We know from the Henley Centre's study and the Hall Aitken study, to which reference has been made, that "the estimates of economic benefit from a regional casino development are both optimistic and potentially misleading".

I am willing to consider good arguments for increasing the number from one, but several other issues need to be sorted out first. Many assurances need to be given and we need clear evidence of the real benefits if we are to accept an increase in the number.

10.42 am

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I give my customary congratulation to the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on [illegible]ising the issue in this debate. The numbers in [illegible]dance show that there is a need for it. I suspect that [illegible] have been held on the Floor of the House and on [illegible] occasion, when more hon. Members could have ma[illegible]a contribution.

On the other hand, I am not sure whether I should really congratulate the hon. Gentleman on taking the Minister's line—it is probably a set-up job by the Minister—of placing the blame on Conservative Members for the fact that there has been no progress on this issue.

I reiterate that introducing the statutory instrument is all that the Government need to do to make progress. The provision is in the Bill, and it could be done tomorrow. Presumably they have the votes.

Tony Lloyd: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moss: I have only seven minutes, so I shall continue.

The Government presumably have the votes, so they should get on with it. They should not pray us in aid. They should not say to Conservative Members that they need to carry this through with our support; they do not need it. The House of Lords cannot change the statutory instrument, and the Government know that, so if Labour Members feel that this is a crucial issue, all they need to do is bring forward the statutory instrument and get on with the job.

I was misquoted on two occasions during the debate. At the Social Market Foundation, when questioned by the journalist who has been mentioned, I simply said that we had argued for less than eight regional casinos in the pilot; in fact, to answer the question raised by the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), I tabled a probing amendment for four—[Laughter.] If we were all to be bound by the probing amendments that we tabled in Committee, there would be no point in debate.

The issue was that the Minister came to the Committee plucking out of the air the magic figures of eight, eight, eight. He made no justification for why the number was eight rather than six or 24. We tabled an amendment to tease out the reasons for the choice of eight. Even now, we might hear some reasons why the magic figure of eight is so terribly important.

Tony Lloyd: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moss: No, I have not got enough time.

The amendment was a probing one; that answers that point.

In answer to a question that has been posed, I can say that we always argued that we had to approach the matter cautiously. On the number of category A machines that would be released through regional casinos, the evidence from Australia and the United States indicated that a cautious approach was necessary. We said that we were advocating one regional casino in the pilot because of serious concerns about problem gambling. If the Government could demonstrate through evidence that there would be no increase in problem gambling as a result of an increase in the number of regional casinos in the pilot, I said that we would consider the proposal. In other words, we would consider the evidence on problem gambling and would not turn our backs on a proposal backed up by evidence. That is not to say that we will back the Government if they simply come up with a figure of eight either today or tomorrow. That deals with that point.

In answer to a written question last year, the Minister said:

"The Government have made it clear that they wish to take a cautious approach to the development of new casinos, in order to assess whether their introduction leads to an increase in problem gambling. The decision to reduce the number of regional casinos permitted by the Gambling Act 2005 from eight to one was consistent with this cautious approach."—[Official Report, 15 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1135W.]

Why is the Minister now suddenly organising a debate, through the hon. Member for Manchester, Central, to get the issue raised again?

Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman may not value consistency in his approach to this matter, but I put forward a strong case for a regional casino in Manchester, irrespective of what my right hon. Friend the Minister said. Indeed, I have had discussions and even arguments with my right hon. Friend about the issue in the past. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

Mr. Moss: All right, I will accept that, in the sense that the hon. Gentleman wants to promote, through regeneration, an area of Manchester that I know well. I would argue that it is the worst possible place in Manchester in which to put a super-casino. It is the most deprived area. There will no longer be any membership requirement to enter a casino. Therefore, the ambient gambling that will be done by the deprived people in that vicinity makes it just about the worst possible location for a regional casino that I can imagine. However, we will not argue about that now; perhaps we shall at another time.

I want to raise several more issues. First, until the past few days, we had not seen any research or evidence that showed a completely different picture about the regenerative claims that are made by those who want to invest in regional casinos. The Hall Aitken report, which has been mentioned, represents the first evidence that we have of research that says, "Hold on a minute. The claims being made for a regenerative benefit of £50 million do not stack up if they are considered more closely." This is the first evidence that we have received, and the Conservative party was right to be cautious.

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Moss: The Minister will have plenty of time to reply.

On jobs, the report concludes:

"There will be a significant number of jobs created ... but: many of these are likely to be displaced from elsewhere in the leisure sector; these jobs will not necessarily match the needs of the local population; and there is strong evidence to suggest that many of the jobs will go to migrant workers."

[Mr. Moss]

On social impacts, the report states:

"Our research suggests there will be significant social impacts from opening a regional casino. Many of these negatively impact on the Government's own social indicators and are therefore likely to undermine regeneration in the communities currently suggested. The proposed regional casino will generate ... a significant increase in gambling expenditure."

The report also states that evidence from the Henley Centre's work

"suggests the number of problem gamblers will nearly double by 2010. The number of problem gamblers in the UK will increase by some 38 per cent. as a direct result of the new Act. And data from the Psion report suggests that 260,000 new people (equivalent to a city the size of Nottingham) would take up gambling as a result of a regional casino".

The Psion report was in relation to the north-west.

All those issues are being raised, and they support our cautious approach. If the Government can come up with counter evidence to say that there is no evidence of potential problem gambling in having more than one regional casino, we shall consider it.

10.50 am

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): It is a privilege to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope. I have never seen so many hon. Members turn up at 9.30 on a Wednesday morning for an Adjournment debate. I do not know whether that is due to your chairmanship or to the subject matter under consideration. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) on introducing the debate. He has been a champion of such matters for a considerable time. I assure the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) that my hon. Friend needs no prompting to make sure that the matter is brought out in the proper way.

We have been debating not only regional casinos but how we have approached gambling as a whole from the Budd report onwards. That is important, because the Government did not have the powers to control remote gambling and e-gambling that are now serious issues for society. They are increasing at a rate that could not have been envisaged five or 10 years ago. It is therefore right that the Government set up a inquiry board and the playing for success initiative. I thank the pre-legislative scrutiny Committee for its good work. It brought to the House a measure that will go on the statute book to protect and deliver the real core values of the legislation, which is to keep the area crime free, protect the vulnerable and ensure that there is integrity within the industry. It is what we will deliver.

While discussing the modernisation programme, we believed that it was important to investigate casinos. We went back to legislation from the mid-1960s that was probably the most draconian legislation in respect of gaining a licence. In fact, the most difficult licence to obtain is not that for casinos. We thought that such matters needed to revisited under the strict control of the new Gambling Commission, which many throughout the world regard as a model of how to have responsible gambling and make sure that the three core values are kept right at the heart of any gambling establishment in this country. As a commission, it has the teeth, the power and the resource to make sure that that happens.

Our cautious approach was absolutely right. The work of Hall Aitken has been held up this morning as a well-researched report. Its estimated social cost is based on work commissioned by the British Amusement Catering Trade Association. That is fine. I have no problems with it but, for goodness sake, if people are to undertake a responsible piece of work, the work done by my Department must be taken into account. It is at odds with the base of the report. If we want an informed debate, let us have one. As a professional organisation, it does Hall Aitken no good at all to put out such rubbish. It is biased to an extent that is unacceptable. It has been presented as evidence by the Opposition spokesperson, who said that we based responsible decisions on it. It does not do itself any justice. There needs to be an informed debate.

Let us be clear about the argument of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). Yes, we are changing the Gaming Act 1968 in respect of casinos. Yes, we are consulting on such matters, the closure date for which is 28 April. However, casinos are not the big issue. That was raised by the hon. Member for Guildford (Anne Milton) when she referred to the number of slots in the establishments. What clearly affected me when I saw what was happening in Australia was not casinos, pubs or clubs, but the number of slots that were allowed to operate. I assure the House that we have tied each establishment to a specific number of slots, so that the Gambling Commission can control what happens with that development in the light of social responsibility requirements. We are determined to take a cautious approach to make sure that that happens.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Talking of slots, does my right hon. Friend recognise that one regional casino will be allowed 1,250 slots with unlimited stakes and unlimited prizes? That will double the total number of slot machines in British casinos at present. Does not that reinforce the case for a more cautious approach and for having one regional casino and determining its enormous effect over three years?

Mr. Caborn: I understand what my hon. Friend means, as I do what my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) was concerned about and what was said by the Methodist Church. My mother is 90 years of age; she is a Methodist. She is temperance—I do not know what she thinks her son is doing. I can understand where the Methodists come from, but we are legislating in a cautious way. We need evidence. The best way in which to test reports such as those from Hall Aitken would be to have a number of regional casinos, a number of large casinos and a number of small casinos, so that there were eight, eight and eight.

Let us consider political manoeuvring. The Daily Mail ran a big campaign to which the Tories acceded. They thought that it would bring them a few votes in the election if they knocked down the number from eight to one. It did not work. We were returned. Nevertheless, we must reach consensus. The Opposition treated the matter with a flip-flop, but a considerable number of Conservative Members made representations to me when going through the Lobbies asking whether they could have the casino in their area, if there was to be only one. We heard the same this morning. However, let us at least approach the matter sensibly.

Anne Milton: What does the Minister believe is the motivation behind the Hall Aitken report? If he can so readily dismiss it as rubbish, why does he think the organisation carried it out in the first place?

Mr. Caborn: The evidence in the report is exactly the same as the evidence that BACTA presented a considerable time ago. My officials have been through it. We examined it seriously and evaluated it. It was found wanting. If Hall Aitken want to produce a report, let them at least put the other side of the argument, too. It was already on the public record. The way in which the organisation carried out the report did not do it any good. I am willing to debate such matters. They were the subject of the Budd report, the playing for success initiative and the pre-legislative scrutiny committee. The House then decided to subject the proposals to a Joint Committee that made recommendations, of which the Government accepted pretty well every one.

We then put the measure to the House and, because the Opposition thought that they could steal a march for a few votes in the election by pandering to the Daily Mail, they changed their mind from eight to one. That is the political reality of the position, and they are now trying to say that we can put that aside. I made it clear to the hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire, as I have to many hon. Members, that we shall reconsider the matter if those on the Opposition Benches say that they will reconsider moving from one to a number between one and eight. It is right to move forward in that way, and we are still prepared to go in that direction.

Mr. Moss: Why does the Minister need our support? The Government do not ask for our support in respect of all their other legislation—except for education, of course, but that is a recent development. Why does the right hon. Gentleman need our support to bring through an statutory instrument? The Labour party packed the Committee with hon. Members who want a regional casino in their patch. They will vote the measure through, end of story. Why does he need our support?

Mr. Caborn: I have been speaking for the past seven or eight minutes, but what I have said has obviously not penetrated through to the hon. Gentleman, as usual. I said that the legislation was not only about casinos, but about dealing with e-gambling and remote gambling. As it was, a side issue of the whole matter was casinos. To take forward regional casinos will need consensus across the House. That is the best way forward. If the Conservatives do not want to agree, it is at their doorstep that there will not now be a continuation of the regional casino.

Burnley General Hospital

11 am

Kitty Usher (Burnley) (Lab): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate the future of Burnley general hospital, and it is an honour to make my Westminster Hall debut under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope, albeit in Committee Room 10. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) for taking the trouble to be present, and I will be happy to listen to his contribution if he wishes to intervene.

The issue we are debating does not affect only Burnley. Burnley general hospital serves not only my constituency of about 90,000 members of the public, but also the wider north-east of Lancashire. My petition in support of the hospital, run in conjunction with the Burnley Express, attracted 10,000 signatures from my constituents, but if we add together all the names on all the petitions that have been organised in support of Burnley general hospital—those by myself, by the trade unions and by individual community activists throughout east Lancashire—the number rises to around 60,000.

My petition stated that we "reject any proposals to close Burnley General Hospital or Burnley's Accident and Emergency Department", and we

"strongly oppose any options that would be detrimental to the health of Burnley and Padiham people."

Let me explain why we felt that was needed. A few years ago, the acute trusts at Burnley and Blackburn hospitals agreed to merge. I am told by those who were involved in the making of that decision—not least my predecessor as Member for Burnley, Peter Pike—that assurances were given at the time that this was a purely administrative merger, and that there would be no transfer of services between Burnley and Blackburn. However, towards the end of last year the new East Lancashire Hospitals NHS Trust published four proposals emerging from its initial work on a clinical services review, all of which appeared to lead to a significant downgrading of Burnley general hospital in favour of Blackburn. The impetus for that change appears to be that the trust had mismanaged its finances. In its last annual report—that of 2004–05—the chairperson of the trust, Christine Kirk said that "in plain housekeeping terms we have been living beyond our means and we must strive to bring this situation under control".

My point is that is not the fault of my constituents that the trust has got itself into this mess, and so it is not my constituents who should suffer as it tries to get itself out of it.

One of the published options proposed shutting down Burnley general hospital, which understandably led to ridicule in my constituency—and beyond—not least because the hospital is currently in phase 5 of a private finance initiative redevelopment project. I have since been told by the management that that was never a real option, and I am strongly of the view that if that is the case it should never have been put on the table. Therefore, my first question for the Minister is, whether it was necessary under Cabinet Office guidance to publish options that nobody has any intention of taking seriously? That was insulting to the intelligence of my constituents.

[Kitty Ussher]

However, more worrying was the realisation that the two options that were being seriously considered would both lead to the removal of intensive care beds at Burnley general hospital, with people having to go to Blackburn instead. It would be an understatement to say that that has caused uproar; it has led to the launch of a "save our hospital" campaign, with the full support of the local newspaper, which ran it as its main story for a number of weeks.

My constituents fear that they are more likely to die if they have to travel further to receive intensive care services. If one of my constituents is in a serious condition—as a result of a heart attack or a road traffic accident, for example—it is surely simple common sense that a longer journey time to intensive care means that they are more likely to die. I would like to hear the Minister's view on that. Specifically, I would like to know his estimate of the additional length of time it will take for my constituents and those of my hon. Friends—in particular of my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle—to get to intensive care in Blackburn, instead of in Burnley. How much longer will they be on the road, and what will be the increased risk of mortality from that additional travel time?

Let me offer further examples. If one of my constituents has a complication during routine surgery at Burnley general hospital, or during childbirth at the maternity unit, they will be more likely to die if they have to be moved to Blackburn, instead of receiving intensive care support where they are undergoing the operation or giving birth. If one of my constituents arrives at the accident and emergency department at Burnley in an acute state, surely they are more likely to die if they then have to be transported to Blackburn, instead of receiving the intensive care that they need on site? What are the Minister's views on those examples?

There are also concerns that if the intensive care unit is lost, the whole of the accident and emergency facility will surely follow, that no complex surgery—routine or otherwise—could take place on the site for fear of complications, and that for the same reason the maternity unit would be unsustainable and the hospital itself would gradually become unviable. Losing the ICU in Burnley would also presumably lead to a reduction in intensive care beds throughout the sub-region, at a time when intensive care beds are already in high demand.

Since the publication of these preliminary options, I have been deluged with letters from desperately worried constituents. I cannot walk through the town without being stopped by somebody who fears for what will happen as a result of the proposals, and I share their concerns. People honestly believe—and I think they are right—that they would be more likely to die if these proposals were carried out than under the existing situation.

Therefore, we protested. We met the trust managers and handed over the petition here in Westminster. We turned up in droves at their board meetings. We organised a fantastic march through the centre of town on a Saturday shortly before Christmas, which culminated in mulled wine—non-alcoholic, of course, for health reasons—in the central square. A similar march took place in Pendle.

That worked. As a result of our pressure, the management said that there would now be a new proposal for emergency care, dubbed the "fifth option", which would focus on "the retention of both planned and unscheduled care in some specialities at the two main hospitals in the towns"—

those at Blackburn and Burnley. The trust's press release went on to say that the new proposal

"comes in response to fears expressed by some local people about possible changes to critical care services at Burnley General Hospital".

I wish to put on record a big thank you to all those who joined our campaign. Making that effort was worth while.

We have come far, and we now need to put in place the final piece of the jigsaw. On Friday this week, a steering group consisting of all the relevant primary care trusts will decide which options will go out to formal statutory consultation. It is imperative that the option that is put forward as the preferred option is new option 5.

We are a proud town with a strong history and a great hospital, and we need to keep intensive care beds at Burnley general hospital for those cases where to travel further would mean an unacceptable risk to life. Access to intensive care—and, indeed, accident and emergency in general—is a bit like the emergency exit in an aeroplane; we hope to goodness that we will not need to use it, but we blooming well want to make sure that it is nearby just in case we do. That is our main criterion against which the formal proposals will be judged when they emerge in a few days' time.

However, it is not the only criterion. I have a 10-point checklist against which the proposals will be judged when they are finally published. I will draw my remarks to a conclusion by stating them, so if any of my hon. Friends wish to intervene, now is the time to do so; I am very glad that they are present to add their voices to mine. My first, and most important, question is, will there be intensive care beds in Burnley? Also, how many intensive care beds will there be in east Lancashire as a whole? Secondly, will accident and emergency services remain in Burnley? Thirdly, what will we specialise in? Will Blackburn people come to Burnley to be treated, and if so, in which areas? Fourthly, what will happen to Burnley's fantastic Edith Watson maternity unit where so many of my constituents and their children were born—including my own daughter, last year? Fifthly, how many more lives would be saved, or lost, as a result of the proposals? Sixthly, what would the trust do to help my constituents travel between Blackburn and Burnley—for example, to visit relatives? Seventhly, would additional ambulances be provided to compensate? Eighthly, what are the medical experts saying, particularly those who specialise in intensive care? Ninthly, what is being done to encourage more young doctors and nurses to apply to work in Burnley, so that we can bring the expertise of the future into our town? Finally, and very importantly, what will happen to the medical equipment that has been donated to Burnley general hospital by the fundraising efforts of successive mayors and mayoresses and the contributions of so many of my hard-working constituents?

The answers to those 10 questions will determine whether my constituents believe they are better or worse off as a result of the proposed changes. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us on each of those points, and I thank my colleagues for their patience and courtesy in listening to my contribution this morning.

11.9 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) on securing the debate. Since she arrived in the House, she has taken a close interest in health services in her local community. She has helped to lead local campaigns for strong health services and has persistently lobbied Ministers, both in the House and behind the scenes, not just because she is an excellent local MP but because she is a user of local hospital services. I was privileged to meet baby Lizzie recently, and Burnley should be proud of her.

I, too, put on record my thanks to the Burnley Express for the way in which it has helped to keep the issue in the local headlines and at the centre of local conversation. Over the past few months it has proved, once again, that it is a real voice for the local community.

The starting point for this debate is the transformation of the NHS in and around Burnley. As a result of our funding policy, the NHS nationally is in receipt of record resources, and so is the NHS in my hon. Friend's constituency. Funding overall in the NHS has increased almost twofold; it is up to £70 billion, and by 2007–08 that will have increased to about £92 billion. That is an enormous increase in spending. Indeed, if the NHS were a national economy, it would be something like the world's 33rd largest. That is a record of investment in which the Government can take great pride.

The money has been extremely well spent. It has bought extra staff and shorter waiting times, and the result is that there have been great advances against the big killer diseases that we suffer from. This morning, I looked at the statistics for Cumbria and Lancashire: since 1997, about 150 more consultants, 3,000 more nurses and more than 1,800 health care consultants have arrived on the scene. The result of that investment, the new staff and the new ways in which they work is that waiting times have come down, and not a little, but massively. In 1998, nearly 300,000 people waited more than 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment. By December last year, that figure was down to just 171. In March 1997, about 165,000 people were waiting between six and eight months for an in-patient appointment; that has come down to just 35.

Hon. Friends who have been in the House much longer than I will remember the days when they received many, many letters from constituents complaining about long waits. I hope that that flow of letters has dried up. The result of the reduced waiting times is that more people now live longer.

This morning, I also looked at the death rate for an indicative disease, coronary heart disease, which, of course, is one of Britain's biggest killers. The mortality rate for that disease in Burnley came down by 32.8 per cent.—nearly a third—between 1997 and the last year for which we have statistics, which is 2003; that is a massive decline in the death rate from one of Britain's biggest killer diseases. That did not happen by accident; it happened through the sheer hard work of NHS staff, backed by the new tools with which they have been equipped.

It is especially comforting that my hon. Friend's primary care trust has shown an enormous commitment to tackling many of the issues that the Government have seen fit to prioritise, such as cancer, coronary heart disease, choosing health, better services for the elderly, mental health, and diabetes. More than £5 million is being spent on those services. To take a couple of local examples of great results in delivering better health care to my hon. Friend's constituents, the pulmonary rehabilitation service introduced in June last year has already delivered a 4.5 per cent. reduction in emergency medical admissions to hospital. The PCT is planning to recruit some 21 community matrons; there are already 11, and they are playing a vital role in making sure that more health care is managed in the community, so that people do not need to come into hospital for the help that they need.

That investment is set to go on. My hon. Friend's PCT received about £241 million in 2003–04. By 2006–07, that will have increased to £340 million and in 2007–08 it will go up to £371 million. That is an enormous increase in the cash available to the NHS in my hon. Friend's constituency. It is worth mentioning that much of the investment to date has benefited Burnley general hospital; £30 million is re-providing new medical accommodation, and providing a new renal dialysis unit and a new entrance for the hospital. The hospital is, of course, the centrepiece of this morning's debate.

The starting point for my hon. Friend's comments was whether there were Cabinet Office guidelines for how debates such as ours are conducted. I much regret the false alarm caused by the way in which the trust went about beginning the consultation. We recently recognised that problem explicitly in the White Paper on social care and health; in it, we set out that we would do far more to support local organisations by consulting in a manner that we think effective. As my hon. Friend knows, in that White Paper, we pioneered a new way of writing White Papers. We benefited from unprecedented levels of public engagement, and the process was extremely successful. We found that the public want debates about the local NHS and have intelligent views about it, and can structure what are often difficult decisions. We want to make sure that the learning that we acquired through writing that White Paper is made available to local communities.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): The Minister referred to the White Paper on social care and health. There is a reference in it to "fully fledged" accident and emergency departments. I invite him to tell hon. Members what the Government mean by that phrase, and to say whether that is what Burnley general hospital will have.

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, and I will address that remark in a moment.

The challenge for health chiefs in Burnley and Pendle, against a backdrop of a 20 per cent. increase in cash over the next two years and of record investment, is how to update their hospital for the 21st century. To answer that question, the steering group was set up to oversee the identification of options, and it identified a number of important criteria against which options would be developed.

[Mr. Byrne]

The first criterion was the need to expand and invest in community-based care that would increase the amount of planned emergency and long-term condition management that could take place in the community. In our consultation on the White Paper, the public said overwhelmingly that if care could be provided not just round the clock, but round the corner, that is where they would like it.

The second criterion is that the patient experience for those going into hospital has to go forwards; it cannot go backwards. Ultimately, the debate must have a single test: is patient care being improved? Thirdly, hospitals need to develop into centres of excellence, supporting safe and high-quality treatment. Fourthly, redesigned hospitals and community facilities have to reduce waiting times; we made a big commitment to the British people in May to bring down waiting times from the scandal of one in 10 people waiting two years for treatment in 1997, to a maximum wait of just 18 weeks. Producing dramatic falls in waiting times has to be part of the criteria against which any new proposals are judged.

The independent steering group meets on Friday to agree options for public consultation and I shall take a watching brief on the development of those proposals going forward. I shall be able to answer some of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley has raised now, although not all of them, because we await Friday's decision on which options will go forward for consultation. However, I commit to write to her once those options are in the field and let her have my analysis of the answers to those questions, based on the two proposals that are put forward.

First, and most importantly, no option will propose the closure of Burnley hospital. Secondly, A and E will not be put in jeopardy. Thirdly, we expect at least one of the options to see high dependency beds staying at Burnley. I understand that under that option those high dependency beds will have the flexibility to step up to intensive care beds, although this will have to be confirmed on Friday. I also believe that one of the options—again, this is subject to the confirmation on Friday—will involve new investment in women's and children's services. If that option is proposed, the logic is that those services will be centred on the Edith Watson ward.

Those options are important because the number of cases that require intensive care in Burnley shows that there is a clear need. I asked officials this morning to dig out the number of high dependency cases and intensive care cases in Burnley last year. The answer is not inconsiderable: last year some 546 patients were admitted to high dependency units, with 191 admitted to intensive care, which is a little less than four a week.

Kitty Ussher: The Minister makes a powerful point. Given that there are 546 HDU cases and 191 ICU cases a year and that only one of the options proposes that there should be HDUs with the potential to flex up to ICUs, does he agree that that should be the preferred option? To phrase the question slightly differently, if the steering group and the hospital trust view that as the preferable option, should they not state that?

Mr. Byrne: When the trust puts up different options for consultation it is vital that it also makes clear to the public the number of cases that we are talking about, to inform the engagement that it undertakes with clinicians. My hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) has made a good point in the past about the travel times between Burnley and—potentially—the new hospital in Blackburn. If the trust proposes that any option be preferred or not, it needs to explain the volumes for each kind of case and the implications of that if, for example, there are extra travel times.

The trust is doing that against a moving background. For example, our reforms of the ambulance service envisage a future in which more and more emergency care can be administered by ambulance professionals working on the site. That is what ambulance staff want to do and it has been shown to deliver a decline in mortality in many parts of the country. There is a moving background, but it is imperative that the trust sets out not only the volumes of different kinds of cases but the implications for, say, mortality under the different options.

I am sure that my answers will have provided my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley with some reassurance, although not complete reassurance, so I stress that decisions have not been made at this stage on the precise options for change. That decision will be made by the independent panel on Friday. The chief executive of the trust has kept hon. Members in touch with the development of some proposals and I expect that to continue.

I assure all hon. Members that there can be no faits accomplis, no cabals and no decisions made behind closed doors. The NHS is under statutory obligations in the way it conducts consultations with the public. The trust is clear that it must put out firm options to public consultation following the analysis of pre-consultation options. I am advised that the trust anticipates that the proposed start date for the 12-week period of public consultation will be in March.

In conclusion, I encourage hon. Members to stay closely engaged in the debate, if not to lead it. I am sure that there will be a rich discussion over the next 12 weeks in Burnley. I will remain closely involved in monitoring the situation and will be more than happy to meet delegations of my hon. Friend's constituents if she wishes to have me hear their views directly. I look forward to the consultation coming to a successful conclusion and, against the backdrop of a record increase in NHS resources, the development of option that immeasurably strengthens NHS services in my hon. Friend's constituency.

11.26 am

Sitting suspended until half-past Two o'clock.

Planning Policy

2.30 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): In my view, the wealth of our nation is not measured by the gold stored in the vaults of the Bank of England, but by the nature of the society in which we live and the quality of our environment. Our national heritage includes not only our great public buildings, including ancient cathedrals like the one in Lichfield, but the geography of our market and historic towns and cathedral cities. However, that environment is under threat as a direct consequence of the Government's planning policies.

Although we all appreciate the need for affordable housing and good quality start-up homes, the ever-increasing densities of new residential development are beginning to destroy the very nature of our heritage.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): On that point, the village of Cranfield in my constituency has two proposed new developments when the infrastructure in that village is already creaking, the schools are full and the village hall is not fit for purpose. Massive development is coming into my area, but developers are beginning to back off because of the lack of infrastructure for those developments.

Michael Fabricant: My hon. Friend is relatively lucky because I know of developments that have gone ahead and many residents have moved in, but there is no infrastructure. At least in the instance she raises, the developers decided not to go ahead because the infrastructure is not ready.

To continue my argument, it is interesting to note that although Tesco started with a "stack 'em high, sell 'em cheap" policy, it is now departing from that, whereas the Government have adopted a "cram 'em in, and pile 'em high" philosophy for housing. That began a few years back with planning policy guidance note 3, and they now propose even greater densities with their new planning policy statement on housing known as planning policy statement 3. Often, new housing developments arise when no additional infrastructure—schools, for example—is available and ready for the new residents when they move in.

The current policy set by PPG3 dictates high-density residential development of 30 to 50 dwellings per hectare, with new development to be located mainly within existing settlements, making greater use of previously developed brownfield land. The aim is to make more sustainable use of land, and I do not dispute that it has helped to regenerate many run-down inner-city areas, where there are often large wastelands of derelict former industrial land. Such sites are quite clearly brownfield land and new residential development can do much to revitalise and uplift the area. Moreover, in major urban centres, densities of 30 to 50 homes per hectare are fairly typical, and produce increased land values that help to offset the higher costs of redeveloping run-down and sometimes contaminated sites.

However, what may be appropriate in large urban centres such as Birmingham or Manchester is not appropriate in our market towns and historic cathedral cities. The Government seem to have a "one size fits all" mentality in planning policy, which fails to take into account the great diversity of architectural styles and building densities of English towns and settlements. Over the centuries, our smaller market towns have developed their own unique characters, which are very different from the major urban centres.

Although PPS3 is an improvement on PPG3 in that it at least proposes a range of densities which vary by location, it does so only by substantially increasing the range of densities overall. Only in rural areas, where the density is set at 30 to 40 dwellings per hectare, is the proposed density range lower than PPG3 levels. For so-called suburban areas it proposes 35 to 55 dwellings, for urban areas 40 to 75 dwellings, and for city centres it proposes a staggering density of over 70 dwellings per hectare. The definition of what constitutes a "city centre" is far from clear, but I hope that it refers to large urban areas and not small cities such as Lichfield.

PPG3 density policies are already having disastrous effects on historic towns, and that will only worsen if the greater densities proposed in PPS3 come into effect. I shall illustrate that by focusing on four particular issues: the poor standard of living environment that is created in high-density developments; the loss of well-established residential gardens to new housing development; the loss of existing employment land to residential development; and the threat to section 106 money, which is often used to improve the local environment. The examples I will give are for the city of Lichfield, at the heart of my constituency, but they are reflected throughout the smaller historic towns of our nation.

I should begin by pointing out that the city of Lichfield is in fact a planned "new town". Bishop Roger de Clinton saw to that early in the 12th century when he laid out a ladder-shaped pattern of wide streets to form a compact town centre around a bustling market square, from which Lichfield still benefits today. Like most developers, however, he also had a financial interest: the income from the rents was payable to the bishop. Lichfield prospered and grew steadily, so that by the 17th century it had 3,000 inhabitants. It took the next 300 years for the city to reach a population of 10,000, but then only 50 years for it to treble in size again to its current population of 28,000. That was brought about, first, through local authority development to take Birmingham overspill in the 1950s and 1960s, and then through a large estate of mainly privately owned housing in the 1980s. That expansion has been very rapid, but for the most part the new houses—both public and private—have been of a reasonable size, have their own gardens, are built on tree-lined streets and have recreation areas nearby. In short, they are the sort of houses in which people like to live.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way to someone who represents the New Forest—"new" in that it dates from the 11th century, post William the Conqueror's invasion, as I am sure my hon. Friend is aware. Can he throw any light on why the Government appear to want to house extra people in the south-east or other parts of the country by cramming people into existing towns or cities, instead of building new towns or cities? Is that sensible planning or does it relate to electoral manipulation?

Michael Fabricant: My hon. Friend, as ever, raises a very interesting question. I shall take the fine example of our Prime Minister and say that this is probably not a question for me, but for the Minister for Housing and Planning. I hope that she will address that point when she responds.

I mentioned that the population of Lichfield had expanded to 28,000 and that we had a pleasant new development, which was mainly built in the 1980s. However, the further major growth spurt taking place now is of a wholly different style and character to those of the past. The largest single site is a greenfield site on the edge of the city, where in the late 1990s permission was originally granted for 650 dwellings. However, in 2004, on the back of PPG3 policies, revised planning permission was granted to increase that to 1,100 dwellings. For the mathematically minded, that is 70 per cent. more houses on exactly the same area. If the proposed PPS3 policies had been in place, the increase could well have been far greater.

Such high-density housing creates an inner-city style of development, totally out of keeping with the character of the rural fringe of an historic market town. The houses are predominantly three-storey units with relatively small rooms, handkerchief-sized gardens, or perhaps no gardens at all. I accept that some home owners enjoy that configuration, as it provides for easy maintenance, but the houses are packed so closely together and front so tightly on to the narrow estate roads that they are in almost permanent shade, even at the height of summer. There are some open landscaped areas, but almost nowhere that has suitable space for children to kick a football around. Slightly adapting Miranda's lines in "The Tempest" let me say, "O, wonder! How many goodly creatures are there here! O brave new world. That has such houses in't."

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Hear, hear!

Michael Fabricant: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his applause.

Both PPG3 and the new PPS3 make great play of securing high-quality design, but it simply cannot be achieved when the fundamental ingredient of living space is not permitted. People need space inside their homes, and most want gardens outside to separate their house from their neighbour's, to provide a place to relax and in which their children and grandchildren can play in safety. We even have the ludicrous situation of four-storey blocks of two and three-bedroom so-called family apartments that have no private garden space, and the land that the developer "saves" becomes a communal area that counts towards the public open space provision.

I shall move on from those new estates to consider the effects of planning policy on the more established areas of the city. Lichfield—I speak about Lichfield, but what I have to say applies throughout England and Wales—is fortunate to have many older properties built at a time when land was not so much at a premium. Those properties have gardens—sometimes large gardens—with trees and shrubs providing green havens for wildlife. Few people would equate those gardens with the derelict and abandoned industrial sites of inner cities, but in terms of Government targets for development on "previously developed" land, as they put it, those sites are one and the same thing, and they are all classed as brownfield sites.

In the past, the problem did not really exist, because the cost of developing such relatively small garden plots meant that they were not usually viable. However, with ever-increasing residential land values derived from the ever-increasing densities that are permissible, developers are seizing those opportunities—who can blame them?—and more and more residential gardens are becoming high-density housing developments.

In the past few years, we have seen several cases in which a perfectly good house on a large plot has been bought and then demolished to make way for several closely packed houses, or new homes have been built in the back gardens of existing houses. There have been strong protests from local residents with justifiable concerns about the loss of green space and the inappropriate style of development, but the development meets PPG3 criteria—it scores its brownfield points from the Government office—and the local planning authorities see little alternative but to grant approval. They are in an impossible situation.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that, as I mentioned to the Minister during the passage of recent planning legislation, one problem is that the PPGs and, for that matter, the PPSs have been published and imposed subsequent to the adoption of local plans by local authorities? Where it is possible for a local plan to be based on the PPG and to take into account the latest manifestation of the Deputy Prime Minister's thought processes, it is possible to alleviate the problem, but it is not possible to do so retrospectively.

Michael Fabricant: My hon. Friend makes an important point. That situation reflects a lack of co-ordination between national and local government, which is extraordinary given that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is responsible for that sort of planning matter.

Returning to gardens, residential gardens provide far greater biodiversity than most agricultural land, so they have greater environmental value, particularly because they provide wildlife habitats in the heart of built-up areas where such habitats would otherwise be absent. Ironically, the loss of garden land usually has a far greater impact on the character of the surrounding area than the loss of an equivalent sized plot of greenfield land. Development of residential gardens should be strongly resisted, but planning guidance positively encourages it.

At least the new PPS3 acknowledges that problem when it says that, although residential gardens are defined as brownfield land, that "does not necessarily mean they are suitable for development".

It then negates that, however, by referring to the "positive contribution that intensification can make"

by minimising the pressure on greenfield sites.

On 2 February the ODPM—obviously feeling some pressure on this point—issued a brief statement that typically passed the buck to local councils, saying:

"Local planning authorities can already turn down applications for buildings in gardens if they are inappropriate or out of character with the local community."

However, set against the clear encouragement in PPS3 about the "positive contribution" of such development, local planning authorities will be reluctant to risk the high costs of a planning appeal by refusing such applications. It costs the council tax payer money to lose such a fight.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I know that it is not the correct planning term, but when I was on a planning committee, there used to be something that we called "tandem development". There was an intention in the original planning development, which was met, but subsequently guidance comes in that is completely contrary to that. I accept the cost argument, but I wish that local authorities would be more robust in arguing the case. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Michael Fabricant: I do agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have raised that point with my own authority, but it told me that in one case to fight and lose an appeal cost the authority £250,000. At a time when local government is under financial pressure, those costs all have to be borne by the council tax payer. Perhaps we can understand the reluctance of councils to undertake such battles. I put it to him and, more importantly, to the Minister that by making her policy more clear, if only in her answers to me today and perhaps in the guidance that her Department issues, we could avoid such a problem arising. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention.

My third point is on the loss of existing employment sites. Lichfield—I keep mentioning Lichfield, but my point applies to other areas—is predominantly a residential city. Many people travel out of the city each day to work in Birmingham and the surrounding conurbation. Clearly, all the daily traffic that that generates is not good for the environment or sustainability. Lichfield needs a much better balance between housing and employment sites, so that its residents can find employment in the immediate locality, but employment sites stand little chance when competing with the far greater property values that can be obtained from a high-density residential development.

Instead of providing new employment sites, many of the employment sites in the city are being closed down and developed for housing. In most cases, it is not a result of business failure—they are going concerns—but the one-off bonanza of selling their land is apparently worth more than the long-term value of selling their product. A packaging factory now has 80 houses on it, and a concrete firm called Bison has permission for 175 houses. Even our greatly cherished old public houses such as the Carpenter's Arms and the Sozzled Sausage are being bought up and bulldozed to be replaced by yet more private housing.

As with the development of gardens, the conversion of employment sites to residential development also attracts brownfield points, because it re-uses previously developed land and so—supposedly—benefits sustainability. However, what really happens is that it worsens the imbalance between housing and employment in the city, because more and more people have to travel out of the city to work, often to the relocated sites on the outskirts, which are inaccessible by public transport. They will probably have to drive out of town anyway to fill up with petrol, because most filling stations in the city have also been closed and sold as housing land. Even where land is earmarked for employment development, it is often not developed, because the landowners hold back in the hope of eventually securing a far greater financial gain from a residential development on the land.

Finally, where planning policy currently provides a useful gain locally is through use of section 106 money, which is provided by developers. The money can be used by the democratically elected local planning authority to improve the local environment and provide necessary infrastructure. However now, the proposed introduction of a planning gain supplement—PGS—by the Treasury would require Lichfield district council and other councils to abandon their policies. That could hinder the ability to identify and respond through the planning process to the legitimate needs of wider social and community facilities than those available through PGS.

The Government claim that the PGS will be a tax on developers, but it will also have a major financial impact on charities, which will receive less for their land from developers if they sell it. It will have an even more serious impact on charities developing their own land to fulfil their charitable purposes because they will not have received any income in terms of a price paid for the land against which they can offset the PGS. Yet again, the Chancellor is failing to trust locally elected bodies. He is imposing his will from the centre and introducing a stealth tax that will damage some of our most respected and deserving charities.

I have four questions for the Minister. First, the Government make many fine statements about involving the local community in the planning process, so if a local community makes it clear it wants lower-density development—for example, houses with gardens—will the Government provide clear guidance that such local wishes can outweigh centralised density targets? If she did that, she would answer the very point raised by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew).

Secondly, will the hon. Lady accept that development on residential gardens is hardly ever justifiable and amend the guidance in PPS3 to give a fairer and clearer definition of brownfield land that specifically excludes residential gardens and positively discourages building on them? Thirdly, to maintain a sustainable balance between employment and housing, will the Minister introduce measures to restrict new housing being developed on sites that are currently in viable economic employment use? Finally, will the Minister and her Department make robust representations to the Treasury not to abandon the principles of local democracy and the application of section 106?

The environment of our historic towns is fragile, yet they are a reflection of our nation's heritage. The Government are the steward of our built heritage; they owe it to future generations to ensure that that environment is not lost for ever.

2.53 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) has done the House a great service in giving us the opportunity this afternoon to discuss planning issues. I very much hope that his speech is widely reported in the newspapers on his patch—indeed, I hope that the headline will be "MP supports Sozzled Sausage", if nothing more.

Banbury is an historic town. Until the start of the 1900s it had no other existence than as a market town. It existed simply as a market town and people who lived a day's cart ride away would go to Banbury market to sell their produce and stock, see their lawyers, and buy their provisions and take them home. In the 1980s and 1990s, we saw development and construction on the edge of town with Sainsbury's, Tesco and Morrisons stores, all of which are excellent supermarkets, and more recently the Castle Keys development between Banbury town hall and the canal, with Marks and Spencer as an anchor site. Within a comparatively short time, there were three quite large supermarket developments on the edge of town and Marks and Spencer in the town. On the edge of town there was also increasing warehouse retail development, such as office supplies and carpet stores—hon. Members know the sort of thing I am talking about, which involves quite a large amount of footfall with considerable retail footage growth.

Although Banbury as a town has grown and prosperity has grown, the amount of retail space has grown faster than the population, with the result that the historic core—the old shopping area of Banbury—does not receive the same amount of footfall as it once did. The consequence is a number of empty shops. Those shop premises that are occupied are increasingly occupied by charity shops, but some premises are boarded up and covered with graffiti. It is on that aspect of the subject that I shall focus this afternoon—I am conscious that other hon. Members wish to speak in this debate.

Given the laws of supply and demand, there is no way that there will be infinite demand for retail space and we must accept that retail activity, like any other human activity, evolves and changes. Although some shops will remain within the historic core of the town—jewellers, wine merchants, specialist auction houses and so on—there will be many gaps. I have three suggestions for the Minister on what we can do with that space.

First, I hope that some of the property could return to housing. We have a great shortage of social housing in north Oxfordshire. Although it is an issue for another day, I am genuinely concerned that the two large-scale voluntary transfer housing associations—Banbury Homes and Charter Housing—have no ability with the Housing Corporation to build new social housing. I do not know how we can get new social housing in a constituency such as mine.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the massive sale of council houses might have created that problem?

Tony Baldry: No. The right-to-buy policy was an extremely good policy, which created much more viable and vibrant communities. The problem now is how to create new social housing.

There is an opportunity in historic town centres, but there is a difficulty. Many of the empty shops belong to property companies and retail consortiums and appear on their balance sheets as an asset value. It is often easier for them to hold those properties as an asset value than to develop them. I hope that the Minister will consider my first suggestion, which is that if property companies that own empty retail space in historic town centres are prepared to sell it for social housing, they should have relief from capital gains tax. That would be a real incentive for them to vacate the sites and to make them available to social landlords for housing for young people and elderly people, who would find it useful to live in town centres.

Secondly, practically every top-floor flat over a shop in Banbury High street and Parson street is empty. Historically, when the shops were built the shopkeeper would live above the shop, but that does not happen now; the space is, at best, storage space, but more often it is empty. I know that at different times there have been attempts to encourage developers and social landlords to take on flats above shops, but that does not seem to have worked, so perhaps we could provide an incentive whereby if owners of shops were prepared to make the flats above them available, they could have some relief from corporation tax. There is a precedent for that: if any of us have lodgers in our house we can take rent of up to £3,000 tax-free. The same incentive would encourage businesses to make flats above shops available, particularly to young people. These days, young people can usually only get into housing through the private rented sector with the benefit of housing benefit. Making sites in town centres available would be good news.

Towns like Banbury have a number of historic buildings, but there is no protection for those historic buildings in the planning system. The listed building system protects buildings of architectural interest, but it does not protect buildings of historic interest such as the Banbury cake house, the shop that sold Banbury cakes. The old Banbury police station, which was demolished recently, was not of great architectural interest, but was of great historic interest in the market town. The Spencer corset factory was a wonderful 1920s art deco building that could easily have been converted into flats, but it was a lot cheaper for the developers to knock it down and start again. The same was true of the gardener's house of the People's park. I pay tribute to Banbury Civic Society, which tried hard to persuade the district council not to grant planning permission to demolish those properties, but the council clearly feels, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield said, that planning law and guidance ties its hands. I suggest to the Minister that we and, perhaps, civic societies throughout the country need to give thought to whether we need a designation—even if it were rarely used—of buildings of historic interest. Perhaps there could be a limit on the number of buildings that a local authority could declare to be of historic interest, but any historic market town will have several icon buildings of historic importance to the community, which, if they were to go, would leave a kind of ersatz streetscape. One town would look exactly like another, which would be a source of considerable sadness.

I do not have a solution to the last issue that I want to raise with the Minister. Often, district councils make intelligent proposals on developing and improving a town centre. For example, in 1995, Cherwell district council commissioned an urban design study by Roger Evans Associates on how the hole that had developed in the historic core of Banbury could be replaced and repaired by rebuilding the historic street frontage. It considered a mixed-use allocation, and the district council went through all the necessary planning steps, including a detailed policy in the non-statutory Cherwell local plan and so on. The difficulty is that some landowners who own bits of derelict land—perhaps part of a car park, whatever—in various parts of the historic town have no incentive to develop them. They can sit on their land indefinitely, in the hope that some day a better planning opportunity may arise. Clearly, one cannot compulsorily purchase all the land, so there must be a carrot to encourage landowners who are sitting on key sites in historic town centres to develop those sites. I acknowledge that the mechanism may be difficult, but there must be some way to do that. Otherwise, the most tardy, unimaginative landowner can hold back imaginative town centre historic redevelopment, which would restore the townscape.

My message to the Minister is that we cannot hold back new retail development. Sainsbury's, Tesco and Morrisons are popular because people want to shop there.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman makes several interesting practical suggestions, but is he prepared to write off the historic town centre as a place of retail activity? That would be a bitter blow to many historic towns, and it is something that has been made much worse by the proliferation of supermarkets around the edge of towns and all the public transport and other problems that they generate.

Tony Baldry: I believe that my constituents genuinely feel that Sainsbury's, Morrisons, Tesco and Marks and Spencer have been of real benefit. Retail prices have come down overall, and the range of food and goods in the shops has increased as a consequence of their presence. I shall not take up the time of the House, but there was an article in The Economist only last week that demonstrated that to be the case. The number of people using supermarkets each Saturday and Sunday is a testament to their popularity, and I do not think that we should blame them for the ills of town centres.

Shops will continue to prosper in historic town centres, but the amount of retail activity over the past 20 years has not expanded at the rate of expansion in the size and scale of supermarkets. Therefore, with the best will in the world, some shops in historic town centres will no longer be viable. One can see the result of market forces in the voids on Banbury High street and Parsons street, and in the number of shops for which the only use is as charity shops. Charity shops perform a useful function in recycling goods and raising money for charities, but that is not a long-term future. We must work out how to make such areas viable again, and turning some of the buildings back into residential accommodation for the frail, the elderly, young people and people who find it useful and beneficial to live in a town centre would be a good way to do that. One sees that in towns and cities in France and elsewhere in Europe, and I see no reason why it could not be done in the UK.

We must work out how the planning system can help to reinvigorate town centres, and blaming the supermarkets will not help us do that. We must acknowledge that we need to go with the grain of market forces in reinvigorating and reviving historic centres of market towns, to meet society's needs, in particular needs for housing and other activities. We must also take measures to protect historic buildings and working organisations such as civic societies.

3.5 pm

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on securing this debate. I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) said, particularly about the floors above shops in our town centres, which ought to be put to better use.

I have a question for the Minister: will she confirm that section 106 agreements are not site-specific and that it is the local authority, not the developer, that determines what should be provided under section 106? I know that that is the case, but there is at least one local authority that thinks that it is the developer who decides what should be provided.

I was interested to hear that Lichfield was a new town in the 12th century. I have news: Britain's oldest recorded town was, in fact, its first new town. Colchester was set out by the Romans almost 2,000 years ago, and the street grid pattern from that time still exists. That is both good news and bad news—good news, obviously, from a tourist's perspective, but not quite so good for traffic movement, particularly in the greater core of the town centre.

Colchester should be a city. It was a city when it was the first capital of Roman Britain, but, alas, it dropped out in the mists of time. It should have been reinstated for the millennium, but I was advised in a response to a parliamentary question that only the Head of State can withdraw the title of city once it has been granted. I have been able to establish that no Head of State in the subsequent 2,000 years removed the title of city from Colchester, so Colchester is still a city. Alas and alack, the Home Office, which was then dealing with millennium city applications, refused to accept my watertight legal argument.

I wish to speak in this debate because, like the hon. Member for Lichfield, I represent an historic town. There are many attractions in such towns, but there is also a downside in that other towns can do many things that we, quite rightly, cannot. That means that we need a bit of assistance from the county council or central Government. They should acknowledge that we are custodians of our historic past and that that comes at a price. It ought to be considered when it comes to transport grants, park-and-ride schemes and so on.

I should point out that I am the secretary of the all-party group on small shops, which only a couple of weeks ago produced a report on the threat to small shops. It includes many recommendations, which I trust will be taken on board by various Departments. The report is timely, as Tesco is about to come back into Colchester town centre. Having gone out of town and done its bit, it is now coming back into town to do its bit again. In Colchester, it proposes to go into Crouch street. That attractive street, with its parade of local shops, is straight out of Walmington-on-Sea, "Dad's Army" and the 1940s.

[Bob Russell]

We may talk about a listed building here or a listed building there, but that is only part of it. It is the whole character, the whole street scene, that is important. A building might not be worthy of retention on its own, but if we take it out of the street scene, that scene is like a beautiful lady's smile with one tooth gone. What was attractive now has a gap. We should not talk about an individual building being listed; it is the street scene, the group setting, that is important.

I am sure that the Minister was already aware—if not, her officials will have briefed her—of contributions that I have made in the past two years' Christmas recess debates and on my ten-minute Bill, which I introduced only last month. I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) for drawing so much attention to my Local Government Referendums Bill. By his opposition he eloquently demonstrated why local democracy needs referendums when the local authority is out of step with what the community wants to happen.

What can be done to help small shops and small businesses? Central Government need to realign the setting of business rates. At the moment, the small corner shop pays more per square foot in business rates than the out-of-town supermarket. That cannot be right, because the existing unlevel playing field becomes even more unlevel. In fact, it is not unlevel; there is now a slope and the only question is how steep the slope is. Perhaps central Government could consider that. I also urge them to consider English Heritage's thoughts on value added tax for new build as opposed to conversions, restorations and so on. That would be a positive step towards addressing the concerns of the hon. Member for Lichfield about brownfield development. We should be encouraging the retention of what is best, though conversions and so on, rather than almost encouraging developers on to greenfield sites.

We are left with the interesting question of what is a greenfield site and what is a brownfield site. Let us imagine that a large mental institution occupies 50 acres of landscaped grounds. I think that I am right in saying that, under the Government's definition, those 50 acres of landscaped grounds, sports fields and so on would be classed as a brownfield site. The institution ought to be classed as a brownfield site, but I question whether classing the landscaped grounds as such makes sense and whether someone in the local infant school would recognise a sports field and a landscaped park as a brownfield site. I think that everyone would recognise that as a greenfield site.

I referred to my membership of the all-party small shops group. I urge the Minister and her Government colleagues to see what else can be done to try to resist the growing clone-town image. There are many towns where, if someone was blindfolded on the way in, they would not know what part of the country they were in, let alone which town. That phenomenon is very worrying, because local identity is important. I hope that we can consider that.

I shall conclude with the Romans. The setting of Colchester's Roman wall is a major tourist attraction. Unfortunately, there is a grandiose plan for an art gallery with a public subsidy of £600,000 a year and the closure of the town's bus station, which the local community strongly opposes. In addition, with the Vineyard Gate St. Botolph's redevelopment, it is proposed to demolish some 40 buildings, ripping the guts out of part of the central area of Britain's oldest recorded town. That is being funded and encouraged by the East of England Development Agency, which was saying only two days ago in the Eastern Daily Press how proud it was of the amount of money that it was putting into Norwich to protect that city's heritage. By my reckoning, those are double standards. Obviously, the agency hoped that the MP for Colchester would not read what it was putting out in the Norwich paper, but I saw that. There is a need for joined-up government in the East of England Development Agency, let alone in the Government, because there are many buildings in the area that, although perhaps not worthy of listed building status, are important in the collective setting. Those buildings managed to survive two Luftwaffe raids on Colchester in the second world war, but it does not look as though they will survive Colchester council in the third millennium.

There are many buildings that the Victorian Society, English Heritage and the Colchester civic society—this echoes the comments about the importance of civic society—want to remain. Unfortunately, the power of the developers—whoever they may be and who are, I suggest, working covertly with the local authority—is carrying the day. Many of us are looking to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to stop the latest attack on the heart of the town where I have lived for most of my life and which I have the honour to represent.

3.16 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell). I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on securing the debate, but I shall start by saying how much I agree with a couple—not all—of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), first on what he describes as icon buildings, which I describe as landmark buildings and which my local planner tells me ought to be called locally listed buildings. Whatever they are, they are buildings that are of a special character in the town.

On the night before the general election, I saw a building that was about to be demolished in Shanklin and I was so horrified that I took time out from my canvassing to telephone the local conservation officer to ask her exactly when planning permission had been given in relation to the building. It is a former pub that was called "The Clarendon" because it was built of timbers that were rescued following the shipwreck of the Clarendon off St. Catherine's point in the 17th century, yet that building was being demolished to make way for some pretty ghastly flats. I am pleased to say that the decision was taken when Isle of Wight council was controlled by a different political party from the one that controls it now. I would very much like more action to be taken to secure individual landmark buildings and to secure the protection of the character of areas through the conservation area approach.

I have another story for the Minister. A house on the front in Cowes called "Mornington" was listed with the agreement of English Heritage. It was then, while the area was subject to consultation on the question whether it should have conservation area status, delisted without anyone in my constituency being notified. It was then demolished while the area was still under consideration. When I challenged the local authority on why it had not imposed the conservation area first and then consulted, instead of consulting first and then imposing the conservation area, it told me that it was regarded nationally as bad practice not to consult, presumably, a developer who would want to demolish a building before measures were put in place that would prevent him from demolishing it. I do not think that what I have suggested is bad practice. The Minister looks puzzled. I hope that she will look into how more sensible guidance can be given. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield in that regard.

I also echo the remarks of the hon. Member for Colchester on clone-town Britain. We are certainly seeing the development that he described in too many of our town and city centres. I note what he says about VAT, although I would rather see VAT imposed on new building than taken off repairs to old buildings. It is always easier to argue for improvements to old buildings.

On section 106 agreements, which the hon. Gentleman also mentioned, I am concerned to hear that it is now possible for a developer, having secured a development with a section 106 agreement and signed up to it, to challenge after five years have passed the agreement that he freely entered into. That seems to be a case of developers having their cake and eating it, but of course it is not uncommon for developers to try to do that.

Finally, I should like to reinforce the point that I made to my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield about the unitary development plan falling out of date. My local plan was only approved in 1997, yet it is already significantly out of date and has been made more so by changes in Government guidance. I am pleased to say that my local authority is proceeding rapidly with the creation of its local development framework, but however rapidly it proceeds, there is a gap through which the developers can sneak and develop in ways that my councillors and I do not like.

Bob Russell: I ask the hon. Gentleman to consider another scenario, where the local authority, having signed its adopted local plan, proposes in its own application to go against what it had agreed and adopted only a year before.

Mr. Turner: My position on that is clear. Local authorities should not be judge and jury in their own application, because that is contrary to the rules of natural justice.

Town centre regeneration is the most important issue that we have touched on this afternoon. We can do a number of things to improve the quality of life in town centres and prevent them from being damaged. First, they should have conservation area status, which would protect the teeth in the face of the beautiful woman, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. Secondly, we have to consider street design and look at the relationship between planning, conservation and highways. In many cases, highway engineers do not bulldoze—although they do that all too frequently—but drive a metaphorical coach and horses through a conservation area by installing appalling street furniture. At the foot of Quay street in my constituency, in the middle of a conservation area and less than five minutes from where I live, there is a forest of horrid street signs.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that in considering street design, there should be a concept of density appropriate to the area? The new PPS3 is increasing density rates dramatically from up to 24 dwellings per unit under the previous system bar one, which is leading to three-storey development in essentially residential areas where two-storey development prevails.

Mr. Turner: There should be an allowance for appropriate densities as far as possible and such decisions should, as far as possible, be taken locally by people acquainted with the local circumstances, not, as is the case in my constituency, by inspectors in Bristol appointed by the Deputy Prime Minister in London.

I should also like to mention the materials from which streets are built. My local authority has just built a nice new pavement in Wroxall, but as in far too many places it is made from tarmac, with the kind of kerbstones that are seen in modern developments. It is inappropriate in a village. Such things need to be taken care of rather more carefully.

In relation to local shops, the hon. Member for Colchester mentioned clone towns. I have not read the document to which he referred, although I have read press statements about it. There is a case for protecting and encouraging the development of more local shops in town centres. One way to do that is to adopt the policy, as some local authorities do, of allowing rate relief to non-chain stores, which has a cost attached but is within the capacity of local authorities. I was told of a case in Hinkley, where the local authority developed land that it owned specifically for local traders' occupation. That approach might be taken by means of a section 106 agreement, even on land that is not owned by a local authority. If we can get 40 per cent. social housing from house builders, perhaps we could get, say, 10 per cent. social shopping from developers of shops. Indeed, I recognise that in many cases some supermarkets that want to acquire a site in towns do that.

I disagree most with my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury on the position of the supermarkets and the house builders, which are terrifying lobbies that wield enormous power. In the 1980s, Tesco, which funded the local government reception year in, year out at the Conservative party conference—

Bob Russell: And the others.

Mr. Turner: The hon. Gentleman clearly knows about the others.

Tesco was busy trying to buy the votes of councillors on local planning committees. At the time, we did not realise the damage that that would do to town centres. Similarly, there are builders, including in my constituency Persimmon, a national chain—I would not dare to mention a local chain, of course—which, having secured planning permission for x houses, managed to cram them by bad building, not bad design, to the end of the site so there was room for two or three more left over. Of course, that is just an amendment to a planning application in some cases and does not require advertising, so unless local people go out with a tape measure in the middle of the night they do not know what is happening.

[Mr. Turner]

The big lobby groups need to be resisted. I am pleased to note the pressure on the authorities of the House to recognise which lobby groups are funding some of the all-party groups, because if those groups are funded behind the scenes by big lobbyists, we should know, just as we and the public should know if our hon. and right hon. Friends are funded behind the scenes.

My concern about the supermarkets is not only that they damage trade in the town centres—I recognise that they are popular; of course, they are—but that they have a number of unfair competitive advantages. First, their trading practices and purchasing policies are deeply unfair to farmers in this country, so I cannot think what they are doing to farmers in the developing world.

Secondly, they have free car parking on site, which they have acquired over a long period. I recognise that in many cases it is the local council's fault that it is not easier for people to park their cars in the town centre, but if supermarkets have free parking on site and there is no scope for new supermarkets to open, they are a local monopoly. Tesco at Westridge in my constituency, the only supermarket in north-east Wight, has a current application to double its sales space. That will undoubtedly damage three of my nine towns, Sandown, Shanklin and Ryde; that is recognised. Some of the planning gain that we would supposedly get from approving this application by Tesco is a tiny amount of money going into Ryde. Supermarkets are local monopolies and should be recognised as such.

Thirdly, it should be recognised that supermarkets are vertical monopolies. The hon. Member for Colchester talked of Tesco opening a branch in his shopping street. Having driven many of the businesses out of town centres, it is now taking over some of the few remaining smaller shops and chains and damaging trade in that way.

Fourthly, supermarkets are hugely damaging to the environment. The level of packaging should be a planning issue, as should food that is grown in my constituency being taken 100 miles and then brought back to be sold. That is exactly what is happening. Planning considerations should include whether additional haulage is required and whether jobs are protected in the local area through opportunities for people to sell local produce. We can do a great deal to improve the planning system. I am sorry to say that in some cases in the past local authorities have been a bit feeble and, far too frequently, planning officers have said, "We'll lose on appeal, we'd lose a lot of money", and the council members feel compelled to vote in favour of an application that they would rather vote against.

I suspect that since May last year members of my local authority have rejected more planning applications than were rejected in the preceding four years when the authority was under different control. That is because they are beginning to realise that such decisions are vital to the future prosperity, economy and quality of life of my constituents. I hope that the Minister will give us some hope that those issues can be taken account of in future planning guidance.

3.30 pm

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): First, I apologise to you, Mr. Chope, and to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) for not being in my place at the start of this debate. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate, because protecting the unique character of our constituencies is a huge priority for all Members of this House.

The constituency that I have the privilege of representing has a number of historic landmarks, the most famous of which is perhaps Bramall hall, a magnificent manor house dating back to the 15th century. During my time as leader of Stockport metropolitan borough council, we took positive steps to protect the character of the area surrounding the hall and to preserve its unique qualities.

The area is blessed with sites of historic and architectural importance throughout the borough of Stockport, including a market that dates back to mediaeval times. However, it also faces high demand for housing and other developments, so I empathise with the hon. Gentleman's cause this afternoon.

All of us have the responsibility to seek to balance the competing needs of housing demand with the protection of the character of our towns, villages and neighbourhoods. That is one of the reasons why my party strongly supports cutting VAT on home improvements. Literally hundreds of thousands of properties throughout the country could be brought back into use if only there were the financial incentives.

In addition, I agree with the assertion that loopholes in planning policy and guidance allow building work up to the curtilage of the plot, meaning that gardens and other spaces can be compromised. Attempts to close that loophole through legislation are ongoing, and my colleagues support that course of action. However, it should be acknowledged that the Government's record on developing brownfield, as opposed to greenfield, sites is reasonably good. Nevertheless, pressures persist on communities such as those we are debating this afternoon.

There is a wealth of guidance from a variety of sources that seeks to preserve the character of historic locations when it comes to planning. Indeed, English Heritage has published detailed proposals for principles that should be applied to developments in areas of historic importance. They include the careful use of materials, incorporating historic street patterns, detailed site analysis and plenty of other guidance, which, if consistently implemented, would have a very positive effect.

Of course, there is guidance from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, particularly in PPS6, although that has a high degree of internal conflict in respect of market towns, historic towns and cathedral cities. One of the statement's basic premises is as follows:

"It is not the role of the planning system to restrict competition, preserve existing commercial interests or to prevent innovation."

However, much of the document seems to suggest a high level of encouragement, and even protection, of traditional businesses such as markets:

"Local authorities should ensure that their markets remain attractive and competitive by investing in their improvement."

The statement goes on to say:

"Local authorities should, where appropriate, seek to protect existing facilities ... for people's day-to-day needs and seek to remedy deficiencies in local shopping and other facilities to help address social exclusion."

Detailed research on PPS6 and other planning guidance shows that that top-down approach does not always produce the desired outcomes on the ground, and that the results in terms of development are at best patchy.

My party's aim is to decentralise the system, speed up the planning process, increase sustainability and give communities a much greater say over land use in their areas and improve their ability to shape their local environment.

Mr. Beith: I point my hon. Friend to an example in my part of the world, where as a result of top-down decisions on the regional spatial strategy by a distant and unelected regional assembly, historic towns such as Alnwick and Berwick are being told that only 60 houses a year will be allowed to be built in the entire district. Sustainability of house building is also important to the conservation of historic towns.

Mark Hunter: I thank my right hon. Friend for his contribution. He makes an interesting point, and I shall refer further to such issues a little later.

We believe that the best way to protect important sites of the sort that we are discussing is to end interference from Whitehall and the Secretary of State in the process of drawing up local development plans. Frankly, we want to get central Government off the backs of local people. My party has also proposed the concept of the community plan, under which a community would set out what it sought to achieve from the council's local development plan, and in some circumstances could propose that some land should be zoned for particular purposes. The community plan would then form a subsection of the local development plan. Under our system, the planning system would become much more community-focused, and be bottom-up rather than top-down. That need not mean building fewer homes than are currently proposed. Communities can respond to their needs if they are given the freedom to do so; the end result will often be better and more acceptable than a plan handed down from Whitehall via regional offices demanding, say, that 100,000 homes should be built in a particular region.

In addition to the community plan, we have also proposed much wider use of pre-application consultation so that developers, and the community in which they wish to build, can reach agreement on applications. We believe that that is a route through which communities can influence section 106 agreements. If land is suitable for development, community involvement in drawing up the remit for the site will be a key approach for ensuring that the needs of the community are met. Such a community-led approach is impossible under the present centralised planning system.

Ultimately, the greatest action we could take would be to reform the planning system, so that local and regional authorities can make more decisions for themselves about what developments are allowed. By involving the community—the people who know and appreciate their areas more than any civil servant in Whitehall ever could—we can promote development to meet our needs and protect our constituencies at the same time.

Before I finish, I should like to ask whether, given his obvious commitment to preserving the character of his area, the hon. Member for Lichfield was as surprised as I to hear his party proposing that there should be building on the green belt. Surely that policy, announced only recently by the shadow Chancellor, will do precisely the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman is calling for this afternoon. Concreting over our precious green space is hardly the best way to preserve the unique heritage of our market towns, historic towns and cathedral cities.

3.37 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): This debate has been wide-ranging, interesting and enjoyable, as these debates always are. First, I should say that normally my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) would answer a debate on the impact of planning policy, but unfortunately he is indisposed. Anything I say that goes contrary to our Front-Bench team's planning policy will be immediately disowned by my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), so I let the Chamber know in advance that pretty much I have free rein.

Debates such as this are enjoyable because there is always some element of competition, along the lines of the Monty Python sketch with the three Yorkshiremen. The competition has been partly about pubs and local produce—we had the Sozzled Sausage and the Banbury cakes; my contribution is the Bedfordshire clanger, a wonderful pasty with meat at one end and fruit at the other, wonderfully made by Mr. David Gunn and his team at Sandy.

Hon. Members have also competed on the age of their new towns; we went from the 12th century to the 11th century, which was then trumped by the Romans of the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell). All I can say to that is that my children were born in a part of Bury known as Jericho, and Jericho is the oldest city in the entire world—so I win that one.

I shall go into a little more substance, as I think is appropriate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on raising the issue of planning policy clearly and sensibly. He picked out a variety of issues, a number of which I shall address, paying particular attention to two. He mentioned the problems that are likely to be caused by the new stealth tax—the planning gain supplement—that the Government are planning. It will drive up the cost of properties, be passed on to those who buy houses and do nothing to improve the affordability of housing for those who seek it. He was right to draw attention to yet another stealth tax from a Government who have become renowned for them.

Secondly, I strongly support my hon. Friend in his concerns about the so-called back garden development, which is a new phenomenon. The hon. Member for

[Alistair Burt]

Cheadle (Mark Hunter) is nodding, and I know that that development is a concern to many of us. My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden tabled early-day motion 486 as long ago as July last year, almost as soon as the new Parliament convened. It noted

"the growing public concern over the damaging effect of inappropriate infill development on the character of local neighbourhoods".

At that time the problem was related to PPG3.

Back garden infill is insidious, setting neighbour against neighbour. At its worst, it can take out a row of houses, because the asking price for a house becomes impossible for a householder to resist. The houses can then be removed and a new estate constructed. That is not the proper way to go about things. We are right to resist it and to urge the Government to be much more direct, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield said, in their opposition to it, as opposed to their current lukewarm attitude.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to the key point, which is the need to preserve the distinctive character of our great historic cities and market towns—those places in this country that have history. We are proud of our heritage, but it is threatened by the inevitable march of progress. That has its place and, as hon. Members from all parts of the Chamber have mentioned, careful conservation can do wonders. Inappropriate development could be a tragedy. We have lived through the renovations of this country in the 1960s and we know what we lost. We all hoped that we had learned some lessons, but we are not so sure now that we did.

The Campaign to Protect Rural England produced a report in March 2004 entitled "Market Towns: Losing their Character?". It will be familiar to all of us, including the Minister. It set out a series of concerns that have been echoed today. Its survey "found that the individual distinctiveness of some market towns are at risk through ill considered, uniform development which can generate intolerable levels of congestion and stretch local services to their limits."

Various comments were made in the survey, which ranged throughout the country. The report stated:

"local retail outlets are struggling; availability of local foods is decreasing; the use of local materials in new building developments is rare."

My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) mentioned that last point. The report continued:

"The quality, character and distinctiveness of market towns and their surrounding countryside is a huge economic asset which provides opportunity and competitive advantage. It is important that this is recognised".

My concern is that the Government are failing to learn some blindingly obvious lessons. Three or four particular points raised in this debate make that case for me. I do not think that the Government do learn lessons. The Observer this weekend had an article entitled "Mr Prescott, please save us from another supermarket mega-shed". It was about a planning application in Sunderland, where a local proposal to have a much more appropriate town centre development runs the risk of being lost because of proposals by a supermarket called Tesco.

I sometimes wish that we played Tesco bingo in the House of Commons and awarded ourselves points for each time that company's name was mentioned, because we would all be doing very well. I am afraid that Tesco is going to take another beating from me, because I am less generous towards it than my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry). I feel strongly that it has its place; there is no doubt that supermarkets have made an extraordinary contribution to the retail life of this country and to the everyday lives of many people. They have their place, but we have learned over the years that sometimes their impact can be more damaging than it is worth.

In the 1970s and 1980s, we learned of the damage that out-of-town centres do to town centres. I wish that the Government would now learn the dangers of the express stores—the small stores—coming into what used to be the independent retailers' area. I do not object to Tesco the supermarket; we have learned to live with it and it has many advantages, although I know that farmers are very concerned about the pressure on them as suppliers. However, there is plenty of evidence to suggest that the worrying involvement of the big stores in small-scale retail developments in towns is very damaging.

The Association of Convenience Stores claims that some 2,000 independent stores went out of business last year. The Forum of Private Business has written to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Nick Goulding, chief executive of the FPB said:

"We have written to the secretary of state, calling on him to use his powers to instruct the Office of Fair Trading to stop dithering".

That comment was made about the monopoly position of large stores. He continued:

"High streets are in crisis, with shops being forced to close at a rate of 50 a week due to the dominance of the retail chains."

The Government have failed to learn lessons and to appreciate the dangers that are affecting our market towns, which were set out in the 2004 report to which I referred and which are echoed two years later, in 2006. There has been a slow response. Our town centres and historic market towns demand something better.

The Government are also slow in relation to design. The design of new buildings in historic settings—indeed, in any setting—is important. The Minister will be aware of the criticisms made by the urban task force in November 2005. The UTF was set up by the Government but finds its voice listened to increasingly less. It issued an independent report that was critical of new design and new developments. On page 5, it stated:

"The majority of new developments remain poorly designed, with public realm and buildings of a very low quality. Where some good practice has emerged, it tends to be in smaller 'infill' schemes where designers can relate to an existing context. However, too many housing projects are just that—thoughtlessly laid out groups of cheaply built fragmented residential units relatively isolated from surrounding communities."

That is not what we need; we need a Government who listen carefully.

A further Government failing is that when a good initiative is introduced, such as the market towns initiative that emerged through the Countryside Agency, they cannot help but meddle. They took that initiative away from the Countryside Agency and put part of it with regional development agencies. That was a transfer to an unelected body—a collection of interests which gets increasing powers and responsibilities. The Government meddled with the basis of an initiative that had attracted some interest and built up core skills, which were then diffused. The Government cannot resist being top-down, meddling and slow to respond to things that are necessary. That is the core of the issues that colleagues have raised today about our historic market towns and cities.

We need appropriate planning guidance that recognises the distinctive differences and characters of urban areas in the United Kingdom. We also need a Government who demonstrate that they have learned lessons and that they have seen the dangers to our historic cities and market towns, which colleagues from all parts of the Chamber have discussed in their contributions. Above all, we need a Government who recognise the importance of local decision making rather than having decisions increasingly being made by unelected regional assemblies.

The hon. Member for Cheadle had a sly dig at comments made by the shadow Chancellor, but he will have to consider how he reconciles local decision making with his own party's demands for regional government and for moving things further away from local regional councils. I assure him that our policy on the green belt is fixed: the green belt is important and remains a vital part of Conservative party planning policy; ensuring that we make better use of brownfield sites and of ill-designated green sites might help everyone. The House, and our historic cities and market towns are seeking those things, but I suspect we will not get them until the Minister and I swap places in some years to come.

3.50 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on securing the debate and for leading the tributes to market towns throughout the country. I shall resist the temptation to tell the House about the market town in which I grew up, and I shall almost resist the temptation to pay tribute to the two market towns in my constituency. It has an interesting market town with sadly hidden Roman heritage, but more visible mediaeval heritage, including—to match the Banbury cakes of the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry)—Pontefract cakes, which are still enjoyed throughout the country. I also draw attention to the liquorice sweet factories that still exist in Pontefract.

I have no doubt about the importance of our market towns not only to the quality of life for those who live in them, but to local economies throughout the country. Many different issues have been raised today. I shall begin by talking about some town centre matters, after which I shall refer to many of the questions about housing asked by the hon. Member for Lichfield. Planning guidance has changed the balance in favour of our town centres, especially retail development. That is the right way forward. It is interesting that even IKEA has started to change its format to cover town centre developments, too. While it is true that many supermarket chain stores say that they prefer out-of-town developments, we know of many cases in which supermarkets are involved in the redevelopment of town and city centres, and they are often at the heart of urban renaissance and regeneration.

The hon. Member for Banbury made some thoughtful proposals on town centre regeneration, some of which we should obviously treat as Budget submissions to the Chancellor. I agree that town centre living and mixed housing, retail and other developments in town centres are important for the life of a town centre, not only because they make it more sustainable, support the local economy and keep buildings in use, but because they can improve the safety and the quality of life in a town centre. Such areas no longer become the deserted no-go zones in which people feel frightened late in the evening.

I was interested in the hon. Gentleman's ideas about the way in which we could support social housing and I shall look into that issue. Local authorities can use a wide range of powers to support town centres and to promote their development and redevelopment, whether they be planning powers, compulsory purchase orders or working relationships with local businesses to support business improvement districts. We have provided guidance and support on how to manage town centres, such as neighbourhood wardens and policing. We certainly need to provide guidance to support competition and the economic life of our town centres.

There have been debates about clone towns. Some people are hostile to chain shops, but if Next moved into one of the town centres in the market towns in my constituency, it would be really good. If some big chains moved into the market towns, that would be a sign of economic growth and prosperity. We must inject a little economic reality into our debates on the nature of our towns. We certainly need to support a wide variety of different businesses in town centres. As part of their planning approaches to town centres, we urge local authorities to consider the need to provide different premises. Perhaps they need to provide smaller units, for example, to enable smaller businesses to get going. There must be diversity of provision.

At the beginning of his speech, the hon. Member for Lichfield said that the quality of life depends very much on the quality of our communities and our market towns, and that that is a measure of the wealth of the community. He is right, but I am sure that he would agree that if we do not have enough homes for people or if people cannot afford to buy houses, it says bad things about the wealth of our communities and the nation. When talking about the need for housing development and its nature, whether in market towns or cities, we must be clear about the wider backdrop of housing need to which we must respond.

Over the past 30 years, there has been a 30 per cent. increase in the number of households, but a 50 per cent. drop in the level of new homes being built. As for household growth, about 190,000 new households are formed a year as a result of our ageing, growing population with more people living alone, but only about 150,000 new homes are being built. That gap is unsustainable. It is hardly surprising that, faced with that gap, our long-term house prices have risen considerably faster than those in other European countries to the point at which, even though we have 1 million more home owners since 1997 as a result of low mortgage rates, economic stability and prosperity, we have rising house prices that cause particular pressures for first-time buyers. Those pressures are unsustainable.

[ Yvette Cooper ]

We must respond to such pressures over the long term, too. If we carry on building at the current rate over the next 20 years, research shows that the proportion of two-earner, 30-year-old couples able to afford their own home will fall from more than 50 per cent. as it is today to nearer one third. That is unsustainable. We cannot have a society in which two thirds of 30-year-old, two-earner couples cannot afford to buy their own home on the basis of their earnings. I accept that some of them will still be able to afford their own home because they will receive gifts or inheritances from parents or grandparents, but it is not fair that people's chance of affording their own home is dependent on whether their parents or their grandparents were home owners. It is so important to build more new homes for the sake of first-time buyers in the future and for the sake of being able to deal with pressures such as overcrowding, homelessness and the problems of those on low incomes. We must accept as our starting point the need to build more new homes.

Where and how do we develop new homes and provide the housing that the nation undeniably needs? The Conservatives face a challenge. I recognise the point made by the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) when he said that perhaps we should be developing new towns instead of high-density developments in cities or existing towns. That was an honest recognition of the fact that there are trade-offs. It is unacceptable for people simply to say, "Yes, we need more new homes, but let us tell you all the places where you cannot build them and all the places where new housing is acceptable", and not to say, "Okay, so where should the new homes go?"

The hon. Member for Lichfield said that worries had been expressed about high-density development. There is a lot of high-density, high-quality developments. Let us consider the Georgian terraces in Bath: they are beautiful, extremely high-density developments—much higher than the density levels that are set out in planning guidance. Should we not have flexibility in the density to which we build? Should we not respect the different character of market towns and city locations? That is why PPS3 introduces much more clarity and flexibility in the guidance on housing density.

Alistair Burt: The Minister offered us a challenge, so I must toss one back. If terraces are so good, why have so many been knocked down in the north of England as a result of the pathfinder project rather, than being maintained and refurbished?

Yvette Cooper: As the hon. Gentleman will know, a huge number of Victorian terraces in our pathfinder areas throughout the north of England are being refurbished as a result of the pathfinder scheme. In fact, far more are being refurbished than are being demolished. In some areas, the quality of the housing and local demands or problems have meant that a variety of housing is needed. We must recognise that there is a wide variety of housing needs. We must respond to the local character of the places, and provide sensitive and sustainable housing. It is right that we have increased the proportion of houses being built on brownfield land.

Finally, I come to the planning gain supplement. I hope that the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) will find himself contradicted by the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) because the supplement will provide a good opportunity for us to raise the money that we desperately need for infrastructure. We cannot build new homes without the necessary infrastructure for local communities. We must accept that that is an important factor for the future. The issue is not simply where new homes should be built.

4 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.14 pm

On resuming—

NHS (North Northamptonshire)

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am pleased to be under your chairmanship, Mr. Chope, for this debate on an issue that is extremely important in my constituency. I am also grateful to Mr. Speaker for allowing the debate, and I hope that he recovers quickly and is back in the House as soon as possible. I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), for attending, and I hope that she will be able to address the issues that I raise.

I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) is here; he has concerns about health care in north Northamptonshire, too. He and I have been raising local health care issues since we entered Parliament last May. In Wellingborough, health care has become the No. 1 issue to local people, as identified by my "listening to Wellingborough and Rushden" campaign. I note today that my excellent local newspaper, the Evening Telegraph, has a story about the health service with the headline "Crisis Point".

Back in the autumn of 2005, my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering and I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health requesting a meeting so that local health care problems could be discussed. I do not request meetings with Ministers lightly; in fact, it is only the second such request that I have made. I was eventually given an appointment with the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), on 1 December 2005. However, a few days before, the meeting was cancelled with no explanation. After hearing nothing from her regarding an alternative date, I contacted the Department of Health to say that my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering and I still desperately needed a meeting with the Minister. I was given an appointment for today, 1 March, which was in three months' time, but—lo and behold—a few a days ago that meeting was cancelled, too. I heard on Monday that it has been rescheduled for 19 April. Trying to get an appointment with the Minister is like trying to get an operation in a NHS hospital: one is never quite sure when it will be, and there is always a strong chance that it will be cancelled at the last minute.

My constituents, the people of Wellingborough, have been misled. The Government promised them something that they did not deliver. Last year, they promised that no one would wait more than six months for a NHS in-patient operation. Well, the Government misled the House. One of my constituents, whose operation was cancelled recently, has been forced to wait well over six months. I have a statement from Northamptonshire Heartlands primary care trust, saying that it cannot meet the Government guarantee. I also have a written answer to a parliamentary question, which I received two weeks ago. It confirms that scores of patients are waiting more than six months for an NHS in-patient operation.

We are only two months into 2006, and the Government have not kept their promise. Let me make it clear that the Government could never have kept it: the six-month guarantee was never feasible without massive extra resources for certain primary care trusts and hospital trusts. It is not that the guarantee went wrong; it was never possible to meet it. The guarantee has more to do with spin doctors than real doctors. The reason why the Government have not kept their promise to my constituents is lack of funding, pure and simple. For far too long, the Government have underfunded my local hospital—Kettering general hospital—as well as the Northamptonshire Heartlands primary care trust. Health care in general in my constituency is underfunded compared to other parts of the country.

I pay enormous tribute to the doctors, nurses and staff of Kettering general hospital; they do a superb job treating patients in difficult circumstances. I praise them for their excellent work. They often carry out additional work, for which they are not paid, to ensure that patients do not suffer. If it was not for them, local health care in my constituency would collapse.

The Government cannot claim that Kettering general hospital is inefficient and wastes money. The Government have a national formula for funding hospitals, allegedly so that there is no inequality for funding across the country, yet the funding is only 85 per cent. of what Kettering general hospital should get. It has a hospital budget of £119 million, which means a shortfall of £21 million. Because of that, it has one of the lowest nurse-to-patient ratios, yet under the Department of Health's standards, it comes in the top quartile for efficiency. It is a well run hospital, and I pay tribute to its professional managers and administrators for achieving what they do, but they are being asked to do it with £21 million being held back—£21 million that, by the Government's own standards, the hospital should have.

At the end of January 2006, Northamptonshire Heartlands primary care trust, which covers my constituency and Kettering general hospital's catchment area, announced that it was cutting £720,000—nearly three quarters of £1 million—from the planned budget of Kettering general hospital. As a result, Kettering said that it would have to cancel or postpone more than 2,800 out-patient appointments, 200 ear, nose and throat operations and 370 gynaecology operations. In addition, the hospital has had to close one gynaecology ward and theatre, reduce the number of beds on another ward, and redeploy doctors and nurses to work in others areas of the hospital.

Transferring gynaecology nurses to other wards, in areas in which they are not trained, can only be to the detriments of patients' health. What a totally unacceptable situation. We have the doctors, nurses and staff, the wards and operating theatres, and patients in desperate need of an operation, yet operations cannot be carried because the accountants will not allow it. All that does is to push the problem into the next financial year and the whole sorry cycle of events starts again—Ministers, civil servants and accountants deciding when people in my constituency who are in pain and in need of an operation can have an operation.

Let us examine what the Government's promise to the people of this country was. Last November, the Prime Minister stated in Prime Minister's questions that, from the end of that month, for patients awaiting an NHS in-patient operation

"there will be a six-month maximum wait".—[Official Report, 30 November 2005; Vol. 440, c. 264.]

[Mr. Peter Bone]

That was a guarantee to sick people that they would not have to wait more than six months. On 1 December 2005, I pointed out in the House that 437 people in my constituency were waiting more than six months, as recorded in column 401 of the Official Report. In fact, only five hospitals out of 205 in the whole country had more people waiting longer than six months for an NHS operation than Kettering general hospital did.

I wrote to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State on that point and was advised that the maximum six-month wait for operations was to come into effect on 31 December 2005, not on 30 November 2005—a change in policy in fewer than 24 hours. The Secretary of State also wrote to me in a letter of 7 December that "by the end of 2005, the maximum waiting time for a first outpatient appointment with a consultant will fall to 13 weeks and the maximum waiting time for in-patient treatment will fall to six months."

In a parliamentary answer to me given on 14 February 2006, the Minister for Health said:

"At the end of December 2005, there were no patients waiting for six months for in-patient treatment at the Kettering general hospital NHS trust."—[Official Report, 14 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 2022W.]

However, on the very same day I received another parliamentary answer, from the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), who stated that scores of patients were waiting longer than six months for in-patient admission at the end of December 2005. The answer also referred me to the Department's website, for detailed figures by hospital trust. They showed that some patients were waiting more than 12 months for their operation. So much for the Prime Minister's six-month guarantee.

I was amazed that, out of the numbers of patients mentioned in the parliamentary answer, Kettering general hospital NHS trust was shown as having none waiting more than six months. I know that at least one patient has been waiting more than six months, so how many more have been waiting more than six months but not been disclosed? Getting an accurate figure from the Department is almost like pulling teeth.

On 14 July 2005, my constituent, Mrs. Michelle Baddock, received a letter from the hospital informing her of her in-patient operation, which was to take place on 1 February 2006, which by my calculations is more than six months. So how on earth can I receive a parliamentary answer stating that there were no patients at Kettering general hospital waiting more than six months for an operation when I have that example?

Of course, that is not the worst of it. Mrs. Baddock was admitted to hospital on 1 February 2006; but, after her pre-op, after being marked up for surgery and after being told to gown up to be ready to go down to theatre at 1 pm, she was told at 5 pm that the doctors would not be operating. Instead of pushing the operation back to the next day, which one might think would be the sensible thing, considering she that was completely ready for the operation, she was sent home. Having taken up Mrs. Baddock's case, I discover that her operation was scheduled for this week, some eight months after she was originally told that she needed the operation. I have here an unreserved apology from Kettering general hospital NHS trust to Mrs. Baddock.

In the same parliamentary answer that I received from the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree, she stated:

"No trusts have indicated they will not be able to meet the maximum wait standard."

That is good news, but in the very next paragraph she says that

"48 patients were waiting longer than six months."—[Official Report, 14 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 2030W.]

We cannot have the Prime Minster and the Secretary of State giving us an assurance of a guaranteed maximum waiting time and then telling us that they are meeting that guarantee, only to find that the facts are massively inconsistent with their claims. We then have two parliamentary answers totally contradicting one another on the same day and we have a Department's website giving the wrong facts.

I wrote to the Secretary of State on 15 February urging her to come to the House to make a statement correcting the misleading impression that had been given. Would you believe it, Mr. Chope, the Department rang my office yesterday and stated that, owing to an administrative error, it had lost my letter? The Government obviously have something to hide. I am unable to get a meeting with the Minister, the Department loses my letter—why do the Government not just come clean?

One of the many problems with the Government's guarantee of a maximum six-month wait is that many people are having to wait longer. Patients who may have had to wait a few weeks are having their operations pushed back to five and a half months to try to squeeze everyone in. That sounds all right, but let me highlight what it means in practical terms.

In the autumn of 2005 my constituent, Miss Michelle Major, was told that she needed a hysterectomy. Several doctors recommended that she should have a hysterectomy, owing to the constant pain and other symptoms she had been suffering. On three occasions, the pain and bleeding had become so bad that she had been rushed to the hospital's A and E unit. Each time that happened she was sent away without seeing a consultant and just given a prescription for painkillers. Why is Miss Major unable to have the operation that she so desperately needs? Once again, the reason is funding. Kettering general hospital has the doctors and staff to perform the operation, but it has had to close one of its gynaecology wards. Miss Major was originally given an operation date of 8 March, but that was cancelled. As of yesterday, she had not been notified of when she will have an operation.

That is the crux of the problem with the Government's six-month waiting guarantee. More people are having to wait longer than they would have done for serious operations such as Miss Major's. I want a fairer share of Government funding to go to the Northamptonshire Heartlands primary care trust. I also want an emergency funding package for Kettering general hospital, so that it can carry out the operations needed and not have to close wards or transfer staff to areas in which they are not trained.

The Government may quote their rhetoric time and time again, but the rhetoric has got the people in my constituency nowhere. I am fed up with Government spin. I want guarantees and action. Can the Minister guarantee patient and staff safety by transferring gynaecology nurses to work in other wards? Does she not agree that it is ludicrous for wards at Kettering general hospital to be closed when waiting lists are growing? Does she not agree that it is absurd to deny patients operations for financial reasons rather than clinical ones?

If a patient's operation is postponed or cancelled, their condition is likely to get worse, therefore requiring more treatment. Have the Government not learned that by pushing problems into the next financial year, those problems do not go away? They grow and grow. I want the Government to admit that they have failed to deliver on their promise of a six-month waiting guarantee, and I want them to apologise for misleading those of my constituents, and the other people throughout the country, who have had to wait more than six months for an operation.

From the facts that I have given today, it is clear that we are in desperate need of a community hospital in Wellingborough. Kettering general hospital is already full to capacity, and yet Northamptonshire's population is growing ever larger as it has been decreed one of the Deputy Prime Minister's areas for major growth. Over the next few years, 167,000 extra homes will be built in Northamptonshire, yet our local hospital cannot cope with the current levels of demand. We desperately need local facilities in Wellingborough; that would reduce the burden on Kettering general hospital and provide a service to local people. I hope that the Minister can give my constituents some hope in respect of this matter.

4.30 pm

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) on securing this debate on such an important topic, and I thank the Minister for allowing me to say a few words in support of my parliamentary colleague.

I, too, wish to thank all the hard-working medical, administrative and ancillary staff at Kettering general hospital, and those who are involved in all the other NHS functions in our local area. Of course, our local GPs and dentists are also feeling the strain of the lack of NHS funding from central Government. In my constituency, all the local GP lists are closed. Local people are not able to go to the GP of their choice; they have to be allocated to them by the local health authority. So far as dentistry in the Kettering constituency is concerned, 7,000 local people have been thrown off NHS dental lists over the past three years and now have to go private, and I suspect that many thousands more will go down the same route as a result of the new dental contracts that are now being introduced.

Finally, I wish to emphasise the point about the growth in population in Kettering and Wellingborough. Under the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister house building expansion plans, the population of the local area is likely to increase by at least a third in the next 15 years. Therefore, we will need a third more dentists, a third more GPs, a third more nurses, a third more doctors, a third more spaces to park the car at Kettering general hospital, and so the list goes on. But the point is that we do not have enough of those resources now; we do not currently have enough personnel of that kind. Unless the Government realise the seriousness of this issue, local people will find that the local NHS in Kettering and Wellingborough simply will not deliver the world-class service that we have all come to expect, and that we all pay for.

4.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) on securing this Adjournment debate, and I welcome the presence of the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone).

Let me begin by saying something about the recent debate about health inequalities. I took a great number of interventions in my opening speech, and in closing I was left with less time than my Opposition counterpart. Although I was aware that the hon. Member for Wellingborough was present for the debate, my perception was that he was not present for all of it. When I did not take his intervention during the small amount of time I had for my closing speech, I made that point, and I think he was rather offended. I apologise for any offence caused, but I was present for the entire three hours, and it was my perception that the hon. Gentleman was not there for all that time. I hope that that has cleared that matter up to everybody's satisfaction.

Both of the hon. Gentlemen make important points, but what they leave out of their analysis of this situation is a frank discussion of the state of play in relation to waiting times and resourcing for the NHS prior—I am sorry to say—to my Government being elected in 1997. I am sure that the hon. Gentlemen will shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, what's that got to do with where we are today?" I think that the facts speak for themselves and I shall go into detail about that. For instance, we can compare the number of people who were waiting in those days, with those waiting today, or the number of doctors and nurses we have today, compared with the situation before 1997.

Of course, the NHS stands still for no one. People's expectations have changed as new drugs and technologies are used and become more commonplace, even during my lifetime. I can remember when hip operations were seen as a novel idea. It is fair to say that, although it is not commonplace for people to have such operations, it is now a pretty commonplace procedure. That is an important context in which to place these issues. It is undoubtedly the case that the Government are responsible for record levels of investment. The amount of money spent on the NHS has risen to about £60 billion from £34 billion in 1997, and it will go up to more than £90 billion in 2008. That represents a decade of significant investment in the NHS and a period of record investment in health services for the people of England, which applies to both hospital services and the development of services outside of hospital, too.

It is not just a question of putting money in; the process has to be accompanied by reform to ensure that we deliver a more efficient health service. During my time in this job during the past eight months, I have been surprised and worried in different respects by visits to certain hospitals and primary care trusts during which I have seen how money is spent very well in some places, delivering better services for better value, but in some places—dare I say it—they could do better.

[Caroline Flint]

One of the aspects of the NHS the Government have to consider is best practice in order to see why certain places have better outcomes in their hospitals or in the community when compared with others. There are clear issues to discuss concerning the financing of the NHS and to be fair to my Government, we have shone a light on what has been a historical legacy of a smoke-and-mirrors approach to NHS funding in the past, where creative accountancy created debts going from one financial year to another. By shining that light, we have taken a risk because we have exposed historical funding anomalies that have to be put right.

We have also exposed underfunding in certain areas. This is certainly the case for the PCT area of the hon. Member for Wellingborough and, I think, for the hon. Member for Kettering. It is similar to the case of my own area in Doncaster where historically there has been underfunding compared with other areas where, when we have looked at what is necessary for the needs of the area, we have found overfunding. That is why a number of Health Secretaries have looked at how we can enable areas that have been historically underfunded to reach their target point of funding, work which has been continued by the work of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I hope the hon. Member for Wellingborough agrees that in reaching that point we have to bring areas that have been overfunded to a level point, in order to bring the others up.

We are dealing with services and people, and a big bang approach could have caused a huge number of problems. I shall go into a little more detail about that, but I am pleased to say that we are gradually moving up. The hon. Gentleman's areas have benefited during the past three years from a steady movement towards their target, and there have been increases that were larger than the national average in the spend available for PCTs to plan their services locally.

Alongside that investment, we have seen important reform and that dynamic has to continue. We have also delivered extra staff and shorter waiting times. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that in the area that he represents, the big killer diseases caused by cardiovascular disease and cancer have been considerably dealt with and challenged. That is one of the reasons we are seeing people's overall life expectancy improving, although there are issues of health equality upon which we have to bear down even further. There has been a 47 per cent. increase in the number of consultants since 1997 and although I take on board the point made by the hon. Member for Kettering, there are now more GPs in the NHS than ever before, as is also the case for qualified nurses.

For the people of Northamptonshire, it comes down to the fact that there are 100 more GPs, more than 280 consultants, more than 1,500 more nurses and midwives and more than 1,400 more health care assistants in the Leicestershire, Northamptonshire and Rutland strategic health authority area than in 1997. If there are issues in more localised areas, the PCTs must address them, as they do in my area of Doncaster, attracting and recruiting professionals to work in our local health economies.

In terms of health and inequalities, one problem that was highlighted in our recent White Paper, was that our poorest areas are least well served by GPs. We must look into that. I say to GPs who may be listening to this debate, "Come and use your training for some of those most challenging communities that desperately need your expertise, professionalism and support. In those areas, there is the biggest challenge and the most satisfaction, because you can make a real impact."

The NHS plan sets out the direction of NHS reform, and we are half way through it. Local health economies will have to make some difficult decisions if we are to provide an NHS that can meet the needs of patients in the 21st century. I am sure that that the PCTs in the hon. Gentlemen's areas take that to heart, and that that is why they are considering the issues of operations and services.

Again, there is a judgment to make. We have always said that in all finance decisions, clinical issues and priorities must be taken into account. That should be set against the services that people were getting in those areas 10 and 20 years ago. They have been substantially improved. It is a sign of our success that people do not remember the long, one or two-year waits for treatment that they used to have, because, let us face it, why worry about what happened five years ago? They are concerned about what is happening today.

The waiting list issue was raised by the hon. Member for Wellingborough, and I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend sees his contribution about the cancellation of appointments. I assure him that there was no conspiracy. There was certainly a—I do not want to use an un-parliamentary expression—but there was no conspiracy. The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that his constituent Mrs. Baddock has received an apology. I understand also that on 27 February, she received her operation.

I have looked into the case, because it is a constituent concern, and to be honest, in an open way and in good faith, it was an administrative error that was caused locally. I do not want to get into a blame game about that, but several issues did not serve Mrs. Baddock well. There was no manipulation of waiting times, and there was no local or national conspiracy to try to hide situations in which people had said that six-month waiting times were being met when they were not. The trust has confirmed that it was an isolated case and that it continues to meet the national waiting time targets.

We are addressing issues about those targets. The six-month target came into effect at the end of December. Before that, it was a nine-month target, so on 1 December or 14 December, there were people who had been waiting six months, but that was based on the old nine-month target. Therefore, the two answers to the parliamentary questions to which the hon. Gentleman referred were both right in their own sense. One referred to how many people were waiting more than six months before we reached 31 December, and the other answered the question about the situation on 31 December.

There are some issues about the way in which the figures are collected, but counting the number of waiters at the end of a period is the method that the Department of Health has used to measure waiting times for more than 20 years. The reason why we continue with that is to be consistent.

Mr. Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Fire Safety

4.44 pm

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): Two years ago, a terrible fire shattered the local community of Crowborough in East Sussex, just outside my constituency. Mr. and Mrs. Kent had their two sons, Alex and Philip, staying for the night. Alex was an off-duty fire officer. At about 2.30 in the morning, the East Sussex fire and rescue service received a call from the property. Alex Kent had woken up and discovered a fire in the lounge. This had triggered the smoke detector, and he had shouted to the others to escape. His parents hurried out, but there was no sign of Philip. Alex went upstairs to find him. They were never seen again. Both sons died in the fire. Mr. and Mrs. Kent lost their only two children and almost everything that reminded them of their lives. The couple eventually moved back into the house a year after the fire. Now a sprinkler system will ensure that such a tragedy never happens in that house again.

Adrian Brown of the East Sussex fire service, who managed the rescue attempt on that fatal night, is here as a visitor today. He told me about this sorry event. This drastic example shows how a house fire can devastate a family. It also shows that, despite all the security precautions, despite a smoke alarm, and even despite an experienced emergency worker staying in the house, terrible loss of life and injuries and massive property damage cannot be prevented.

This is not an isolated example. In the UK, two people are killed and 50 are injured in fires every day. Three out of four fires occur in private homes. Most of the people dying are young children, old people, disabled people and people under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

The family in Crowborough relied on the old saying that there is nothing as safe as houses. Today, I want to call for people to be safe in their houses as well—safe from a terrible fire death, from injury through smoke and burns and from severe property damage and loss of every precious little thing that matters to them. That is why in the first part of my speech I shall focus on fire sprinkler systems in domestic dwellings: private properties, care homes, houses in multiple occupation, and high-rise buildings. I am aware that fire sprinklers in schools is a contentious issue. Therefore, I shall add some thoughts on that at the end of my speech.

I call on the Government to use the current rethink of building regulations to consider the wider use of fire sprinklers in all new residential buildings in England and Wales. At the very least, it is high time to fit fire sprinkler systems in all newly built care homes for the elderly, for children and for the disabled. This must also apply to all care homes that are being refurbished. We must ensure that sprinklers are installed in all new high-rise buildings.

HMOs pose a particular problem. They tend to house a higher proportion of vulnerable people. Nationally, only about 5 per cent. of people live in HMOs, although Brighton and Hove, with 14,000, has a much higher percentage. Multi-occupancy properties account for more than one third of all fire deaths. Many of those living in HMOs are on a low income and are people who cannot be reached by the Government's fire safety messages.

[Ms Celia Barlow]

In an Adjournment debate on HMOs in 2000, the then Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), acknowledged the considerably higher risk of dying in a fire in HMOs. He stated:

"I am aware of the growing body of support for the provision of residential sprinklers in houses in multiple occupation."

He went on to say that

"where the risk is justified ... sprinklers may well be appropriate."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 8 November 2000; Vol. 356, c. 173WH.]

I am not saying that sprinklers will guarantee that tragedies such as Crowborough never happen again. However, there is now a growing body of research and practical examples that shows that they would make a decisive contribution to the safety of our people.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I agree with my hon. Friend about the need to install sprinkler systems in HMOs. Does she agree that, if implemented, the effect would be as radical and as effective as the measures introduced after the 1979 Woolworths fire in Manchester? Fire safety regulations were overhauled for public places and workplaces.

Ms Barlow: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Woolworths fire was a tragedy, and it is a great pity that there were not fire sprinklers at that time. I agree that the Government have made advances in fire safety—there is no doubt about that.

I called for this debate because Brighton and Hove city council recently passed a motion to encourage developers to install sprinkler systems in all new buildings. It also asked the three Members of Parliament for Brighton and Hove to lobby the Government to include the installation of residential sprinkler systems as part of the revision to building regulations.

The motion had the unanimous support of the entire city council. That support reflects the unanimity that can be found among experts when it comes to fire sprinklers. The chief executives of the fire services, the fire fighters' unions and the Association of British Insurers are all in agreement that fire sprinklers are beneficial and should be used on a much greater scale.

The motion followed a long-standing campaign by East Sussex fire and rescue service calling for all newly built domestic dwellings and major refurbishment schemes in similar houses, including HMOs and schools, to be fitted with an appropriate sprinkler system. I recently spent a day at the headquarters of the East Sussex fire and rescue service and saw its professionalism and the excellent work done by the fire fighters day by day to keep everyone secure. They impressed on me the need for wider provision of fire sprinklers to avoid the terrible loss of lives, injuries and property damage that happens every day throughout the country. The advantages of sprinklers have been proven over many years. In short, they prevent casualties and avoid great property damage caused by fire and by water. They help to save water because they fight the fire in its early stages. Examples of sprinklers being tested and widely used have shown that they reduce the number of fire deaths considerably. According to the Fire Sprinkler Association, they reduce injuries by at least 80 per cent. and property damage by 90 per cent. They also use less water so are more environmentally friendly.

In 2004, there were eight fire deaths in my region of south-east England, four of them in residential dwellings. The Government have set a target to reduce the number of accidental fire-related deaths in the home by one fifth and they are moving towards that target. The progress made has been encouraging. In the UK in 2004, the number of fire-related deaths was just 500, which is the lowest for 45 years. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend and hon. Members will agree that that is still too many. The general public often do not take fire seriously; it is something that happens to other people. However, fires happen as often as burglaries. We spend millions on crime prevention, yet only £5 million on information about fire safety.

According to the Association of British Insurers, fire claims were at a record level in 2005, costing £1.15 billion throughout the year. Domestic fire losses were £358 million. Again, that was a record level. The insurance companies predict that that level is set to rise with an ageing population that is more vulnerable to smoking materials. We need to change our attitude to fire and the Government have made a great start with their consultation on building regulations last year.

A study by the Building Research Establishment commissioned by The buildings division of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister commissioned a study by the Building Research Establishment. Its report, "The effectiveness of sprinklers in residential premises", concluded:

"For the majority of scenarios experimentally studied, the addition of residential sprinkler protection proved effective in potentially reducing casualties in the room of fire origin and connected spaces."

However, the project concluded that sprinklers were cost-effective only in buildings of 11 storeys or more and probably cost-effective in residential care homes.

I welcome those propositions and urge my hon. Friend to enforce them as soon as possible. However, in my constituency the redevelopment of the King Alfred sports centre is currently going through its planning process and under the current regime, only the car park will be protected by sprinklers; the people who will live in the flats above will not be protected by sprinklers.

Smoke alarms have a good track record of warning people of upcoming danger. However, for people who are infirm or disabled, the alert may not help. For example, in a care home at night with only two duty members of staff present, evacuation could take a long time and that time could run out too quickly. In reality, smoke alarms are often tampered with in HMOs as residents simply cut them off after a false alarm, thereby leaving everyone unprotected when a real fire breaks out.

What is more, smoke detectors may be ineffective when they are in the wrong place. Often they go off only when smoke from the room where the fire started has reached the hallway and that is particularly so in HMOs. That happened in the case of the fire in Crowborough which I mentioned earlier. That can mean that escape routes are blocked or that people sleeping upstairs have already inhaled a toxic amount of smoke.

Returning to the question of high-rise buildings, I argue that 11 storeys is too high a threshold for the installation of sprinklers. There was a terrible blaze in my constituency in 1992. Five people died in Palmeira avenue in Hove when a fire broke out during a party in a third-floor flat. The escape routes were blocked and the only way to survive was to jump from the roof and the windows. At least 12 occupants jumped or fell from the building to escape the flames. Three of them were later confirmed dead and a further two bodies were discovered inside. In addition, two people were seriously injured.

That dreadful event illustrates my point that it can be lethal to jump from the third floor. I therefore ask my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the 11-storey threshold.

In any case, smoke alarms should be complemented by sprinklers. Two good examples from north America show us how well they can protect lives and properties. The first is from Scottsdale, Arizona. In 1985, the town passed an ordinance requiring the installation of fire sprinklers in all new homes. The 15-year report states that more than half the homes in Scottsdale now have a sprinkler system installed. As people moved into older properties, they asked for sprinklers to be installed. There have been no deaths in a sprinklered home, but there have been 13 deaths in un-sprinklered homes during that period.

In the Canadian city of Vancouver, a similar success has been observed. During the 1970s, the fire death rate forced city officials to act. It reached its peak in 1973, when there were approximately 40 fire deaths. The city of Vancouver passed a byelaw requiring all new residential construction in the city to be built with fire sprinklers installed. In 1998, that city of more than half a million people recorded its first year with no fire deaths.

Sprinklers can be portrayed as too expensive, too ugly and prone to malfunction. I admit that their cost is an issue. However, I argue that if we change the building regulations and make it mandatory for all new homes to have sprinklers, that will become a normal part of the building process, together with the installation of pipes, electricity and the heating system, and that will drive the costs down considerably.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister could also explore opportunities to produce standard sprinklers for new homes. The British standard for sprinklers is higher than, for example, the American regulations. It is sometimes too over-engineered to be cost-effective. Research and development is also making progress. We should not forget that the normal lifetime of such a system is 50 years.

As I said, one objection is that sprinklers can look ugly or be intrusive. However, modern sprinkler heads can be integrated into the ceiling. If the heat is too high, the head will fall off, and only when the heat grows significantly greater will a bulb break and release the water—far less water than, for example, a fire hose uses. Sprinklers operate very early in the development of a fire and consequently require only a relatively small quantity of water to extinguish it.

As for malfunction, the chances of a sprinkler going off without mechanical assistance are one in 16 million. They are activated by heat rather than smoke. Sprinklers can make a significant difference. They are also effective at minimising property damage, which leads me to my second point, on the installation of sprinklers in schools.

Happily, no child or staff member has been killed or seriously injured in a school fire in recent years, but a fire can damage a school and disrupt learning for years and can traumatise the children. According to figures released by the Zurich Municipal insurance firm, the number of large fires causing significant damage to schools increased by more than 55 per cent. in 2004; 90 per cent. of the fires were a result of arson attacks. That firm believes that those large fires would not have escalated to such damaging proportions had the schools been fitted with sprinkler systems, and it is not alone in calling for sprinklers to be made compulsory in all new or refurbished schools.

A year ago, a school in Newhaven—near my constituency—in East Sussex was severely damaged by fire. Students lost all their coursework and the school was shut because of asbestos contamination. The children had to watch in horror when decontaminators in protective suits moved in and tried to clean their books. Their coursework had to be held up at windows to be photographed to assess their standard of reading and writing. That example shows that a school fire can be very damaging to a local community. Children lose their sense of safety and the central venue for their learning. Many schools are also used as a meeting point for the local community. Therefore, we cannot ignore the growing number of school fires and pretend that, because people are not dying, the issue is not important.

I realise that this topic comes under the remit not of this Minister but of the Department for Education and Skills, but I ask my hon. Friend to press for better fire safety in our schools. He knows much more about fire protection than many others do. Could he use his knowledge to have a word with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools to ensure that our substantial investment in education is not diminished by school fires? In addition to the statistics that I have mentioned, there are many small school fires.

I would like to draw hon. Members' attention to the early-day motion on sprinkler systems for schools that I tabled today. I am asking hon. Members for their support, as there should be nothing more precious to us than the safety of our children and the opportunity for them to learn without disruption.

It is high time to consider the use of sprinklers in private properties and schools. Over time, I am convinced that they need to become compulsory in every new residential building in England and Wales. At the very least, I urge my hon. Friends to commit to the installation of sprinklers in all newly built or refurbished care homes and high-rise dwellings. I should like the Minister to have a word with the Department for Education and Skills about sprinklers in schools.

People can lose everything that they value in a fire—every precious little photo, letter or book that they treasure—they can lose their health and, sometimes, even their life. It is time we took the danger of fire more seriously. We need sprinklers to be safe in our homes.

5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Chope. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) on securing this important debate. She is fast gaining a reputation for being a champion of fire and safety issues, for which I commend her. Clearly, her interest is a result of her own experiences as well as that of her constituents, who have told her stories like the one from Crowborough. I send my commiserations to her constituents on their tragic loss.

Whether we are talking about the fire and rescue service, central Government or local government, the voluntary sector, or MPs and Ministers working on or interested in fire-related issues, we all share the same goal, which is to cut deaths and injuries from fire. That is reflected in the public service agreement target to reduce the number of accidental fire-related deaths in the home by 20 per cent. by April 2010, and achieve a 10 per cent. reduction in deliberate fires by the same date. These are ambitious targets.

We have been criticised for not aiming for zero deaths, but that is obviously unrealistic. The latest figures published only yesterday are encouraging. In the year ending June 2005, accidental fire deaths in the home in England were down 21 per cent. to 219 and injuries were down by 4 per cent. The only way we can continue achieving this kind of reduction and continue this downward trend in the long term is through prevention. We have a world-class emergency fire and rescue service—probably the best in the world—and we must maintain it. But however good it is, it can do no more than respond. More than half of all fire fatalities occur before the fire and rescue services are even called out.

Prevention must be, and is, the new culture, and that means helping the most vulnerable people in our society as a priority. We have made a great deal of progress, but statistics continue to show that a third of all fire deaths are people aged 65 and over, with the highest rate of all among those aged 80 and over. The demographics are working against us. We have an ageing population. By next year there will be more over 65-year olds than under-16s. We must do all that we can to protect the most vulnerable groups, including older people and the very young. The good news is that we are making significant progress.

The £25 million initiative from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to provide smoke alarms and fire safety advice to 1.25 million vulnerable households was launched nearly two years ago. So far, more than 416,000 home fire risk checks have been carried out and more than 451,000 smoke alarms have been installed. Older people have been one of the main target groups.

On behalf of the ODPM, I recently announced £11.4 million grant funding for fire and rescue authorities in England to cover the period April 2006 to March 2008 and it is to support fire prevention work, including community fire safety, arson reduction and work with children and young people. The single grant to all fire and rescue authorities replaces the grants paid to some authorities under the community fire safety innovation fund, as well as the arson control forum implementation fund up to 2006. The single grant provides revenue funding to complement the capital grants paid to all fire and rescue authorities under the home fire risk check initiative up to 2008. This substantial investment will support fire and rescue authorities, working with local partners, to continue reducing the number of accidental fire deaths in the home and the number of deliberate fires in our communities.

Statistics clearly show that vulnerable groups, deprived households and certain communities are at far greater risk of fire and suffer a greater impact from its effects. We will use the funding to narrow that inequality gap. In that way, the additional funding will also support the Government's wider neighbourhood renewal plans and dovetail with the Government's respect action plan agenda and antisocial behaviour plan.

The main theme of this debate is sprinklers. Sprinklers have an important role to play, particularly where their provision is targeted at buildings where the occupants are most at risk from fire. However, they are not a panacea, and it is important that they form part of a package of measures, both active—such as smoke detectors—and passive, such as fire doors, fire-resistant construction and compartmentation, the efficacy of which has been proved over many years, along with effective building management.

My hon. Friend referred to the success story with sprinklers of Scottsdale, Arizona, and asked why we do not copy its example. We follow its experience very closely; indeed, I should own up to having gone on holiday there in 2001, which shows how sad I am, but I wanted to see things for myself, and, as it turns out, Scottsdale is a beautiful part of the United States. If anybody wants a decent holiday in the desert, I can warmly recommend it, and they can benefit from some professional advice as well. Data from the United States show that about 0.3 per cent. of its residential premises currently have sprinklers. I will be happy to continue discussing Scottsdale after the debate.

I fully agree with my hon. Friend that the experiences of other countries can provide us with a valuable insight into the implementation and effect of residential sprinkler policies. But it is not a simple task to translate experience from other countries with different built environments from ours. That is why in April 2001 we commissioned an extensive research project with the Building Research Establishment to consider fully the effectiveness of residential sprinklers.

The research suggests that targeting the provision of sprinklers to particular types of building, typically those where the occupants are considered to be the most vulnerable to fire, would be the most effective and economically robust way forward. In the light of research findings, we have consulted on whether sprinklers should be provided in tall blocks of flats—those over 30m high—and in residential care homes. That is part of the current review of part B of schedule 1 of the Building Regulations 2000 and the guidance in approved document B. I hear what my hon. Friend says about her own views on this, and I can say that we are looking at the responses and hope to publish a revised version of part B and the supporting guidance in approved document B towards the end of the year. The aim is for that to come into force in April 2007.

We have also looked at the potential role of so-called "lower-cost" sprinklers for domestic dwellings. The findings of our research on their potential role in domestic dwellings—which we funded at Little Rissington in the Cotswolds—are very encouraging, but more work needs to be done. For example, there is a need to conduct more research to determine the robustness of the present design of the lower-cost sprinkler system in a real housing environment. The research also recommends that further supporting work be carried out to resolve a number of issues. Those include the possibility of a pilot scheme to see how the sprinklers would work in practice and to determine actual installation costs and so forth, so that we can take this forward on a fully informed and strong evidential basis.

We hope to make funds available from existing funding streams in 2006–07 to support a small pathfinder programme for installing lower-cost sprinkler systems in new social housing projects. That is under active consideration in several local authorities with several registered social landlords. That would enable us to gather cost data and also to monitor the efficacy of such systems in a real environment. Such a programme would also give potential installers the opportunity to resolve any practical problems and issues, which, in turn, would help us to develop a design and installation standard for lower-cost sprinklers. However, realistically, it will take several years before we have any meaningful results from any pilot scheme and the other further work that is required. It would therefore be premature to commit to any specific course of action, particularly in respect of whether it might become a regulatory requirement.

The capital funding set aside for the home fire risk checks is what the Government like to call non-ring-fenced. In effect, that means that it is open to fire and rescue authorities to use some of the money, if they think fit, to install sprinklers in domestic dwellings. We have evidence from fire authorities across the country who are doing just that, particularly in the sorts of care establishments described by hon. Friend. However, that is a decision for the local fire and rescue service, and it must be based on an assessment of local risks and on local strategies for improving prevention. It is certainly an important option to consider, and we are promoting it within fire and rescue services.

My hon. Friend suggested that one option for progress would be to fit sprinklers as a requirement of building regulations, but that is not necessarily the best way forward in the short to medium term. If lower-cost sprinklers were fitted in all dwellings subject to building regulations, it would affect only new and materially altered properties. In other words, the impact would be restricted to less than 1 per cent. of the building stock each year. Evidence shows that the majority of fire deaths occur in existing buildings. As I said earlier, they are often influenced by socio-economic factors, so although lower-cost sprinkler systems would prevent some fire deaths, the number might be fairly limited.

There have also been calls for the retrospective fitting of sprinkler systems in existing social housing by the beginning of 2007. That could be extremely costly and we believe that registered social landlords would argue for additional funding. RSLs are already carrying out improvements to meet the decent homes standard. The housing health and safety rating system will be introduced in April, and all RSLs and local authorities will have to consider whether their stock is free of serious hazards, including fire hazards.

My hon. Friend correctly said that sprinklers have a wider potential role than purely one of protecting domestic dwellings. Their possible role in schools and educational establishments is being considered by the Department for Education and Skills as part of its consultation on the draft fire safety guidance for schools, known as building bulletin 100, or BB100. It is one of a series of building bulletins that provide design guidance on various aspects of school buildings and facilities. BB100 is about designing fire safety at schools. The document highlights the value of a risk assessment approach to determining whether sprinklers should be installed in school buildings. It also deals with fire engineering solutions. I gather that the DFES hopes to publish a final version of BB100 later this year. We have liaised closely with the Department on its development, and will continue to do so.

We believe that sprinklers have a major contribution to make in preventing fire deaths and injuries, but there is clearly more work to do before we can be certain about the best way forward for their use in different places and circumstances. We are determined to go on doing whatever is needed to improve prevention and help the most vulnerable people in our society to live safer lives, free from the fear and tragedy that fire can cause.

In conclusion, I thank my hon. Friend for raising this important issue for debate. She can safely report back to Brighton and Hove council that she has lobbied us on this particular subject. It is only through social, business and political pressure that we can make real progress in campaigning for the level of safety that we want for all our citizens. All our officials in the fire and rescue service directorate and, I am sure, all those in the fire and rescue services, thank her for her support and attention.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at thirteen minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Thursday 2 March 2006

[MR. ROGER GALE in the Chair]

Lone Parent Employment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): I am delighted to have the opportunity to debate, in this elite group, an important issue—lone parent employment. It is a central element of our welfare reform proposals, but in my view it has not been properly debated so far, or attracted as much attention as our proposals on incapacity benefit. I hope that this afternoon we can help to stimulate a discussion on the issues in the Green Paper as they affect lone parents.

There are many reasons for our developing the provision of effective support to lone parents in moving into work, but I shall pick out those that I consider the most important. The first is our ambition to eradicate child poverty. When we came into government in 1997 the UK suffered higher levels of child poverty than nearly all other industrialised nations. During the 20 years preceding 1997 the proportion of children in relatively low-income households had more than doubled, and the division, disadvantage, despair and lack of equal opportunity that that meant was intolerable to us as a Government, because the twin ambitions of economic prosperity and social inclusion are the underpinning objectives of all our public policies. That is why we have set ourselves the challenging goal of halving child poverty by 2010 and eradicating it by 2020.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I am sorry to intervene so early on the Minister, and I hope that that will not be characteristic of our later exchanges, but before she goes too far into her prepared speech about the errors of the past, does she agree that at the moment income inequalities are tending to rise under the present Government, rather than to diminish?

Margaret Hodge: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the number of people at the lower end of the scale is continuing to increase. In our attack on poverty, whether child poverty, pensioner poverty or family poverty, we have managed through our tax and benefit systems, our active employment policies and all that we have done in the way of investment and reform of public services, to draw people out of poverty. The hon. Gentleman is drawing attention to the fact that the rich are getting much richer, and the total spectrum may therefore alter—but the number being drawn out of absolute and relative poverty is improving, so I do not entirely accept what he said.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I think that I heard the Minister say a moment ago that the Government remain committed to abolishing child poverty measured in relative terms. Can she clarify whether that is still their commitment, or whether the Government have moved away from that towards trying to bring British relative child poverty down into the lower portion of the league table in Europe? That was suggested to me by someone whom I spoke to earlier today, in relation to the publication of the new Department for Work and Pensions paper, which came out last year, on the Government's child poverty targets.

Margaret Hodge: I am somewhat bewildered by that intervention, because we remain as committed as we have ever been to the eradication of child poverty, and are currently working on the new measure of material deprivation that we announced when we announced the public service agreement targets. I hope to bring forward our definition of that in the not-too-distant future, so that we have another good way of measuring not just absolute poverty but the relative poverty of families with children. That, for me, is one of the Government's most important aspirations, and as I develop my opening remarks I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the enormous inroads that have been made into absolute and relative child poverty are one of the Government's proudest achievements.

To achieve the challenging target that I have spoken about, we are implementing a multifaceted strategy: first to provide families with better financial support, secondly to tackle material deprivation, thirdly to invest in and reform public services so that we can improve children's life chances, and fourthly, to provide lone parents who want to work with the opportunity to do so, by breaking down the barriers that have stunted their opportunity in the past.

We know that children living in lone parent households are three times more likely to be living in poverty than children living in couple households. About two thirds of the children living in workless households live in a household headed by a lone parent. The combination of those two facts has led us to emphasise the importance of our new deal for lone parents and our intervention policies in relation to employment for lone parents. We know that through employment we can help to lift lone parents and their children out of poverty.

The second reason for our involvement in active labour market policies affecting lone parents is that lone parents tell us, in survey after survey, that they want to work. Nine out of 10 express the desire to work, but they face a range of barriers in realising their ambition. It is no surprise that people want to work. Work is important to all of us in the Chamber this afternoon. We need it. It is important because of the money that it brings to enable us to support ourselves and our families, the value and self-esteem that it gives us, and the position that it gives us in our communities and society. It is also important because of the network of relationships and friends that people can establish through work. We need to set about tackling the barriers that have prevented lone parents from realising their ambition to fulfil their potential through work.

In the past, lone parents were either ignored or stigmatised. They were ignored in the sense that no support was offered and they fell off the edge when their youngest child reached 16 and their automatic entitlement to income support stopped. Through our active labour market policies, the steps that we have taken to balance parents' responsibilities to their children with their workplace responsibilities, and the changes that we have made that ensure that work pays, we are responding to lone parents' express desire to work.

[Margaret Hodge]

The third reason that I want to emphasise for our being involved in policies for the employment of lone parents is that we want to ensure that, as the demography of the country changes, we can continue to maintain growth and improve the prosperity of communities in Britain. We all know that 50 years ago, there were 10 people of working age to support every person in retirement. Today there are four people of working age to support every one person in retirement. Looking forward 50 years, we expect two people of working age to be supporting every one person in retirement. If we want to maintain prosperity and growth in our communities, we need to set ourselves, as we have done, a more ambitious target of bringing more people of working age into the labour market—hence our aspiration of an 80 per cent. employment rate for the UK.

We already enjoy an unrivalled record on the management of the economy and participation in the labour market. All hon. Members present will know that we have the highest employment rate among the G8 countries, and the second lowest unemployment rate, and that we have created almost 2.4 million new jobs for Britain since we have been in government. The right to enjoy the opportunity to work is both a modern and a traditional value for a Labour Government. Extending that right to people who were never before supported to move into work is at the heart of the Labour Government's purpose and reason for being. Our traditional values in this instance find clear meaning and vital purpose in a modern setting, with the demographic structure of our society pulling us in that direction. Those are the three main reasons why this issue is an important part of the Government's policy agenda. Although we are proud of what we have achieved so far, we recognise that there is much left for us to do if we are to realise our aspirations.

In 1997, just over 45 per cent. of lone parents worked. In a mere eight years, we have introduced policies that have helped us to increase that to 56.6 per cent. The figures are now higher than they have ever been, which is a tremendous achievement. About 1 million lone parents are now in work. Since 1998, our new deal for lone parents has helped more than 400,000 lone parents to find employment, lifting them and their families out of poverty and ensuring a net saving to the Exchequer of about £40 million a year, on the latest analysis that I have seen. Partly as a result of that intervention, we have been able—again on the latest figures available—to lift 600,000 children out of poverty on the measurement before housing costs; that is 500,000 after housing costs.

Our success is the result of a range of interventions. Through a number of policies, we have helped to make work pay, overcoming one of the key inhibitors for many lone parents seeking to move from benefit dependency into the world of work. That has happened partly because of the tax credit systems, under which the poorest fifth are now more than £3,300 better off than they were before the Labour party came to power. It has also happened because of the minimum wage, which has helped to make work pay, and because of a specific set of interventions in the new deal for lone parents, including job grants, work search premiums, in-work credits and linking housing benefit and mortgage interest benefit entitlements into the lifetime of people in work. So we have made work pay.

We have also made work more possible for lone parents. That is partly because of the £17 billion that we have invested to date in early years education and child care, nearly doubling the number of child care places available. It is also because of our introduction of better parental leave rights, better conditions for part-time workers and parents' right to request flexible working if their children are young.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend rightly points to the financial and other benefits that accrue to families when a lone parent works. However, many of the people—they are mostly women—who take on flexible work patterns and part-time work find that they are under great pressure, without the same financial remuneration as their male counterparts. Can we do more to ensure that there is greater fairness in the system for women who take on such jobs?

Margaret Hodge: My hon. Friend talks about the pressure on women who work part-time and flexible hours, and to some extent I recognise the situation that she describes. However, when many of the employers to whom I talk introduce flexible arrangements—many of the staff involved are women and also mothers—they find that there is a massive benefit in terms of those people's productivity. Although there may be tensions involved in trying to negotiate such packages, we are rather rapidly reaching a situation in which employers who initially feared the introduction of the right to request flexible working are now welcoming it, because they see the benefits in productivity, staff loyalty and the commitment of those who choose flexible working.

The other issue to which my hon. Friend may have been referring is the difference in part-time and full-time pay, and we have to do much more work on that if we are to ensure fairness and equity between part-time and full-time workers. I entirely accept that.

Mr. Boswell: May I thank the Minister, on behalf of the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford), for that helpful comment? She has summarised the main concerns that we all have. Although she might not necessarily want to comment on this today, she will no doubt have in mind the finding in the case in another place yesterday, which made it clear, and stood on the principle, that part-time workers should be treated exactly the same as full-time workers in all aspects of their remuneration, including pension rights. Although that will not change the world tomorrow, it may well influence the course of the world over the next few years.

Margaret Hodge: I am delighted that the Opposition spokesman supports that progressive move. As someone who has campaigned on these issues for more years than I would like to remember, I agree that that finding was very important and welcome.

Mr. Boswell: I thank the Minister. For the avoidance of doubt, I should declare an interest. I have a daughter who is a mother, and works part-time for the civil service, which in this respect is almost an exemplary employer.

Margaret Hodge: That is an issue on which we concur across the Chamber, and I welcome that.

I have talked about making work pay and making work possible. I also want to talk about the support that we have provided to help lone parents back into work through our introduction of compulsory work-focused interviews and the new deal for lone parents.

As I said earlier, in the past not a lot happened until a lone parent's youngest child reached the age of 16 and she—we are talking mainly about women—was suddenly thrown into a world where her entitlement to income support was challenged. In March 2000 we introduced the first compulsory work-focused interviews, and a growing and important body of evidence now demonstrates the positive impact of that intervention on people's lives. I talk endlessly to lone parents who have engaged with a personal adviser in a discourse about opportunities for work, although it could equally have been about other barriers that they face, such as problems in the home, financial problems, lack of confidence or lack of training. The ability to discuss all those issues with a personal adviser opens up opportunities for many women who previously felt that they did not have a proper contribution to make to society. Probably the most warming letters and cards that I receive are those from children of lone parents who have moved into work, saying, "Thank you for making my mum happy." That makes it all feel worth while.

The introduction of work-focused interviews has had a huge impact on many people's lives and has helped to bring parents on to the new deal for lone parents programme. Nearly a fifth of those who attend the compulsory work-focused interviews move on to that programme, and nearly half those who come on to the programme move into employment. Last October we extended the mandatory work-focused interview regime so that once a lone parent's youngest child reaches the age of 14, that parent is expected to have an interview every three months. That regularity of intervention and support is important and allows us more readily to prepare lone parents for moving into employment.

Mr. Laws: The Minister mentioned the improvement in the lone parent employment rate, which has been quite marked. Has the Department carried out any investigation into how much of that improvement is due to measures such as work-focused interviews, and how much is due to the general increase in employment opportunities and other measures? Has there been any attempt to break that down?

Margaret Hodge: We have done research on the impact of such measures, but it is of course difficult to quantify and distinguish clearly the general health of the economy and our stewardship of it from the effect of the active labour market policies. My recall is that about half the impact comes from the active labour market policy interventions and half from the general health of the economy and the growth in jobs. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and give him the references, so that he can examine the research himself.

I have described what we have done through talking to lone parents in mandatory work-focused interviews. The new deal for lone parents was introduced in 1998. More than 600,000 lone parents have taken part and more than 400,000 have moved into work through the programme, which has evolved as we have learned what works. We have piloted an array of measures to respond to needs and priorities as they emerge in the work that we do with lone parents.

Some examples of that are that we now give job grants to lone parents, which may just help them to buy the suit that they need to go to the first interview, if they do not have appropriate clothing at home. We are piloting work search premiums to assist lone parents in looking for work as they prepare themselves for work. We also have the in-work emergency fund, which a lone parent can access if they face a financial difficulty during the first couple of months of work, as well as the in-work credit.

We have developed a much stronger outreach programme, and from my previous ministerial responsibilities for Sure Start, I think that our work with lone parents through that programme has been particularly innovative. Sure Start programmes tend to be located in areas that have a high prevalence of lone parents. It is wonderful to see Sure Start mothers building their confidence, from coming to Sure Start children's centres, meeting other mums and doing a bit of training, to perhaps doing some work in the centre and then out into employment elsewhere in their local communities. I often used to come across people who had started the Sure Start trajectory with no qualifications and very little work experience, but who had moved through even into NVQ level 4 undergraduate programmes and beyond. Sure Start has been an excellent outreach programme.

New deal plus has brought together many of the measures into one integrated programme. They range from discovery events, which help to build confidence and engage lone parents with employers, more concentrated support for child care, emphasising the financial support through the in-work credit scheme, to better personal support, by having a named personal adviser, continuing support with the lone parent after he or she moves in work, and other initiatives, such as our computer access jobpoints, for jobs in places such as children's centres. I saw such a scheme the other day in the Robert Owen children's centre in Greenwich. It appeared to have been really effective, with mums coming into the café, seeing the jobpoints, playing around with them on one day, accessing job opportunities a few weeks later and then moving into work.

Five districts launched the new deal plus in April 2005, in London, Bradford, Leicestershire, and Dudley and Sandwell, and we have just announced that from

[Margaret Hodge]

October 2006 we shall further pilot the scheme in Wales and Scotland. With that range of policy levers we are on track to increase the employment rate of lone parents.

Mr. Laws: The Minister mentioned the expansion of the pilots to incentivise lone parents to return to work, but when will those pilots become national? Are they pilots because the Government seek to learn something, or because they do not have enough money to spread the benefits of such an excellent policy throughout the country?

Margaret Hodge: The honest answer is a bit of both. We want to continue learning, and we are dealing with such an innovative cutting-edge area of public policy that we still have to experiment and see what works in breaking down the barriers for lone parents. In addition, we can develop the infrastructure of support for lone parents only as we can afford to do so. However, we have made terrifically rapid progress and the new deal is very cost-efficient as regards entry into work for lone parents, even in comparison with other aspects of the new deal, all of which have produced good results for the economy and the country.

We have set ourselves the target of an employment rate of 70 per cent. for lone parents by 2010. That means increasing the number of lone parents in work by more than 320,000. If are to achieve that objective, we reckon that we would lift a further 200,000 children out of poverty and reduce the number of children living in workless households by up to a further 450,000.

Mr. Boswell: Would the Minister like to confirm that in order to fulfil that target by 2010, it would be necessary for the improvement in the inclusion rate for lone parents as a percentage of the working population to rise above the recent trend line? The Government have to do better, not just as well.

Margaret Hodge: Yes. I was about to say that we need to do more if we are to remain on track. We reckon that if we maintained existing policies and the current suite of interventions, we could probably get a further 200,000 lone parents into the labour market, but to reach 70 per cent. we need to get about 320,000 into work, as I said. We need to go further; hence the Green Paper and the further proposals on which we are consulting.

Finally, what are those proposals? We want to intensify the regime of compulsory work-focused interviews and are suggesting quarterly interviews for all those whose youngest child is 11. We have made a further suggestion, to debate whether 11 is the right age or whether there is a consensus on starting when children are even younger—perhaps seven. That is particularly important, given our commitment through the national child care strategy to introduce extended schools facilities by 2010, and therefore make high-quality child care available to all children throughout the country.

I shall be interested to see the response to the consultation on those issues, but much of the data and research evidence shows that parents make such life choices when their children are in transition, so more parents move into work when their children move into primary school. Similarly, more parents choose to go back to work as their children transfer to secondary school. We need to capture those points of transition if we are to be effective in lifting lone parents out of poverty by bringing them into work.

As well as suggesting quarterly interviews from when the youngest child is seven, we want more work-focused interviews in the first year of a claim. Again, that is a theme that runs through the welfare reform Green Paper. We know that the earlier we intervene and give support, the more likely we are to be able to change patterns of behaviour, and build and retain people's confidence, so that they stay in the labour market. We have also suggested that once somebody has been on income support for a year, the frequency of the work-focused interview should be increased from one every year to one every six months.

Finally, we are introducing a new incentive that we also want to pilot with parents whose youngest child is 11. There are still about 150,000 lone parents on income support whose youngest child is 11. Although the labour market participation rate is of course is higher when the children are older, that is still quite a considerable cohort, which we wish to capture to raise those families and children out of poverty.

The incentive will be a work-related activity premium, to which lone parents will be entitled for engaging in activities that bring them closer to work. We are consulting on this issue, and I feel strongly about it. We have suggested that we should pilot the scheme as an entitlement in the pilot areas, and lone parents would have to opt out if they did not want to participate in work-related activities. Rather than an opt-in scheme, which a number of organisations in the field would prefer, I would like to use an opt-out scheme to see whether it has a different impact on lone parent participation in the labour market.

Those ideas are out for consultation. We will listen to what people say in the coming months. We are rightly proud of our record in government—of the support that we have developed for lone parents and the opportunities that we have given to so many to enjoy the benefits that work can bring to them and their children—and we want to take our policies one step further. All the measures that we have introduced are aimed at making it easier for lone parents to find and enter work, as well as ensuring that their children are well cared for in a safe and stimulating environment. I strongly believe that our approach is a winning formula that will help us to provide a lasting legacy in lifting children out of poverty and enabling lone parents to realise their potential and fulfil their ambitions.

3.1 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): As the Minister said, this is an extremely important debate. It is a pity that there are not more hon. Members here to contribute.

The Minister has clearly set out some of the issues and challenges that the Government faced in 1997. I shall sketch out my party's view of some of those challenges and draw attention to some of the Government's genuine achievements. However, in case we get too consensual, in view of the small number of Members present, I shall go on to consider some of the potential deficiencies in the Government's plans. I hope that the Minister will view that as a constructive part of the debate about the Green Paper—[Interruption.]

If I am not being misled by my Conservative colleague, the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), whose pager service is working better than mine, I should like to be the first in the House to welcome my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife, the excellent Sir Ming Campbell, as the new leader of my party. I am pleased to say that he is the one whom I supported.

Mr. Boswell: That is what they are all saying.

Mr. Laws: That is what I am telling him, anyway.

There are three huge challenges for the Department for Work and Pensions. One of those issues—pensions and retirement—we are not talking about today, but the other two big issues are getting as many people as possible back into the labour market, which is in their interests and in those of the taxpayer, and child poverty. This debate touches on both those vital issues.

The Minister was gentle with her Conservative counterpart—unusually gentle given the nature of these debates—about the developments in both those areas in the 1980s and 1990s. I do not go over those developments purely to make the hon. Member for Daventry uncomfortable, but it is worth drawing attention to the enormous social changes that took place in those decades, because they had enormous economic and social consequences. For example, there was an explosion in lone parenthood in the United Kingdom, which was not seen across most of the rest of the developed world. For a while, we were the lone parent capital of most of Europe.

Associated with the explosion in lone parenthood was an almost unprecedented increase in child poverty from something like 14 children in every 100 at the end of the 1970s to a peak of 34 in every 100 at the mid-point of the 1990s. I suspect that that phenomenal social change has had enormous implications for crime rates, education standards, benefit costs and other consequences that fall on the taxpayer. One of the Government's great achievements so far is their attempt to tackle child poverty, albeit with only moderate results so far—moderate in terms of relative poverty, but more impressive in terms of absolute poverty.

The Government have also had some success in getting people back into the labour market. As the Minister indicated, the lone parent employment rate has increased by about 10 per cent. in the past decade or so. That is quite a large increase considering the nature of these things, but I remain sceptical about whether the 70 per cent. target will be easy to deliver.

The Government should take those issues seriously for three reasons, the first of which is that worklessness has a huge impact on the country as a whole. About one in four individuals of working age is not currently in employment, and groups such as lone parents are over-represented among workless households. That means that people in those households often have low incomes and lose contact with many of the social opportunities that people have through work. It also means that they will probably retire on poor incomes. The benefit cost alone of lone parenthood is vast—about £4.6 billion a year, which I believe is more than we spend on jobseeker's allowance. That is a significant change from the situation 20 years ago.

At the same time, 27 or 28 per cent. of children are still in relative poverty. The impact of that on opportunities for those children, as well as the situation in which they live, must be phenomenal. Therefore, any sensible Government—now or in future—should do everything possible to increase employment rates for lone parents and the population as a whole, and attempt to tackle and reduce child poverty. Whether it will be possible to reduce child poverty to zero is another matter, as is the question of whether the Government are sensible to set a target of zero for child poverty without setting any equivalent levels for poverty among other individuals.

A legitimate issue for debate, on which we can only touch today, is the fact that the Government have decided to pour a lot of money into areas of the benefit system covering what are seen as worthy and deserving causes, such as children and pensioners, when many people rely on benefits that have been fixed in relation to prices rather than wages for the best part of 20 years. For example, the jobseeker's allowance rate is now about 12 per cent. of average earnings, compared with 21 per cent. in the late 1970s. If that price indexation continues, people such as single parents who rely on the underlying benefits rather than the child-related benefits might find themselves in deep poverty in future.

Kali Mountford: The hon. Gentleman has advanced these arguments before. I recall his previous statements about the parent's shopping bag, and being able to make sure that a certain set of goods can be bought. If I recall correctly, he acknowledged that that could be a costly way of ensuring that a family has enough to eat and sufficient shelter. Has he thought that policy through further and come to some proper costings, so that we can compare his approach with what is happening now?

Mr. Laws: Unless I misunderstand the hon. Lady's point, there are two issues to address. First, what measures of poverty do we use—material, relative or absolute? Even the Government have acknowledged that none of those is perfect. They are, I believe, running those three targets alongside each other.

The other point that I sought to make is that if some of our social security system is linked to prices and other parts of it are linked to earnings to deal with issues such as child poverty, we might unintentionally end up with some individuals on extremely low incomes. Considering that some lone parents' benefits in relation to their children might be more generous, but that they might have underlying price-linked benefits, we might also find it difficult to meet some of the extremely ambitious child poverty targets that the Government have set.

The Government deserve some credit, not only for making these matters big priorities and allocating a lot of money to them, but for some of the detailed proposals in the new deal and other schemes that seek to help people back into the labour market. However, it is more interesting today to focus on where things are going wrong and what changes may need to be made in the future. That is the purpose of the debate, which comes on the back of the Green Paper.

[Mr. Laws]

My first point was made earlier by the Conservative spokesman. Although the 70 per cent. target looks to be of the right order of magnitude if the Government are to address worklessness, the trends over the past decade make it difficult to imagine that they will hit that target.

The Library has produced a good briefing note for Members, which shows the lone parent employment rate since 1995. That has two interesting aspects. First, that rate was increasing fairly markedly before the Government's arrival in 1997. It is clear, as the Minister generously acknowledged, that part of the improvement must be due to the generally improved state of the economy after the severe recession in the early 1990s. It is not clear from the chart that there was any particular acceleration in the improvement in the lone parent employment rate until 2003–04. The Minister may claim that there has been some distortion, or that is when her policies kicked in and started to look impressive.

Secondly, about a year ago there seemed to be a pause in the rate of improvement in the lone parent employment rate. The Minister might be able to confirm that those figures are slightly out of date and that there has been an improvement, but the "plateauing off" in the lone parent employment rate would appear to coincide with the flattening off of the labour market as a whole, which has led to some 11 or 12 months of increasing claimant count over the past year. I do not seek to pretend that economies do not sometimes slow down under all Governments, and clearly we have had a long period of sustained increase in output. However, if the labour market continues to be weak and we continue to have such a plateau for several years, it seems almost impossible that we shall reach the Government's ambitious target by 2010.

Mr. Boswell: I had come to rather the same conclusions as the hon. Gentleman, but—to muddy the academic waters further—will he also note that the turndown in the improvement of the participation of lone parents in employment is also coincident with a reduction in the expenditure on the new deal for lone parents, which is also set out in the Library briefing? That dropped from £95 million to £91 million in the years in question.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point about how the Government will financially support getting people back into employment during what is widely anticipated—correctly, I suspect—to be a much more difficult spending round next time.

Margaret Hodge: I acknowledge that the economy has been in a flattened period in the past year, but would the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that although there has been a slight rise in claimant count, we have also seen a welcome reduction of those on active benefits, including both lone parents and those on incapacity benefit? That tends to suggest that our labour market interventions over the past few years have been effective in tackling the most disadvantaged in the labour market.

Mr. Laws: It that is accurate, it is encouraging—but I would be interested to hear whether the Minister has more up-to-date figures relating to the table, and can clarify what has happened to the lone-parent employment rate since autumn 2004. Has it continued to plateau or is it inclined to increase? Tempted by my success in anticipating the outcome of the Liberal Democrat leadership election, I would wager a bet that the Minister will find it difficult to meet her target of 70 per cent. by 2010. We all have to hope that the labour market will start to improve rather rapidly, rather than continue to pause.

There is clearly a challenge for the Government, and all parties, to consider other measures that may be able to support accelerating the rate at which lone parents get back into employment. It seems statistically to be the case that without acceleration, the target will simply not be met. It seems less likely to be met than the Government's child poverty targets for the same period.

That takes us to Government policy in the area. One of the most complicated and controversial issues is what the benefit rules for lone parents should be. That is always controversial, and in our Library briefing pack we have a headline from The Independent on Sunday from 23 October last year, which reads "Blunkett to crack down on single mothers". The article quotes the Minister as saying:

> "If you are a lone parent and you have a child in secondary school, I think you have a responsibility to support and provide for your family and that is as important as being there for children", and I will surprise her by telling her that I entirely agree.

One of the things that has baffled me when considering the social security system is how far out of line on this matter we appear to be with other countries across the world. I wonder whether the rules are based on a view of the role of women, particularly, in the labour market that is totally out of date and based on Beveridge's conception in the 1940s, after the use of women in the labour market during the second world war, that the natural place for women was at home. Even today, after the Government have supposedly put rights and responsibilities high on their agenda, the presumption in the benefit system is that there is no obligation on a lone parent to work. They can stay on income support until their youngest child is 16.

I was surprised when I first heard the limit. Testing my perception of it on other individuals in Westminster and my constituency, I found that they were almost universally baffled that that was still the rule in the United Kingdom in 2006 under this Government. I have a table that compares us with other countries on whether there is a work test or whether lone parents are expected to be willing to go back into employment, and we seem to be dramatically out of line. Not only are the lone parent employment rates in many other countries far better than ours, but they almost all appear to have a work test for lone parents when children are still at an early age. In fact, the age range for the work test is between one year and seven years. The briefing note says that of the countries in the tabie that do not already have a work test, only Ireland and the United Kingdom do not plan to introduce one. A number of those who have work tests plan to increase their severity. In some parts of the United States of America, the age threshold for youngsters at which their lone parents are expected to present themselves to go back into the labour market is not 16 years, but 16 weeks. That is an extraordinary comparison with the United Kingdom.

I am not suggesting that 16 weeks is an age that my party would support; most of my colleagues would not—and I am sure that the new compassionate Conservative party would not support a reduction to that level, either. However, we should be having a real debate about whether the benefit system in that area is completely out of line with modern reality, and whether we are sending out a message to lone parents that they should consider it normal to stay out of the labour market for that long. After all, if a lone parent has several children it could mean the person being out of the labour market for two decades. We do not need to be a genius to work out that if a person has been out of the labour market for 20 years, their skills and willingness to return to employment would be eroded dramatically.

The Government said in one of their publications that a large proportion of lone parents who were still out of employment when their children turned 16 years old ended up automatically on incapacity benefit. That is a worrying escalator. That is not to say that some lone parents may not be genuinely unable to work, but we must suspect that some of them have simply fallen out of the labour market altogether and, given the level of jobseeker's allowance, sensibly and rationally looked at other benefits that they could claim.

The Green Paper quotes the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development as saying that "once employment and childcare support is available on a comprehensive basis, it would be reasonable to oblige sole parents on Income Support to make use of it".

The Government then state:

"By 2008, half of all families will have access to school-based care for 5 to 11-year-olds. By 2010, all parents of school-age children will have access to care from 8am to 6pm all year round."

That seems to show that the Government believe that when that child care is available, it will be an obvious time to change policy.

Will the Minister explain her thinking on that topic? Does she consider that it will be right at some stage for the Government to make re-engaging with the labour market and going back on jobseeker's allowance or into employment, rather than being on income support, compulsory? Does she think that that should be part of the benefit system, rather than encouraging lone parents back to work as the Government have chosen to do, through the work-focused interview route? I am not suggesting for one moment that there will not need to be all types of support to help lone parents back into employment. Perhaps a work-focused interview approach will still be part of the system, but is it sensible to have a benefit system predicated on the basis that anyone who has a child can stay at home until that child is a certain age?

It is difficult to calculate the right age at which a work obligation should be imposed. My initial inclination was that it should at least be when a child goes to secondary school. However, people's expectations have moved on rapidly in recent years, as has the Government's provision of child care. Many of those whom I have spoken to in my constituency would set the threshold far lower than I would. They would put it more in line with the figures in the rest of the developed world—presumably at the age when children enter primary school. The Government should be considering such matters. Parents have a responsibility to provide for their children, and that is difficult to do on benefits. If we are to have a benefit system with support and child care provision, as well as opportunities, incentives and responsibilities, the existing rules seem rather out of date.

I referred earlier to the pilot. How much budgetary support will there be to help lone parents and others back into the labour market? It is difficult to establish whether over the next few years the Government will put in the financial resources necessary to help individuals, many of whom have been out of the labour market for many years, to reconnect with the labour market. Presumably, the Government will want to help through those reforms the many lone parents on incapacity benefit, as well as those on income support.

Given that the Government have piloted some of the schemes, several of which have been successful in giving lone parents economic incentives to return to work, is it not unsatisfactory that they are not made part of a national benefit system? As the Minister candidly admitted, is there not a danger that the Government will do no more than pilot the schemes more extensively, although they know that they are working successfully, because they do not have enough money to deliver them throughout the country?

If so, how will the prioritisation process work? Will pilot schemes be scattered geographically at random? Will the Minister explain how the process works now? Alternatively, will the Government pilot the schemes in areas with the highest number of lone parents and people on incapacity benefit? That would be more logical, although it still would not be consistent with the national benefit system; it might seem a rational approach, although it would not satisfy my constituents. However, when we consider some of the pilot areas, such as those in Surrey, Somerset and elsewhere, it is clear that the Government are not taking such an approach. Perhaps the pilots are supposed to be spread throughout the country to capture different labour market features.

If it is demonstrated eventually that the pilots work, how will we guarantee that everyone will have access to them? Is it fair that a lone parent seeking to go back into employment in one part of the country will not have access to an advantage that a lone parent elsewhere will have? In addition, can the Minister give us a little more information about the roll-out of assistance for people on incapacity benefit who need support to go back into work? She will be aware that there is considerable worry about whether the incapacity benefit reforms will be properly funded, when the Department for Work and Pensions budget is bound to be under great pressure during the next spending review. We know that the next spending review will bring about a much lower overall settlement than the present one.

Mr. Boswell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree, particularly in the context of incapacity reform as well as benefits for lone parents and others, that this is not only a matter of the internal DWP budget, but of ensuring access to all the other support services that may be required—not only child care but housing or educational support, too—to strengthen people's claim and potential to return to the labour market?

[Mr. Boswell]

Mr. Laws: I agree. The Government deserve some credit for recognising that, in areas such as incapacity benefit, a huge range of services need to be joined together and funded if people with long-term illnesses are to be helped back into the labour market. We all know from Government figures that when someone is on incapacity benefit for a year or more, they are stuck on that benefit for eight years on average, and might need considerable help to get back into the labour market. The funding of incapacity benefit reform and pilots is critical.

Will the Minister clarify the success of the existing employment zones? I understand that some have been extremely successful, and that the Government have allocated some of the funding that might have been spent through Jobcentre Plus to private sector deliverers to encourage them to get people back into the labour market. I have been told that although the zones have been successful, their range has been limited and that there are no clear plans to roll them out further. It would be interesting to receive clarification from the Minister.

Over the past 20 years, there has been an enormous turnaround in the number of people on incapacity benefit compared with the number of people on jobseeker's allowance. The figures have flipped on their head. We are now spending three times as much on incapacity benefit as we are on jobseeker's allowance. One of the reasons might be that, as was said earlier, jobseeker's allowance has been at fixed prices for the past 20 years, so its value has contracted rapidly. It is set at what most people would regard as a low level. The longer term incapacity benefit rates are set higher, and many people might be suspicious that, given the differential between the two, there is a considerable incentive for people to get themselves on incapacity benefit, not jobseeker's allowance.

When the benefits system was established in its relatively modern form by Mr. Beveridge, he was very clear that benefit levels would be set against a measure of how much people needed to live on to stay out of poverty. I believe that I am right in saying that he thought that it would be appropriate to set benefits for people who were out of work because they could not get a job at the same rate as benefits for people who had disabilities and therefore could not get a job. One can imagine that some people who are unemployed because they cannot find a job and others who cannot get employment because they have disabilities might have similar economic needs. Have the Government ruled out having a single rate of benefit for people on incapacity benefit and those on jobseeker's allowance? Presumably, it would need to be set at a higher rate than jobseeker's allowance, but would that not be more rational than the present position, whereby people have a large incentive to get themselves on incapacity benefit rather than on jobseeker's allowance? I appreciate that the transition to such a new benefit would be complex and that there would be understandable concerns about winners and losers, but is there really much logic in the present system? In addition, given the Government's concerns about the abuse of incapacity benefit and about people who end up stuck on that benefit because of legitimate illness, would it not be sensible to look at that option?

Margaret Hodge: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has read the welfare reform Green Paper carefully, but may I draw his attention to chapter 7? We say there:

> "The reforms set out in this Green Paper will reduce much of the complexity surrounding existing benefits for those facing health problems and disability. We consider that there may be advantages in moving in the longer term towards a single system of benefits for all people of working age, with appropriate additions for those who have caring responsibilities and those with a long-term illness or disability."

I assume from the hon. Gentleman's comments that he supports that long-term aim.

Mr. Laws: I do support the long-term aim, and I certainly think that the Government should be looking into that, but I fear that the long term may be very long term indeed because the Government have only just begun the process of reforming the incapacity benefit system, as announced by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions a few weeks ago, I think. I am losing sense of time, but I believe that the announcement was made a few weeks ago. I recall asking exactly the same question as I have asked today of the Secretary of State after his statement to the House, and I do not believe that I had a response to it.

It is difficult to understand why the Government are undertaking a major reform of the incapacity benefit system without including that possibility. After all, the Minister cannot possibly think that in the few years immediately following the reform there will be yet another reform of the incapacity benefit system. The transition from the existing system to the new system will be complex. If the Government are attracted to this idea and want to give the impression to people who think that it is a good idea that they think that it might be a good idea, why on earth are they not going ahead with it now? Is the reason simply that they are too nervous about the political consequences given some of the other controversial measures that have been going through the House of Commons recently?

Margaret Hodge: I cannot immediately identify the relevant diagram in the Green Paper, but although I respect the hon. Gentleman's great intellect he should read the section where we address the employment support allowance carefully, because he will see that that allowance is an addition, over and above the basic JSA rate. That appears to me to be a logical reform that carries us along the road in what we both think is the right direction; I say that because I thought he shared our view that it would be sensible over time to have one benefit for people of working age who are not in work, with additions to that benefit depending on the responsibilities of those individuals, such as caring responsibilities, and on whether there are additional costs arising out of ill health or disability. If the hon. Gentleman looks again, he will see that we are taking a logical next step in the movement towards that longer-term reform.

Mr. Laws: I am mildly cheered, but I am not entirely persuaded that the step is a logical one. The Government's proposals on incapacity benefit reform produce a slightly more logical system and they attempt to deal with some of the undesirable incentives in the existing system, but they do not remotely correspond to the Beveridge principle and they continue the situation in which people on JSA are on one very low rate that has continued to contract rapidly in relation to average earnings over two decades, while other people who could have exactly the same economic needs get a substantial premium even though they are engaging in what is presumably almost exactly the same work-related activity as the people on JSA who are engaged in work-related activity to find jobs. I do not understand how that can possibly be a transition; surely it is a completely different alternative.

Margaret Hodge: I simply pose a question back to the hon. Gentleman, in his role as the Liberal Democrat spokesman. Is my understanding correct that if he held my position he would propose a massive increase in JSA to bring it into line with current levels of incapacity benefit, with additions beyond that for people with ill health and disabilities? If he is proposing such an increase, how would he fund it?

Mr. Laws: I thought we were making progress towards agreeing that we needed a single benefit. Now the Minister is telling me why we have not got a single benefit: she is not willing to increase the rate of JSA and she is not willing to cut incapacity benefit from the rate that the Government envisage. If that is her view, how will we ever have a single rate?

Yes, I would argue that there is a strong case for having a single rate of benefit for people of working age who are not in the labour market, and for the distinction between those on incapacity benefit and those who are not on incapacity benefit being related to the costs of the disability, not to the fact that one set of people are on work-related activity because they have a disability and another set are on work-related activity because they cannot find a job. That may sound like a bogus distinction now, but were we to return to the situation we were in 10 or 20 years ago, when millions of people were unemployed and many towns across the country suffered huge worklessness, the distribution of benefits between two types of household, both of whose members are workless and want jobs, would be irrational. The Government would be sending out a signal—as they are now, although we do not know how powerful it is—that people would do better to have themselves classified as unable to work than to be on JSA trying to get work in the labour market. That is not a sensible structure for benefits, and it was not the structure that we started off with in the 1940s.

I see you leaning forward, Mr. Gale, and I will not extend this debate any further in case you get impatient with me, but I must ask the Minister one question. As the Green Paper is considered, will she mull over the issue and tell us what the long term is? I fear that the long term is even further away than the time when child poverty is completely abolished, and that is quite a long way ahead.

I will raise only one more point, because I have spoken considerably longer than I expected—buoyed, perhaps, by the good news from down the road. The point relates to any attempts to get single parents or anybody else back into the labour market. There continues to be strong disincentives within the benefit system, the council tax system and the housing benefit system against getting back into the labour market. The Government have been conscious of the issue since 1997 and they have taken some action to reduce the number of people who experience high marginal tax rates when they go back into employment because they lose a lot of their benefits. However, the number of such people who are experiencing marginal tax rates of 60 per cent. or more in the labour market has increased from 760,000 when the Government came to power in 1997 to almost 1.9 million. The spread of means-testing, as the Government increasingly seek to target resources on those on low incomes, has meant that more people are being trapped in this net.

When the Prime Minister debates the structure of the income tax system, he always says that a 50 per cent. upper rate of tax for people with incomes of more than £100,000 a year would have horrific effects, and that those people would immediately stop working or flee aboard. However, a much greater number of people, almost 2 million, face tax rates that are higher than that—60 per cent. or 70 per cent.—when they go back into the labour market. Whether the Government can do, or try to do, anything to reduce those marginal tax rates is an issue, as is whether they can continue along the route of tackling child poverty by for ever increasing means-tested benefits without increasing the extent of disincentives in the system. Doing so could damage their ability to get others back into the labour market. That is a point on which the Minister could usefully concentrate.

We have had an interesting debate so far; I have acknowledged some of the Government's successes on this subject since 1997, but also pointed out some of the problems ahead. Without tackling those problems, it is unlikely that the target that the Government set themselves will be met.

3.41 pm

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): It is a pleasure to take part in this debate, especially with the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), because he and I have debated these issues many times.

I want to start if not where the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) left off, then at least on a point that he mulled over: that of Beveridge and people's social attitudes, particularly to women in the labour market. I should like to take the hon. Gentleman back even further to the Marxist analysis of women as the reserve labour force, or the reserve army, as I think Marx called us at one time. That really shows the social attitude that the hon. Gentleman quite rightly identified, whereby women were not necessarily key drivers of the economy, but instead could be picked up and put down at any time, and were not necessarily accepted as the family's main breadwinner.

The hon. Gentleman pointed to a useful graph from the Library and also made a remark about women's employment—or lone-parent employment—having generally grown with the overall growth in the economy, and with more people being in work. He asked whether there was really any difference. I should like to take him back to the social attitudes that he rightly identified.

[Kali Mountford]

One of the problems was always that even if an economy was growing, women did not necessarily get any share of that growth, except when there was real dire need. For example, during times of great crisis when the men were sent away to war, it was suddenly all right for women to go to work. That social attitude had to be tackled—and still does, to some extent. The hon. Gentleman is right to point to the fact that women still are not generally accepted as the key earners for their family, even when they are the only adult in the family able to earn that money.

That brings me to the issue of pressures; they are distinctly different for women in the work force and for women who are the only carer for their family. The first issue is that of social attitudes. If a woman declares that she wants to earn for her family, she will still not get unanimous support from everyone around her. It is difficult sometimes, even when we make as many provisions as we reasonably can when the economy is growing and when we can make the investments in infrastructure that are necessary to change those social attitudes. Even when the support systems that can be supplied by a Government, a local authority or any other network are in place, family and friends may tell a mother that her real place is caring for her child. They ask, "What if the child falls down? What if they get ill? What if they need you? What if you are too tired? What if you have not sat them on your knee? What if they leave school and feel deprived?" There is a "what if?" all the time.

Women, I tell the House, are born to guilt, and we bear that guilt daily, particularly when we are mothers. It is very difficult to get around that social attitude, but it can be done. As recently as Monday, I was in the local Sure Start in my constituency. The changes that it has made to local women just amazed me. The hon. Member for Yeovil rightly pointed out how women sometimes feel after only a short time out of the work force. Sometimes, they have never been to work at all; they may have had a child very young—I will pick up on that point later—and may have no confidence in their own ability.

It was tragic to hear one woman say that she felt completely isolated in her home. She did not go out and there was nobody she would trust with her child. She would not leave the child with anybody, not even her sister, for fear that something would happen—whether it was the child's first steps or first word, or the first time that she read something—when she was not there. The mother worried that someone might give the child food that she would not have approved of, or might chastise her in a way that she did not agree with. She had become completely overprotective of the child and withdrew more and more into herself. That is not something that has happened to just one woman; I have met many people who have experienced that sort of thing.

That woman, encouraged by her neighbour, decided to go along to Sure Start and give it a go. She has changed remarkably, and she is not the only one, although her story stood out in my mind because the change was so dramatic. The change in the child was dramatic, too, and that is key to why we need women to go to work when they are the only parent. The child changed not just because her mother was starting to change, but because she was mixing with other children. She had been a frightened child because she was isolated at home with her mother, but once she had social contact, she stopped all the screaming and clinginess and started to develop and do the very things that the mother was afraid she would miss out on—make friends, enjoy herself and play.

Encouraged by that experience, the woman thought, "Perhaps I'll take on a little training." The training was provided through Sure Start, and the woman took the first step of her own 10-step road to recovery, as the Americans might call it, if they were here. There is a 10-step programme for everything.

The woman took that next step and took on a little training, but not too much. She was a little overwhelmed at first, but she carried on. She thought, "I can do this. Perhaps I'll do some training that will lead to something more concrete; I'll do a national vocational qualification", and she did. With the help of Sure Start, she had that opportunity. And so it went on, although I shall not go through all 10 steps. Eventually, she started a part-time job, and she describes not only herself, but her child, as transformed. Other women gathered around, saying, "That's exactly what happened to me." It was an absolutely fabulous day. I would tell anyone who can spend a day in a Sure Start to go and do it. It was great to see such happy children and adults.

Key to the whole process is the fact that there is a credit union based inside the Sure Start premises, and health support is available there. All the things needed to give a person the confidence to make a radical change to their life for themselves were put in one place. To me, that is the key building block of the entire process. We cannot assume that we can make the changes that the hon. Member for Yeovil described as desirable unless those building blocks are in place.

The House might say to me, "You've been here a while now. Why haven't you done something about the issue already?" Quite right too—we should always aspire to what is even better—but let us be realistic about where we started from. We started from an absolute assumption that when a parent was on their own for whatever reason—and there are a variety of reasons—that parent would stay at home. The hon. Member for Yeovil points to the fact that across Europe there are different attitudes. I do not know the precise list that he had in front of him, but if he looks down it and considers what the rest of society is doing in those countries with a different attitude, and what infrastructure there allowed social attitudes to change, we might see a clearer or more complete picture.

I do not think it reasonable to send people off into the world unless there is something concrete for them to rely on. It is the reliability that parents are looking for. They have to be certain that if they take steps into employment when they are not used to it, the package in place for them is completely reliable.

Mr. Laws: If those measures were in place, what would be the hon. Lady's view of the right age at which the ability to rely on income support should end, and at which people should be expected to transfer to jobseeker's allowance or take a work test of some kind? From her experience, what would be the right point in a child's development?

Kali Mountford: According to Helen Bee's book, "The Developing Child", there would never be a right place. I studied that book in the 1980s, when there was a real change in attitude to child development. It could easily be said that a child might be in some sort of care, outside the home, from birth.

There is no reason why, if we make decisions on the basis of the development of a child, there has to be an age element. We have to consider what people prefer for their own families and accept that. Although I chose to work from day one after the birth of both my children, which was my choice and that of many other women, many women have never made that choice and are influenced by other voices saying, "This might be bad for the development of your child."

I do not want to give an age in respect of the development of the child. Instead, I want to look at how families cope at different stages—not of the child's development, but of the care available for the child that the parent can be confident about. Sure Start is involved in the very early years. Incidentally, I make a plea to the Government, as we need to extend Sure Start to older age groups. Sure Start helps children around the age of five, with some schemes letting children who are a little older through the door—but we will not say too much about that. If a child is in Sure Start aged five, with a sister and brother aged six and seven, we need to consider how we can move that provision on, because it is so useful to people who want to get into the workplace.

At the ages that we are talking about, there are school places available, so mothers tend to look outside the home for something to do, knowing that the child is in a secure, safe place during the day. We need to consider flexible working, which we were talking about earlier, because work patterns tend to operate around the school day. That almost brings me to the schools Bill, but I will not venture into that too much, Mr. Gale, which I am sure you will be pleased about.

On the issue of caring for a child throughout the day, I attended a seminar by somebody who runs an academy. We will call it a school, rather than an academy, for the ease of my tongue. He opens up at 7 am, so parents can go in, and there is flexible working for the teachers and teaching assistants, so that somebody reliable is there from 7 o'clock in the morning right through to 6.30 in the evening. The school is open to the families all that time, so they have that reliability. We need to consider the reliability of the care of the child, which is the key, rather than whether a child has reached a certain point in their development. There is much evidence suggesting that a child's development accelerates when they are in the company of other children. It is useful for children to have that social interaction and organised play as a means of learning.

The attitude that working mothers are doing a disservice to their children by not staying at home is starting to change, but it can do so only through experience and through people knowing that, once a system has been put in place, they can rely on it as genuinely safe and something that will not be taken away from them. The idea that parents go into Sure Start with their child and develop that understanding has been key to them changing their role and going out to work.

I want to see more people taking up the opportunity of working because of all the things that the hon. Member for Yeovil said about what happens then economically to the family and also throughout their lives. Presenting a role model to the child is so important. So many children used to be brought up in households where no adult had ever worked. That was particularly true when certain industries, particularly coal and steel, were collapsing in areas around Yorkshire. It was the natural pattern, for generations, for some families not to work at all. The growing number of lone-parent families also became a pattern, which was regrettable. However, the answer is not to wag the finger at those families and say, "You bad person, get yourself sorted out." Our duty must be to the children in those families and to get the families economically viable, so they can have the kind of life that they need. We know that if we do not do that, the health of the children and the parent will be affected, and all of us in the long term will pay a heavy price, because of either their ongoing behaviour or the cost to us as a nation of their ill health.

It is sensible to ensure that people go to work. Instead of looking at the moral imperative—it is a strong, good idea for lone parents to work and we should deal with the social attitudes mentioned by the hon. Member for Yeovil—we should consider the strong economic imperative for us to ensure that this happens, even if it means switching the balance a little, so that the work force, who used mainly to be made up of male earners in two-parent families, include all people—men and women, and one and two-parent families alike. We should not say, "These people can be left out of the system."

There are two benefits from doing more to encourage people into the system: the moral and the economic. To get to the position that the hon. Member for Yeovil was talking about, there has to be a great deal of investment in the infrastructures that I am talking about, which means extending not just the Sure Start scheme, early breakfast clubs and after-school clubs, but child care generally. It is pleasing to see the number of child care places increasing, but some mothers want a different system, partly because they have not yet had the opportunity of a Sure Start scheme in their area. Such schemes are not yet universal. We need to consider more closely the reliability and credibility of such schemes, and people's sureness of the safety of their child in the hands of somebody they approve of.

Some local authorities put a great deal of time, care and energy into these issues, and child minders are an essential part of the infrastructure that we need to have in place so that lone parents can take up opportunities. For example, a woman who phoned me recently was concerned that she had been invited for an interview and wondered what that meant for her. The first thing she thought was how, if she was made to take a job—she had not yet understood that nobody was going to make her do anything—she would know that her son would be cared for after school. The traditional "what if?" came in straight away. She wondered what would happen if the hours were too late, or she did not like the job.

[Kali Mountford]

I had to persuade that person to go to the interview and not worry about the "what ifs?", because there was no question of her being made to do a job until 6 pm, meaning her son would return to an empty house; her being unable to find a child minder in her street—she would not want him to go any further from home than that—and the local authority not being able to get child minders fast enough because they have to be checked out. I said, "Never mind the 'what ifs?'; just go and find out."

That woman did find out. She was told about what the benefits could be of going into work, which is another essential part of this process. By talking to her about those potential benefits—as the hon. Member for Yeovil said, some people are concerned that they might lose their housing and council tax benefits—a calculation could be made to show that, at a certain earnings point and taking into account various amounts of tax credit and a sum of money to pay for a child care place, she would be better off. Such analysis might make a difference for her.

That process has made us see that there is another possibility, although that woman is still concerned that the system might not be robust and that she might try a job but later realise that her son, as she predicted, was not doing his homework and starting to fail in school because she had been, as she would see it, guilty of neglecting him, which is her concern. She might retreat to the home if she thinks that the safest and best thing for her child.

These are the real issues that parents are challenged with and try to make decisions about. They need support in making those decisions. The conversation that the woman I have mentioned had with the adviser at the jobcentre was good, and, as far as I could see, she was not forced into anything at all. All the adviser did was open up the possibilities that might be available to her. I met both those women in the same week, and I almost felt that I wanted to introduce them to each other and say, "Look what it can be like."

We need to do much more to tell people about what things can be like. We are combating a huge set of social attitudes that, it is fair to say, have not caught up with the modern world. Sometimes I am surprised that people can watch certain television programmes—sometimes soap operas—and see all the ideas from around the world, yet still believe that everybody in their street is going to point and wag a finger at them. However, they believe that because it often happens.

I went to a community centre in my constituency where women gather together, usually while the children are at school, and share information. The idea is that they should gain knowledge, but they also share information. Unfortunately, some of it is incorrect. I often find myself having to debunk the myths about what would happen if they got a job. One myth might be—it is absolutely true, because Elsie said so—that the women would not get the money that everybody said they would, and that if they ever claimed benefits again after they got a job, they would have to wait for months. Some believe that they would have to wait six months, or even longer, because their benefits would have been stopped. We are battling against those myths all the time when people make those decisions.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Lady has raised extremely important issues about people's concerns as they move from benefit into work. Does she agree that there are sometimes significant transitional problems for some individuals? Without making too cheap a party political point, I should say that the recent problems at Jobcentre Plus offices and with the benefit delivery system are creating and underpinning some of those fears. Sometimes those matters of concern are matters of fact.

Kali Mountford: It is true that they are matters of concern, although I have not really understood the hon. Gentleman's point about changes at Jobcentre Plus. Perhaps he will enlighten me. Was he talking about the introduction of interviews or structural change at Jobcentre Plus? [Interruption.] I shall assume that he means the changes in respect of interviews. I do not think that such concerns are always borne out. They might be genuine in so far as people think they will lose out, but, given that an in-work benefit analysis can be done reasonably accurately, any fears that somebody taking a particular job will end up worse off can be ameliorated. If it turns out that they will be worse off in a particular job, they have the opportunity to take some other job that does not lead to that disbenefit.

If, for example, somebody's family finances have become totally reliant on making sure that the tax credits and everything else are in place, there is no reason for them to be concerned that those benefits will be taken away unreasonably because the in-work benefit analysis can be done before any job is taken up. That is the safeguard.

The problem is the fear that we do not really mean all that, that the analysis will show that the person will not be better off working in a particular job, and that if they turn that job down, they will lose out on benefits. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that that is not the case. The requirement is to look only at what is available and what opportunities are out there—and, perhaps, what training is available.

Training is another point that arises from the speech of the hon. Member for Yeovil. A key barrier to work is the fact that somebody who has been out of work for a time might have lost skills. It is important, especially when somebody has lost confidence, that we build up skills to an appropriate level at a speed that people can cope with. I hope that the Government will consider carefully the speed people can cope with, because some do not become job-ready as quickly as others. There are all sorts of different problems to cope with.

Sometimes we make it sound so easy to be a parent, and also a working parent, but being a parent is extraordinarily difficult, especially when someone dealing with a crying, demanding or needy child is told that she also has to go to work—and, by the way, get some skills. When I talk about pressures on mothers, those are the pressures I think of, and they are real and significant. Although those problems can be overcome, and people can become a great deal better off by overcoming them, the worry over facing them is very real to people, who must be able to move at a speed that is okay for them. Otherwise, they will feel completely overwhelmed, especially if they find, as they have a cup of coffee in the community centre, that many local employers are not as generous as the superlative employers that we all hope they could be.

Some employers offer flexible working patterns and part-time work at an appropriate rate, and they are to be applauded for that. My right hon. Friend the Minister was right in saying that such employers get in return a properly trained, loyal work force and that everybody benefits from that. Unfortunately, some employers have not yet caught on, and there is work to be done in helping them see the error of their ways.

I hear many stories about women, often in caring professions, who work very long hours—sometimes more than their allotted hours. They do not get proper remuneration for that overtime—they feel deeply about the clients they care for—and their employers use the guilt trip to put upon them and get them to do jobs later in the day than they should without pay. That is appalling.

There is often not enough support for people to get access even to the minimum wage. I hear awful stories about women who accept a lower than minimum wage, often due to jiggery pokery around bonuses through which employers try to get out of paying the proper rate for the job. Although trade unions do a marvellous job of representing their members, they are traditionally not present in the smaller workplace, where women do not feel that they can access the advice that they need to ensure that they get the pay they need. That means a knock-on effect on their tax credits and that overall family income is not what it should be.

Those situations result from people playing around with the rules, which are there to protect people, and the issue is what we do when the rules are broken. It is easy for me to say to such ladies, as I often do, "Look, you will get this, that and the other and it will all add up. You will get your wages; you can get this tax credit, and then another to help with your child care—the whole package together. You will be well supported economically."

These women have never had the confidence to take a job, so if they know that there are local employers that break the rules and that the pay is not what it is said to be, it is a big step for them to challenge those employers about the appropriate rate for the job. We might need to re-examine that area again, although we should not go so far as to say that the idea of the minimum wage is wrong. We need to ensure that appropriate support exists for people who want to challenge the remuneration for their job.

In addition, a great deal more can be done to help people move on from a base-level job into something better. That can work only if a point of entry to the workplace is just that, not the only place in which a lone parent stays in work. There must be an avenue for people to move on, otherwise what the hon. Member for Yeovil was saying about pensions will become a problem. Obviously, if a person's working life was limited because time is taken out to care for children, older parents or other family members, and we had already limited the number of years available in which to accrue a pension, restricting things yet further because income was artificially kept down would be another injustice.

That would also not achieve what we want: to demonstrate to the children in the family that working pays and makes people better off—not just financially, but in themselves. People get something for working, not just the friendships that everyone else has talked about, which build people up as individuals and give them a reason to get out of bed every morning. Working gives a structure to the day, which is psychologically important. People need to know that it is right, fair and proper, otherwise the message is wrong.

I am not saying that this is a universal problem, but I doubt whether any constituency does not have at least one employer that does not play by the rules properly. I have battles from time to time with some employers in my constituency who—I will be careful with my words since this is on the record—sometimes play fast and loose with the employment of women. I deplore that and I hope that they will step away from that kind of activity. We need to be able to examine these matters and ensure that people have adequate support if they feel that they are not being properly treated.

I would like to conclude—perhaps hon. Members will be delighted to know that—by saying that I have concerns relating to ensuring that what is available for lone parents as they move into work is robust and secure. We need to give them the support that they need for their working lives to grow. I am delighted that we have started down a path that challenges the social attitudes that make the assumption that parents—especially lone parents—stay at home.

We need to tackle one more social attitude, which is that of young girls who think that one way of having an identity is to become a lone parent very early in life. I make no assumption about young women who have babies when they are teenagers. However, some make the choice to do so because it seems a logical one. They think that to be a mother gives them an identity and allows them to feel that they play a part in society. As some have found it difficult to achieve in school, and perhaps because that is the pattern for the family, deciding to have a child seems an appropriate thing to do. That attitude is less common than it used to be, but I still encounter it.

A couple of schools in my constituency have achieved quite a lot through the healthy schools programme. The touchy subject of sexual activity and all that goes with it is often discussed. There remains a great deal to do to raise people's expectations when they are young: perhaps having a child so early in life is not an appropriate choice, and if they made different choices they could have their children inside a happy home where everybody had an opportunity to do well for themselves.

We know what a dreadful effect having children early in life can have on young women—we might be talking about not just the effect on women. It is difficult for them to succeed in their lives and to bring up their children in the way that we would hope. I am not assuming anything about any of those mothers, because I know that they try extremely hard. If there was a little more support for sexually active young people, perhaps we might avoid some of them becoming lone parents in the first place.

[Kali Mountford]

We might be able to give them the opportunity to wait to make decisions at a more appropriate time in their lives. Having done that, I hope that the Government ensure that all those parents who find themselves alone, for whatever reason, are appropriately supported in their efforts to bring up their families, so that they and their children can all do well.

4.15 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I genuinely welcome this opportunity to discuss these serious issues in a relatively calm, objective and non-partisan format. I think that on the whole so far—I cannot speak about myself—we have done the House credit in having done so.

I pay tribute to the Minister for the way in which she introduced the debate, for some of the Government policies that she is bringing forward and for the insight into future policies that she gave. Like some other Ministers, she has a tendency to regard 1997 as year zero and not always to give credit for social advances that may have taken place before then or, as the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) pointed out, for trends towards the greater participation of lone parents in the labour force that were grounded in actions that were taken earlier. On this occasion, however, we will excuse her and treat the debate and these serious issues on their merits.

The hon. Member for Yeovil did exactly that, very commendably in view of the fact that he might well have been distracted by other events. I hope that he will not regard it as in any way sinister if I borrow a phrase from our last election campaign: he might well have been thinking some of the things that we were thinking about some of the defects in the present position and about how we should proceed. There is a good deal of understanding, not least of how complex these issues are.

My good friend the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford) spoke eloquently about the huge opportunities for women and the way in which they can be empowered by going out to work and doing things that they might never have thought of being able to do in the past, but equally about the big cultural and sometimes practical constraints that need to be overcome for that to happen. I thought she put a healthy human face on the debate—not that other participants have not done so. I look forward to the Minister's response to her hon. Friend's remarks.

I want to state as clearly as I can that my party and I recognise the difficulties faced by most, if not almost all, lone parents and indeed, by parents generally. The difficulties are magnified considerably for any lone parent. Their situation is complex and there is a variety of lone parents. We tend to forget, possibly because it is now 60 years since the end of world war two, that lone parents include a significant number of widows and widowers with young children—one was in correspondence with me the other day—people who were once married or in a firm relationship and are now separated or divorced, and many parents who have never married. As the hon. Member for Colne Valley said, their motives and circumstances might be very different.

All these things together add up to there being 1.8 million lone parents in Great Britain. We should not forget that slightly less than 10 per cent. of them are lone fathers, who also have to cope with the situation and perhaps with the expectation that they should be at work as well. Despite the advances that the Minister has recorded—the Government are entitled to some credit for some of their programmes—we can always argue about the contribution made by the general buoyancy in the labour market and about how much has been done by specific active labour market policies and whether they are the right ones or not. Whatever the mix, things have got better. However, we must remind ourselves that nearly half of the 1.8 million lone parents are still on income support—the figure is a little less than that, at about 800,000, but that is still a large number.

All lone parents face a tough time, but they have strong aspirations, which we should recognise. Almost all of them want to do the very best for their children and for their family unit, as well as for themselves. There is not and never should be a war on lone parents. We must pay them the tribute of understanding their position and the barriers that they face, whether psychological or practical or some other form of obstacle. When we understand some of the issues that have been developed in this debate, we can give them practical help.

The debate is entitled "Lone Parent Employment" so I do not want to confine myself narrowly to what I refer to in shorthand as "new deal issues"—the specific programmes of the Department for Work and Pensions—at the expense of the wider context. First, I shall say something about an issue that has already featured in the debate. We should acknowledge that the employment rate for lone mothers has now reached 56.6 per cent. I am glad that it has gone up, but the reasons for that are complex: they include economic buoyancy as well as specific interventions. I am not sure that anyone has done an entirely convincing regression analysis that reveals exactly how the numbers pan out. Incidentally, picking up on a point made by the hon. Member for Yeovil—the Minister may have noticed this too—the Secretary of State claimed on, I believe, 22 November that there was a 50:50 split between active labour market interventions and the state of the labour market, so the right hon. Lady got it spot on today. At least she is on message.

Whatever the cause, the employment rate among lone mothers has increased. It is significantly below the employment rate among mothers with partners—that is 72 per cent. The Government's target of 70 per cent. for participation of lone parents is below the current figure for mothers with partners. The Minister explicitly acknowledged today that it will be extremely difficult to hit the target. There are only four years to go, and a progression of some 3 to 4 per cent. a year would be required, which would be unprecedented in terms of the trend that has developed since about 1992.

We must remember that many mothers go out to work, or return to work, without any involvement with income support, the benefit system, Jobcentre Plus or any other labour market intervention. Indeed, my daughter is one of them—for the avoidance of doubt, I should say that she is married. They make their own way; of course, they may have difficulties because of their family circumstances, but they carve out their own destiny. Equally, others will avail themselves of the strong right, which, as the hon. Member for Yeovil said, is somewhat unprecedented in other countries, to stay at home with their children.

We must consider the exact balance between pressure and incentive. We must remember that some parents, even parents of secondary age school children, may have good reasons for staying at home. They may not be organised as or defined as carers, but they may be responsible for caring for another member of the family. There may be particular circumstances, and we should not rush to judgment. As the hon. Gentleman said, we have a benefit system and we must think about the balance that must be drawn between sanctions that disapply benefits and the individual's circumstances—certainly if ruinous cost is to be avoided.

Mr. Laws: Can I tempt the hon. Gentleman to indicate his party's view on one point? The age of the youngest child is the basis for parents continuing to claim income support. Do the Conservatives think that the present age limit should be reduced? It was not reduced over a long period of Conservative Government, so a decision must have been taken not to do that. Does he believe that now is the time to reduce the age limit?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman is seductive. He tempts me, but I shall follow only to the extent of saying that age is a relevant consideration that should at least be re-examined. It is for anyone to make a principled case for keeping the limit as it is. One of the dangers of adopting any rigid policy is that there may have to be exceptions for some cases. We should all reflect on that. It is easy to produce a new formula and say that the limit will be the beginning of secondary school or primary school, but then fall flat on our face when somebody comes along with a perfectly sensible set of family circumstances that preclude following that formula.

It has always been difficult to disentangle cause and effect. As I said, the present Government are past masters of attributing improvement in the participation of lone parents in the labour market to the new deal programme, yet we know that there was a sort of deadweight, in that unemployment was falling anyway because of wider economic factors. The relevance of that to the present circumstances has been touched on in the debate: the Government must be concerned—I certainly am—about the growth in the unemployment claimant count in the past 12 months, particularly the sharp rise in youth unemployment, which, for the purpose of our debate, is extremely relevant.

Such a rise could have two malign effects: the direct effect could be to drive up demand for marginal employees; and, in terms of labour market action, the effect could be to put further strain on the Government's employment services at a time when the Department has to hold back resources to support continuing problems at the Child Support Agency. The Department also has to deal with the Jobcentre Plus customer relationship management problems, which have been mentioned, and fulfil Gershon efficiency and head count targets.

All of that could mean that some of the extra public activities that are foreshadowed in the welfare reform Green Paper and which the Minister spoke about today could amount to mere pie in the sky. Even if they did come to fruition, any benefits that they offer could be negated by problems in the labour market. It is no good introducing people to the labour market if the labour market is shrinking and is no longer prepared to absorb them.

Margaret Hodge: In his analysis of the labour market, will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that nearly 2.4 million new jobs have been created since year zero—1997—and that even in the past year, which I believe we all accept has been a more difficult year for the economy and the labour market, 300,000 new jobs have been created in Britain? If he looks at the most recent labour market statistics, he will see that the claimant count has started to decline for the first time in 11 months.

Mr. Boswell: I am happy to respond to that. The buzz that I put around my colleagues in the Conservative research department was that if we had sacked everyone in sight, we would just about have turned those figures—the decrease in the claimant count was that small. However, it is no part of my purpose today to belittle the Government's efforts, although I cannot call it the Government's creation of jobs, because they do not create jobs except through their own spending. Of course I welcome the fact that more people are in employment, but that is not directly attributable to the Government. It is subject to qualifications such as, for example, whether people are in full-time or part-time employment. I do not seek to make qualitative distinctions, only to say that people are not working as long. One can split up the activities in different ways. However, I persist in saying to the Minister that we are worried about whether the buoyancy that has characterised previous years will continue and about her Department's ability to secure the budget that will enable it to carry on intervening to meet those challenges.

I now turn to the new deal for lone parents as it has operated to date and how it might progress. From the outset, our criticism of the schemes taken together and branded as the new deal centres not on their motivation—although that might be mixed in some respects—but on whether or not they have worked: their effectiveness. We are happy to embrace what we described in our recent election manifesto as

"Cost-effective schemes that work", and we are happy to adopt active labour market policies. The House may recall our "work first" proposals, which drew on the experience of the Government's own employment zones and working neighbourhoods. I recall making a particularly constructive visit to Birmingham in the months leading up to the election. The schemes I saw there seemed to have worked rather better than the flagship policy of the new deal itself.

Our "work first" proposals were based on what we regarded as cardinal principles: first, greater private and voluntary sector involvement, run on contract, with payment by results rather than for participation; secondly, greater flexibility for assistance tailored to the needs of the individual; and thirdly, a emphasis on jobs that last rather than the Government's revolving door into work, on to unemployment, back on to the programme and then round the houses again, which is slightly characteristic of the new deal. It is a small wonder, and the cardinal weakness of the new deal, that the targets—how new Labour loves targets—never measure or track employment sustained after 26 weeks, although we do know that even on the more simple issue of entry to employment at zero weeks after the programme only 55 per cent. of lone parents leave for employment in the first instance.

[Mr. Boswell]

Margaret Hodge: I am astounded by that remark because I think that that figure is jolly good. If the hon. Gentleman were to examine labour market interventions throughout the world, he would find that it is necessary to work pretty hard and make comprehensive interventions to secure the sort of result where half the people who get involved in the programme succeed in moving to employment. Of course we want that employment to be sustained, and we want to do better in that regard, but the hon. Gentleman ought to have the grace to accept that that sort of success rate for labour market intervention should be welcomed in this nation. It is certainly welcomed internationally.

Mr. Boswell: I am not trying to belittle anything that the Government have done. What I am saying is that the coverage is not complete. My substantive point, which the Minister should reflect on, is that it is very difficult to log whether people are staying in employment beyond 26 weeks. In effect, it is almost as though the attitude is, "The target has been met; we move on the next target."

There is absolutely no doubt that activity is taking place under the new deal programmes. The question has always been whether it is devised to best effect. At least in the area of lone parents, and having regard to the sensitivities mentioned earlier, which we all understand, I acknowledge that the programme is more or less voluntary. The only element of stick as opposed to carrot, if I can put it like that, is the requirement to attend a work-focused interview if the applicant is receiving income support. Since October last year, that process is refreshed after six months, with those who have older children required to report in quarterly. The Minister touched on further proposals in relation to the welfare reform Green Paper.

I calculate that the number of initial or review meetings now taking place must be approaching a million a year. I would be grateful if the Minister told us the average cost of each interview and perhaps the time involved, too. Will she also let us know more about the profile of the work load? Is it true, as I have heard anecdotally, that the word has gone out that halls are to be hired and "conveyor belt" interviews conducted before the end of the financial year in order to meet targets for participation? Is there a backlog that has to be cleared?

It would also be helpful if the Minister gave us further and current details of the one element of the programme that involves a degree of coercion—the sanctions for non-attendance at interview. According to the latest figures that I have, about 100,000 lone parents must have suffered at least one partial deferral of benefit. Is that problem going away, or is it likely to increase when we move to more than one interview a year? It was suggested that the change is an attempt to winkle out the people who were, for whatever reason, really determined not to go back to work without very good reason, and there is an idea that they might need to be seen more often than that. It is going to be quite difficult to get them to attend quarterly.

I give the Minister a slight warning: I hope that slippages in the timetable for interview, or other means such as letting people off without good cause—of course, they should be let off for good cause—are not used as a device to massage the figures to make them look better. I would like the Minister to unpick that area. I am not saying that there should not be sanctions or interviews—far from it—but it is important that they are carried out genuinely and in the way described by the hon. Member for Colne Valley: supportively, helpfully and with a reasonable allocation of time. They should not be used just as a bureaucratic procedure related to arbitrary targets.

As the Minister will have picked up from our exchanges, I am not surprised—but not gratified either—to be told by the Department's annual report that if one examines the total expenditure on the new deal for lone parents, which now approaches £100 million a year, two thirds go on administration and less than a third is spent on programmes.

Margaret Hodge: Hidden behind those figures are all the lone parent personal advisers, who are counted as part of the administration. The service that they provide is a direct service to lone parents—perhaps the most important element of our service because it helps in relation to the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford). People are able to sit down and talk through all their problems and barriers with an individual who is entirely focused on their needs. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying distort the statistics and that he recognises that those are direct costs of direct services that assist lone parents.

Mr. Boswell: I have not the slightest wish to distort because it is important that we have a better understanding of the process. I quote only from figures provided by the Library briefing on expenditure on the new deal for lone people, which are divided into administrative and programme expenditure and relate to a source in the departmental report. What our exchanges lead on to is the suggestion that it would be to the public benefit to know more about the matter. I understand that advisers have to be in place; they have to conduct interviews and devote time to that. They also have their "piggy bank", if I may put it that way: the £100 discretionary allowance. I notice that most of those allowances are spent in full, but I welcome that sort of flexibility in the system. I am not suggesting that any of this process should be cheap, but I want to get every pound that we can into the front line of delivery while spending the minimum amount on bureaucracy. I give the Minister credit for sharing that objective.

The Minister knows that I approach life as an optimist. I genuinely do not want to end on a wholly negative note. There are elements of the current arrangements that could be of some future use. In particular, I agree that the problems and situations faced by lone parents are likely to be complex, so whatever the actual programme and whatever its branding and design at any one time, those problems will require complex and usually holistic solutions, and not just a one-shot solution. It would be interesting to learn more about not only the Minister's experience of the old pilots from autumn 2004, but the range of the new pilots' design, particularly in relation to the welfare reform Green Paper. If she could say a little about what has happened with child care and the job grant from autumn 2004, that would be helpful. I hope that they have been successful.

In relation to pilots in general, I hope that the Government drop their habit of making decisions first and running the pilots in parallel, and properly evaluate what works and what is cost effective. I hope that with the health warnings that the hon. Member for Yeovil has already given, they carry on that new approach into the new pilots that were foreshadowed in the Green Paper. We must be sure that the resources are available and, if the approach is to be a success, that they can be rolled out.

In particular, I hope that future developments within the Minister's brief—while it continues—also take on board the lessons of the more explicitly work-oriented programmes in the United States. The work emphasis of those programmes has always been strong, whereas ours is person-oriented. It is a question of bringing the two together rather than excluding one or the other.

We would all do well to remember the importance of employers in the process. In discussing some Conservative concepts drawn from the approach that we developed and labelled "work first", I wanted to emphasise the greater flexibility and smaller bureaucracy of the private sector approach to preparing people for job readiness. That need not shock the Minister, because she knows that the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson), the last Secretary of State for Work and Pensions but two, used to emphasise how much of the Department's labour policy work was already outsourced. I think that in correspondence with my colleagues he said that 30 per cent. was outsourced. The wider role of the private sector as the provider of real and sustainable jobs for lone parents and others wanting to return to work is crucial.

By offering people the prospect of a job, private employers could play an invaluable role in pulling people through into employment. People come from different types of social exclusion—as lone parents, or after a long period of exclusion in prison, for example. They may need a period of intensive support or mentoring before they can take their first step in the labour market, and they might better do so with the protection of a job offer. It will motivate them to carry through that process. We want those people to take their first step in the labour market. That is where we should all like them to be, but between us there are differences of emphasis about how that should be achieved.

Finally, we must offer lone parents opportunity rather than any suggestion of coercion. There must be rules, but they should be seen as reasonable and sustainable, and not designed to penalise lone parents. We must offer them help rather than cynicism or bureaucracy. As a Conservative, I believe in trusting people and sharing responsibility. I want all our citizens to have a chance to find for themselves economic independence and job satisfaction, and in so doing to make their full contribution to our society. The Opposition are not after quick fixes or silly targets, and we shall welcome anything well founded that the Government do now for the long term. We all ought to be focused on something built to last. It is a phrase that will resonate on Conservative lips, and of which the nation may hear quite a bit, in the months to come.

4.45 pm

Margaret Hodge: I shall try to respond to the key issues that have been raised in the debate, but I start by saying that I do not think that we could have had a debate of this nature eight or nine years ago. I want to retain the atmosphere that we have enjoyed this afternoon. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) has said that he does not want to wage a war on lone parents, and I really welcome that. I remember with horror how the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley), when he was Secretary of State for Social Security, did just that at a Conservative party conference sometime in the 1980s.

I tend to think of 1997 as year zero in some respects, because as somebody who has worked in public life for more than 30 years, what I found most difficult when I entered Parliament and most challenging when I became a Minister was the legacy of child poverty that we inherited. The divisions that were created during the preceding 20 years, leading to one in three of our children growing up in relative or absolute poverty, were outrageously awful. Many of them were the result from the war that was waged on the poorest, among whom I include lone parents. In that context, I am delighted by the change of atmosphere and the approach that the hon. Member for Daventry reflects as a spokesman for the Conservative party.

I am delighted also that there is a consensus about the complexity of the issues with which we are dealing. There appears to be a consensus of ambition: that trying to help lone parents and their children out of poverty by creating opportunities for work through active labour market policies is a legitimate role for the Government, and one that we should try to pursue.

Mr. Boswell: To emphasise the positive, or areas on which we might agree, rather than re-fight the past, this debate is essentially about establishing a good business case for lone parent employment, and not only in terms of lone parents themselves, their aspirations, finances and opportunities, but in terms of the wider economy. We live in a world where even if there are short-term labour difficulties, there may be an increasing demand for skills. If we are not prepared to recruit those people, we will all be losers in the wider economy.

Margaret Hodge: I accept that entirely, but I would go further: there is not only a business case, but a social exclusion case. The reason we have focused our energy on those who have traditionally been most disadvantaged in and ignored by the labour market is that, although we want to promote the economic prosperity that comes from using the skills and attributes of all in our society, we want to promote social inclusion, too, by bringing people into work.

It is important to deal with the key issues. All my discussions with labour market economists—I cannot believe that Opposition Members do not also engage in such discussions—lead me to retain my optimism and confidence that we have in place the basic structures that will ensure that as we develop our active labour market policies for the most disadvantaged in the communities, plenty of good-quality jobs will be available to them.

[Margaret Hodge]

The overall employment rate in Great Britain increased from 74.6 per cent. in 2003, to 74.7 per cent. in 2004; in 2005, which was a flat year, it went down 0.1 per cent. to 74.6 per cent. again. However, lone parent employment rates continued to increase throughout those years: in 2003, the rate was 53.1 per cent., rising to 54.3 per cent. in 2004, and in our latest figures from spring 2005, which appear to be more up to date than the Library's, the rate was 56.6 per cent. Even with the flattening of the overall labour market, through our interventions we have been able to obtain some improvement in lone parent participation.

I have identified the source of the research that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I used to produce the figures. It is by Paul Gregg and Susan Harkness and it covers employment changes from 1992 to 2002. It is as a result of that research that we come to the assertion that half the employment rate increase is due to Government policies, the majority of which were implemented after 1997.

I accept that our target of reaching a 70 per cent. participation rate by lone parents by 2010 is ambitious. One of the joys of government is setting oneself stretching, ambitious objectives. The difficulty of government is trying to achieve them, but if we had set less ambitious objectives, no doubt this debate would have been about how unambitious and constrained our policies were. I am confident that we will reach that rate, but I accept that we need to introduce more policy changes. That is precisely why we have the propositions in the Green Paper, and we called for the debate this afternoon so that they could be discussed.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) raised the interesting question of compulsion. I put much of our success down to the fact that we have moved along in a gradual way on a voluntary basis. We have engaged lone parents. The only element of compulsion is that they should attend a lone parent interview; we have not put any further compulsion on them. That is one reason why we have been so successful at lifting the lone parent participation rate by more than 11 per cent.

Mr. Boswell: Does the Minister agree that there is great value in trust and that if there is any suggestion that the programme is derogatory, nasty or unduly coercive, at that point trust goes out of the window and many of the other benefits will be lost?

Margaret Hodge: That tends to be my view. I have looked a little at the experience in America, where the system involves much more compulsion, and at the impact of that. As in the rest of the welfare reform Green Paper, our purpose is not to cut the benefits bill, much as we would like to use our resources more creatively and positively to invest in services such as education and health. Our purpose is to tackle child poverty and to provide opportunities—in this instance, for many lone parents locked into benefit dependence, who experience all the fears that were so brilliantly expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Kali Mountford).

Mr. Laws: Does the Minister therefore rule out a change in the age limit in relation to which lone parents can continue to receive income support without having to pass a work test? If she does, can she say why, because that is inconsistent with experience across most of the rest of the developed world and with the Government's application of the sanction regime in respect of jobseeker's allowance?

Margaret Hodge: I was going to develop that thought. The evidence from America, where there is much more compulsion through the work test, is that lone parents and their children get locked into a downward spiral—a cycle of deprivation. The women tend to go, because they are forced to do so, into very low-paid jobs, and their children tend to go into very poor-quality child care. The women tend to be in the revolving door of going in and out of work, and the outcomes for the children as they move into adulthood are extremely poor. Our objective is to deal with child poverty and deprivation, to provide proper opportunity, including sustained employment opportunities, for the women and to improve the lifelong opportunities of their children. Given that, a work test in the absence of good-quality jobs and child care and proper support for parents is inappropriate.

Mr. Laws: Is not the Minister underestimating the contrast between her policies and those of the United States of America? Given what the Government have done on tax credits—the working tax credit, child tax credit and child care tax credit—is there any reason to think that the problems that have arisen in the United States because of the work sanction would arise in the United Kingdom? Surely the Minister underestimates the Government's achievements.

Margaret Hodge: Not at all. We have built an infrastructure to make work pay through the tax credit system and we have supported children's opportunities through the child care infrastructure of Sure Start and extended schools. Because of that and because of our effective stewardship of the economy, we do not have to force women into work, which is what happens all too often in America with the work test and the test of eligibility for benefits. We do, however, support and encourage, which is much more successful. In such an environment, we bring women into sustained employment. I quarrel with the concept that many of the jobs are not sustained: that is not what the evidence tends to show. We bring women into sustained employment and effectively lift the children, over their lifetime, out of poverty and into opportunity.

Having said that, if the hon. Member for Yeovil looks at our propositions and at the further proposals that we have made, he will see that we are increasingly growing the conditionality that we believe is appropriate.

However, doing that in a gentle way and bringing lone parents with us is much more effective as a longer-term sustainable policy intervention than suddenly—

Mr. Laws rose—

Margaret Hodge: I will not take another intervention because there are only five minutes left and I want to deal with—

Mr. Laws: There is another half an hour.

Margaret Hodge: In that case, I will take another intervention, but just let me finish the point. Bringing lone parents with us is much more effective in the longer term in tackling poverty and in ensuring that lone parents move into sustained employment, which is the key to ensuring a better future for their children.

Mr. Laws: I feel very uncomfortable outflanking a Blairite Minister on some kind of responsibility agenda. She talked about increasing the degree of conditionality. Is she saying that she will eventually end up in the same place as me, or is she giving us an assurance that the Government have no plans ever to reduce the age in relation to which lone parents can continue to claim income support?

Margaret Hodge: The proposals in the Green Paper suggest that we should lower the age in relation to which we start requiring lone parents to come in for work-focused interviews. From October last year, we introduced quarterly work-focused interviews for lone parents whose youngest child was 14. The Green Paper proposals take the age down to 11 and suggest a discussion on whether that is the appropriate age, and we await a response. I say to the hon. Member for Yeovil that much of the success of the programme in enticing, encouraging and supporting lone parents back into the labour market has been achieved because we have got the balance right between conditionality and support. Much of the reason for having to do that has to do with the social attitudes about which my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley talked so eloquently.

The hon. Member for Yeovil raised a range of issues relating to whether we have sufficient budget resources to ensure that we can continue our programme. He will know the priority that the Government attach to ensuring that as many people as possible have an opportunity to work, for both economic and social purposes. He will know how important it is to all of us in government that we do all that we can to eradicate child poverty. As we discover what works, we will ensure that the appropriate support infrastructure is in place to enable us to progress in the direction in which we want to go. Through the careful use of our resources, the Department for Work and Pensions has ensured that we can roll out the pathways to work, for example, for all new claimants by 2008. I hoped that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that as another element of the welfare reform Green Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley talked largely, and extremely eloquently, about attitudes to women and work. She brought us to the reality of what the issue means to the lives of people outside this Chamber in the community and constituency that she represents. Nothing that she said was not important. All parents—particularly mothers and lone parents—struggle to find the right balance between their responsibility to support their families through work by bringing money into the house and their responsibility to support their families by caring for their children. I have yet to come across a mother who works who does not feel guilty about getting the balance wrong. Perhaps my hon. Friend and I, having been through it all, are the only ones here who can properly understand how difficult it is to get the balance right.

I am proud of what the Government have put in place to support women to move into work and I am proud of what we have done through the Sure Start programme. I urge my hon. Friend to examine in detail the extended schools programme, which for me is Sure Start writ large for children throughout their childhood and teenage years. It brings together not only quality child care and invigorating activities in school, but all the other services that families need on a school site, whether they be primary health care services, employment support services or Jobcentre Plus advisers.

We hope to introduce a range of services. Indeed, a debate is taking place in the House this afternoon on the Children and Adoption Bill, which contains a proposal to bring contact centres for separated parents on to the school site. There is a range of support, which builds on what we have learned through Sure Start, for children and teenagers through the extended schools programme.

I also accept entirely that if we are to be successful in encouraging more lone parents to return to work, we must not only continue to transform social attitudes, but have reliable packages of support. That is why our commitments in the extended schools policy and a clause in one of the education Bills going through Parliament, which places a duty on local authorities to provide a sufficient package of child care support for all children of school age, are so important to our policy of increasing the number of lone parents in work.

I completely concur with the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley on working lone parents being role models for their children, particularly on some of our more difficult estates, where it is often unusual to find many people in work and where there tends to be a concentration of lone parents. I also concur with what she said about trying to encourage personal advisers to support lone parents in transforming their attitudes to work and building confidence. People very quickly lose confidence when they move out of the labour market. All of us who have had time out of the labour market, whether through having children or for other reasons, know that one can quickly start to feel that one has little to contribute. Building and retaining confidence and self-esteem are important.

My hon. Friend also talked about teenage pregnancy and what we need to do to ensure that that group of lone parents decreases. We have a terrible record of teenage pregnancy in this country, with one of the highest rates. The teenage pregnancy strategy, for which I had some responsibility in my previous ministerial role, was difficult to get right so as to tackle all the issues that cause too many young people to become parents at too young an age.

[Margaret Hodge]

I was therefore particularly pleased to see the most recent figures, which I think were released in the past week or two by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Children and Families. They show a 15.2 per cent. drop in conception among under-16s since 1998 and that the teenage pregnancy rate has declined overall by more than 11 per cent. We now have conception rates lower than at any time since the mid-1980s. It is important to raise the aspirations of those young girls, who are often the children of lone parents and teenage mothers, so that they feel that there are other ways to gain recognition, status and esteem within society through education, training and other means. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley for her contribution.

Finally, the hon. Member for Daventry, speaking for the Opposition, said that our proposals are pie in the sky for two reasons: because we do not have the resources to implement them and because of the possibility of the employment rate not growing.

Mr. Boswell: The conditional has been omitted—I said that the proposals "could" be pie in the sky. I was simply seeking to impose a constraint on the Minister's ebullience, rather than firmly predicting a disaster.

Margaret Hodge: I am so tempted that I cannot resist saying that, as long as we have a Labour Government, I am completely confident that we will continue to have good stewardship of the economy and a growing number of jobs with which to increase the employment rate. We will ensure in the prioritisation of our resources, in what will undoubtedly be a tight fiscal environment for public spending, that we focus on what we know will make a lasting difference to children and their families. Nothing is more important than providing the opportunity for work.

The hon. Gentleman raised the role of the private and voluntary sectors. He has probably heard all the Department for Work and Pensions team concur with him that many support services that we want delivered for people—particularly those most disadvantaged in the labour market, be they lone parents, incapacity benefit claimants or others—are often best delivered by voluntary and private providers.

However, we do not have an ideological commitment to one sector as always the most appropriate to intervene above another. We will always use the sector that works most effectively to provide our objectives. In some instances, that might well be the state, working through the Government, Government agencies or local authorities; in other instances, the private sector, the voluntary sector or both might have a key role to play.

Mr. Boswell: I thank the Minister for that helpful formulation of the Government's position. Does she agree that ever since their inception, including in the latest tranche, the new deal for lone parents pilots have characteristically, if not universally, involved some private or voluntary partner participation?

Margaret Hodge: All the new deals involve private and voluntary sector participation, because often the services that we need to provide for individuals are most appropriately provided by private and voluntary sector partners. As we have said, as we roll out the next phase of pathways to work services throughout the country, we will probably focus mainly on private and voluntary sector providers to deliver many of those services.

I tend to feel that the hon. Gentleman's remarks contained an ideological preference for the private and voluntary sectors. I do not share that. I believe that we need to use the agency that works best in a particular instance. Perhaps he has not thought of this, but as we move forward, in some instances sanctioning people's benefit if they fail to participate in particular work-related activities, it is difficult to say that private and voluntary agencies working on our behalf should do that, rather than the state and its agencies. He might hold a different view from me on that, but it is one of the rather difficult issues that we have to think through.

With the Australian experience, there has been great emphasis on private and voluntary sector providers. They provide the services while the state agency does the sanctioning, yet when the private and voluntary sectors refer to the state, a different decision is taken by the state from that taken by the front-line provider working with the individual. This certainly is not an easy ideological debate from my standpoint; I hope it does not become one from the hon. Gentleman's standpoint or that of his party.

We recognise that employment zones have been successful, and much of the greatest success comes from flexibility. We are trying to learn from that as we move forward. The hon. Gentleman is, again, right to say that we do not measure whether people maintain their jobs for more than 26 weeks. The difficulty with that is collecting data and keeping track of people who move into employment, but we hope that the movement-to-job outcome target, which will start in April and for which we will use Treasury data rather than our own, will significantly improve our ability to measure retention. I hope he will support our work on that.

I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman about the cost per interview, but my recollection—from figures that I looked at in preparation for the publication of the Green Paper—is that it is less than £10. All our evidence shows that work-focused interviews are a successful way of engaging lone parents and supporting their transition into work. The figures that I have been given show that one lone parent in five moves from the initial new deal for lone parents interview into a six-monthly review, and then about half—45 per cent.—go on into employment.

The hon. Gentleman talked about sanctions; I have figures here that will help him. Since we started to develop work-focused interviews as a condition of benefits, we have had to sanction only 58,400 people up to August 2005. Relative to the number of interviews that we must have done since they first became compulsory in 2000, that is a small number. Of those people, 65 per cent. subsequently participated in the work-focused interviews, so the sanctions on them were lifted; 11 per cent. did not pursue their claims; 10 per cent. left the benefit; and only 14 per cent. stayed on income support—at a reduced rate. One way in which sanctions work effectively is that their very existence encourages people to participate in the various activities there are to bring them closer to the labour market. It is not necessarily the implementation of sanctions and the associated poverty that lead us forward.

This has been a consensual and interesting debate. The problems are complex—I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that—but that is why we need to learn from "what works", and why we will keep trying to innovate through either the policy levers that we put forward or the innovation that is much easier to take forward with private and voluntary sector providers. We will also subject everything that we do to rigorous evaluation. I hope that all hon. Members accept that all such labour market interventions are constantly rigorously evaluated—sometimes using too many of the always limited resources that I have available, but ensuring that we properly test everything we do.

This issue is an incredibly important part of our welfare-to-work programme and vital for attacking child poverty and ensuring social inclusion. It is a bit sad that, because it is a Thursday afternoon and there is snow around the country, there are not more Members here to engage in the debate, but I hope that some people read the report of this afternoon's proceedings in this Chamber and that that ensures that there is engagement with this part of the welfare reform Green Paper and our proposals within it. It is exciting and difficult, but I am glad that we are embarking on this journey.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past Five o'clock.

Westminster Hall

Tuesday 7 March 2006

[JOHN CUMMINGS in the Chair]

Employee Share Schemes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

9.30 am

Mr. Mark Hendrick (Preston) (Lab/Co-op): I am fortunate to be selected to have this debate. As a Labour and Co-operative MP, I believe that it is important for employees in an enterprise to have a stake in the business in which they work, for a variety of reasons. First, a stake incentivises them, because they are likely to be more motivated to ensure that the enterprise is a success. Secondly, a stake tends to give the employee more influence in the running and operation of the enterprise than if they had no stake whatever in the company. To some extent that gives the employee a voice and allows various democratic influences to be brought to bear on the enterprise. Co-operative businesses have played a role in achieving those outcomes, but employee-owned and trust-owned businesses generally have also operated to some degree on that basis.

I shall propose a number of ways of improving the tax and legal regimes that affect the environment in which employee share schemes operate. Following that, I intend to suggest the setting up of a support unit working alongside the Inland Revenue to deal with the non-financial aspects of employee share ownership.

The Employee Share Schemes Act 2002 was carried through the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz). It received strong support from the Co-operative party, and its passage was also assisted by the advice and guidance of Job Ownership Ltd, which, for those who are unacquainted with it, is an association of employee-owned and trust-owned businesses.

There are a number of key points to be made about employee share ownership schemes. First, employee financial participation is welcomed by the Government and has grown significantly, owing to favourable tax treatment, in particular my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's tax advantaged share incentive plan and his enterprise management incentives share option plan, both of which were introduced in 2000. However, research shows generally that employee financial participation alone does not transform employee commitment or greatly boost productivity.

